He will give to the Fathers, in turn, the less important exercises, as the exhortations, the Rosary, the discipline, etc.—He should, moreover, appoint one or two to go to hear the confessions of the sick who may call them.—He also chooses one or two, especially at the beginning of the mission, to go, before the sermon, to invite the people to come to church.

Besides, at the beginning of the mission he should charge some missionaries to visit the most respectable people of the place, such as the principal functionaries, and also other persons of distinction, it there be any. As for the bishop, the vicar-general, and the principal man of the place, the Superior himself should visit them; and if these dignitaries do not live in the place, but in the neighborhood, he should at least take care to send two missionaries to visit them, and to ask the bishop for his blessing, and the chief magistrate for his protection, if it be necessary for the success of the mission.

III. Finally, the Superior appoints an Econome who is to take charge of the house, in regard to the food, beds the means of travelling, and all the expenses that are incurred during the mission.

The Superior should also appoint the Prefect of the church, who is charged with the duty of placing the pulpit and the statue of Mary at the side of it, of preparing the crucifix and the torches, and of finding clerics to carry them; the Prefect has, moreover, to arrange all that is needed for the general Communion and for the blessing on the last day, as also to prepare the Calvary or the crosses that are to be erected.

Besides, he is to appoint the Prefect of peace, who is to gather information in regard to the enmities that exist in the place, and to devote himself to the work of reconciliation.

Chapter XII

VIRTUES THAT THE MISSIONARIES SHOULD ESPECIALLY PRACTISE DURING THE MISSIONS

1. OBEDIENCE

IF during the mission one does not obey the Superior with exactness, all will be disorder, confusion, and trouble, and success will not be attained; for when there is no obedience to the orders of the Superior, all the exercises of the mission are thrown into confusion, and the consequence will be innumerable misunderstandings, either between the Superior and the subjects, or among the subjects themselves, because this will give rise to rivalries, jealousies, murmurs, which will create many annoyances and disappointments. How can such a mission redound to the greater glory of God? A vessel directed by different pilots cannot but make a disastrous voyage.

Every missionary should therefore be blindly obedient in everything that the Superior ordains. We may draw his attention to that of which he is ignorant or to that which he does not notice; but after having represented the case, we should be satisfied, abstain from replying, and especially from disputing; otherwise the Superior as well as the subject will become disquieted, and in the agitation that follows the work will be done unwillingly, while to the labors of the mission it is necessary that we bring a tranquil and cheerful mind.

2. HUMILITY

No one should have the temerity to ask for any office or to be employed as preacher. One would cause great scandal if one showed, directly or indirectly, a desire to preach or to give an instruction, or some other exercise of which one has not the care. One would deserve to be taken no longer on the missions, or to be always kept, so to speak, in the corner. Let every one show rather a desire to be engaged in the most humble employments; for example, to teach catechism, to say the Rosary, and the like. The best thing would be to appear always ready to hear confessions, especially the confessions of men. Here, in passing, we would remind confessors that when penitents come who are not disposed, they should never be sent away to examine their conscience, especially if they are but little instructed, as we have said in the Instruction and Practice for Confessors[13734] the confessors should examine them themselves according to the order of the commandments. In fact, to hear confessions in the missions is a less brilliant employment, but the most important and the most useful for the glory of God. The preacher is honored by every one; he is called a saint, an excellent missionary; his hands, his garments, are kissed, people recommend themselves to his prayers, whilst he that spends nine or ten hours every day in the confessional is not mentioned, not even looked at. But perhaps this confessor will acquire more praise before God in a single day than the preacher with all his sermons and all his efforts, with all the acclamations and applause that he receives from the people.

Father Segneri wisely remarks that the missionary should expect from his labors only the glory of God and the good of souls, taking for himself detraction, contempt, and vexations, and referring to God all the honors that are paid to him; otherwise, if he views with complacency his talents and his success, he will lose more than he gains of all his labors. To him will be said: You have received your reward. All the missionaries should be disposed to suffer with humility the cold reception or any other unpleasantness that they may meet with from the inhabitants of the place. The same Father Segneri said that he who has not the courage to bear with contempt and with bitterness, is not fit to be a missionary.

3. MORTIFICATION

Every one should be satisfied with the food and with the bed that are given to him, without asking for anything. When we go on a mission, we should go with the thought and the resolution not to take a walk for recreation's sake, but to suffer in order to gain souls for Jesus Christ. We should abstain from going to see the curiosities that are in the place, unless they happen to be objects of devotion; we should also refrain from going out of the house for the purpose of distracting ourselves or even from remaining at the windows or on the balcony of the house in which we live. The people look upon the missionaries as saints, as men dead to all the things of this world, as if they had neither flesh nor senses, so that every act on their part that does not appear holy astonishes and scandalizes them.

4. PIETY

This virtue should be especially conspicuous when we celebrate the holy sacrifice of the Mass. Every priest whom we see saying Mass hurriedly and with but little piety, as we have said in several places of our writings, gives scandal to the people; but the scandal would be greater if a missionary were seen celebrating Mass after the manner of indevout priests. It would not be proper to say that during the mission devotions should be abridged in order that more time may be given to confessions and to other exercises; for the words of the confessor and of the preacher will make little impression if the audience is not convinced of the sanctity of him who speaks.

Every one should, therefore, endeavor to celebrate Mass with suitable devotion, and even during the time of the mission with a little more devotion than usual, in order to edify the people. Besides, we should not fail to make thanksgiving after Mass, as is prescribed in our Constitutions; however, during the mission it would be a fault to spend more than a quarter of an hour in making it when there are many penitents waiting to go to confession.

5. MODESTY

The missionaries should observe great modesty both in their looks and in their words.

They should take care always to observe modesty of the eyes in the church, in the streets, and in the houses where there are women. They should know that the people are very attentive in observing whether any missionary looks women in the face. A missionary, now dead, was a holy man; nevertheless in a certain place he had neglected to keep his eyes under control, and it was said of him: "He may have been a saint, but he used to look women in the face."

Especially should the missionary be modest in his words; let him never speak of the defects of others, and let him speak well of every one. Religious and priests should always be held in great esteem, and when others are detracting their neighbor, he should at least be silent if he cannot excuse him.

6. COURTESY AND GRAVITY

The missionaries should be courteous to every one especially by saluting all those whom they meet on the way, however humble may be their condition. Nothing attaches the people to the missionaries and draws them to God so much as to see themselves saluted by them. This is, however, to be understood of men, not of women; for when they meet women, they should salute them with uncovered head without raising the eyes. All courtesy and deference should therefore be paid to the people of the place; they should avoid disputing with them, and yield to them in all that does not compromise the interests of the mission.

But to this courtesy and deference must be joined gravity and proper reserve; hence the missionaries should avoid being intimate with any person of the place and for this reason they should abstain from talking to others about news and about anything that does not profit the mission. For a greater reason should they refrain from entering the houses without necessity and without the permission of the Superior.

APPENDIX

WE shall here treat of five points on which it is necessary to instruct the people so that the mission may be successful: 1. Love for Jesus crucified; 2. Devotion to the Mother of God; 3. Necessity of prayer in order to be saved; 4. Flight from dangerous occasions; 5. Ruin of souls who through shame omit to confess their sins.

I. LOVE FOR JESUS CRUCIFIED

In the missions we usually speak only of the four Last Things and of other subjects apt to excite fear; little is said, except incidentally, of the love that God bears us, and of the obligation that we have to love him. No one will deny that terrifying sermons are useful, and even necessary, in order to awaken sinners who have fallen asleep in their sins; but we should be convinced that conversions brought about only by the fear of divine chastisements are of short duration; they last only as long as this fear continues in full strength; when, however, it is dissipated, the soul, having become quite feeble by the sins committed, easily succumbs to every new attack of temptation; if the holy love of God enters not the soul it will be difficult for it to persevere.

Persuaded of this truth, St. Peter of Alcantara usually, treated in his sermons of terrible subjects, as death, judgment, hell, by which he startled his hearers by representing to them the rigor of the divine justice against the obstinate; at the same time, however, he allayed their fears by pointing out to them the remedies for the sins committed. He inspired them with hope of pardon through the merits of Jesus Christ according to the sweet promises made by our Lord, who wished to suffer so much and to die of sorrow on the cross in order to obtain for sinners pardon and grace to resist in future the temptations of the flesh and of hell. It is thus that the saint attracted to Jesus Christ all that came to him—the learned and the unlearned,—in such crowds that the churches where he preached could not contain the people, and conversions became general.

The missionary should therefore chiefly endeavor in every sermon that he preaches to leave his hearers inflamed with this holy love. But this end is not attained by speculative sermons, in which one demonstrates the excellence of divine love, to attain which it is above all important for us to make others understand the love that Jesus Christ has borne us in his Passion. St. Francis de Sales says: "All love that does not take its origin in the Passion of our Lord is frivolous." When, on the other hand, a Christian believes and practically represents to himself all that Jesus Christ has suffered in order to save him, he cannot but be penetrated with love for Jesus Christ; and therefore we may rightly hope that he will persevere till death in the state of grace.

In reference to this matter I find it proper to note here what was told me of a celebrated missionary, who is now dead. As he was charged to preach the principal sermon in a place of several thousand inhabitants, he preached among others a speculative sermon on divine love, and invited a well-informed priest to come to hear him. This priest told me that the discourse was learned, filled with texts of Scripture and of the holy Fathers, and of theological teachings; he was praised by the small number of hearers that could understand him; but the greater part of the people derived no fruit or nearly none, because they could understand very little of what he said. The preacher would certainly have produced much more fruit if he had confined himself to explain in an humble way the love that Jesus Christ bore to us by coming into the world to suffer and to die for us.

Hence in our missions, especially on the last three days, we speak only of the Passion of our Lord, so that the souls may become attached to Jesus Christ; and not only on the last three days, but on every day of the mission, it will be well for the preacher to interweave, wherever this is suitable, some exhortation on the love that we owe to Jesus Christ. Moreover, we would do well to induce the audience to procure, each one, a pious image of Jesus crucified, to whom they should take care often to recommend themselves during the day by asking of him the graces that they desire, above all the grace of loving him till death; and this grace every one should ask of the divine Mother, of his guardian angel, and of all his holy patrons, that is, the grace of loving Jesus Christ, which comprises all graces.

It will also be useful for the preacher to teach the people, from time to time, some holy maxims which every good Christian should keep engraven on his heart, in order to continue in the grace of God and in union with his holy will; for example: To lose everything rather than to lose God. If God is lost, all is lost. What friend have we who has loved us as much as God? All that God wishes is good. We should therefore accept everything that comes from his hand.

It will also be useful to teach some ejaculatory prayers, to reanimate in the heart the love for God; for example: Deus meus, et omnia—My God and my all. My God, it is only Thee that I wish, and nothing else. Whom shall I love if I do not love Thee, my Jesus, who hast died for me? etc.—These pious affections will contribute much to keep burning in the heart the sacred fire of divine love.

II. DEVOTION TO THE MOTHER OF GOD

During the mission we should often recommend devotion to the Blessed Virgin. This devotion is not one of those that one calls supererogatory. According to the teaching of many saints and all the masters of the spiritual life, it is regarded as necessary, not by absolute necessity, but at least by moral necessity; so that one fears for him who lives habitually a stranger to such a devotion. To convince ourselves of this truth, it is sufficient to know that the holy Church in her hymns makes us call the Blessed Virgin our hope—Spes nostra, salve.

This agrees with what St. Bernard writes; he thus calls Mary: "A full aqueduct, so that others may receive from her plenitude."[13735] He afterwards says: "The Redeemer when about to redeem mankind conferred upon Mary the price of the redemption."[13736] And he concludes: "If there is any hope in us, if there is any grace, if any salvation, we know that it all comes from Mary."[13737] He again says: "No grace comes from heaven to the earth unless it passes through the hands of Mary."[13738] And elsewhere he says: Such is his wish that we should have everything through Mary."[13739] Father Natalis Alexander, dwelling on these last words of St. Bernard, thus expresses himself: "God wishes that all the good that we expect from him should be obtained through the most powerful intercession of Mary."[13740] And Father Contenson wishes the same thing to be understood when he says that none will participate in the blood of Jesus Christ except through the intercession of his divine Mother, and puts into the mouth of our Lord these words: "No one shall participate in my blood except through the intercession of my Mother."[13741]

And why should we expect everything good from God through the intervention of Mary? The same St. Bernard gives us the reason of this in another place, by saying that it is because Mary is wanting neither in power with God to obtain for us all the graces that we desire, nor in good-will to save our souls: "She is wanting neither in the power nor in the will."[13742] In another place he declares that Mary is the whole foundation of his hope: "She is my greatest reliance, she is the entire motive of my hope."[13743] And he exhorts us to ask in the name of Mary for all the graces that we desire to receive from God: "Let us ask for grace, and let us ask for it through Mary."[13744] Finally, the saint assures us of divine grace and eternal salvation if we persevere in devotion to Mary. He thus beautifully expresses himself: "Following her, you will not wander from the path; invoking her, you will not despair; thinking of her, you will not err; clinging to her, you will not fall; having her as your protectress, you need fear nothing; having her as your guide, you will not grow weary; being propitious to you, she will help you to arrive at your destiny."[13745] To the writings of St. Bernard may be added what many other saints say of the Blessed Virgin. St. Ephrem addresses these words to her: "In no other except in thee, O most faithful virgin! do we put our confidence."[13746] St. Bonaventure writes: "No one can enter heaven, unless he enters through Mary as through a door."[13747] And St Bernardine of Sienna: "All the gifts and graces are dispensed by God through Mary's hands, to whom she wishes, when and how she wishes."[13748] In another place he says to her: "Thou art the dispenser of all graces; our salvation is in thy hands."[13749] St. Peter Damian also says to her: "Nothing is impossible to thee, to whom it is possible to inspire with confidence even those that have despaired of salvation."[13750] And he adds at the end, that the Son honors his Mother in refusing her nothing for which she asks him: "The Son honors thee by refusing thee nothing."[13751]

In order not to be too diffuse I omit here very many other passages taken from authors who express the same thing; but from all that precedes, we rightly conclude that devotion to the Blessed Virgin is not only useful, but even morally necessary, according to what St. Bernard says, as is quoted above: "No grace comes from heaven to the earth unless it passes through the hands of Mary." At the present time this is a very common opinion among Catholics, as we have proved in our book the Glories of Mary,[13752] in which I quote many theologians who call this an opinion that is absolutely common.

However, this opinion does not please Muratori, who in his book entitled Well-regulated Devotion, says of the maintained proposition, "God does not grant any grace except through the mediation of Mary,"[13753] that it is a hyperbole, an exaggeration that has escaped the lips of some saints. But I do not know how this great scholar has been able to see in this a hyperbole, after Jesus Christ has deigned to choose this privileged creature for his Mother and for his co-operatrix in the redemption of the human race. It cannot be denied that it was a most proper thing that, since Mary had honored and loved Jesus Christ more than all men and all angels, he should have wished to raise her to this prerogative, namely, that all the graces which are to be dispensed to redeemed men—graces which are the fruit of his merits—should pass through the hands of his Mother, as through a channel of graces, according to the opinion of St. Bernard. What conduces much in favor of our proposition is that the holy Church in the Salve Regina tells us to call this divine Mother, Vita, spes nostra—our life, our hope. One should then fear very much for the salvation of him who esteems but little the devotion to the Blessed Virgin, and neglects to obtain her intercession; for according to the opinion of St. Bernard, he thereby closes to himself the channel of graces necessary to his salvation; and it is this that the preacher should above all inculcate.

III. NECESSITY OF PRAYER IN ORDER TO SAVE OUR SOULS

In regard to the necessity of prayer it must be remarked that although God wishes the salvation of all men, as the Apostle declares: Who will have all men to be saved;[13754] and that according to the remark of St. Thomas on these words, the Lord, wishing the salvation of all men, does not allow any one to be in want of the grace of which he stands in need: "And, therefore, grace is wanting to no one, but communicates itself to all as far as possible;"[13755] nevertheless, theologians teach that no one is saved except with the help of God, and this help he does not obtain unless he prays for it.[13756] Thus Gennadius[13757] expresses himself, and St. Augustine adds that except the first graces, as the vocation to the faith, or to penance, God does not grant the rest, and especially the grace of final perseverance, except to him who asks for it.[13758] Hence theologians commonly conclude, with St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom, and the same St. Augustine, that for adults prayer is necessary by necessity of means, so that without prayer it is impossible, according to the present disposition of Providence, to save one's soul.

This is what is signified by Scripture when it says: We ought always to pray.[13759] Ask and you shall receive.[13760] Pray without ceasing.[13761] For St. Thomas[13762] says that the words We ought, Ask, Pray express a precept which imposes a grave obligation, especially in three cases: 1. When any one is in the state of mortal sin; 2. When any one is in danger of committing sin; 3. When any one is in great danger of death. Outside of these cases, theologians (see Lessius, de Inst., 1. 2, c. 37, d. 3, n. 9, et seq.) say that he who neglects for a month, or at least for two months, to recommend himself to God, is not excused from mortal sin. The reason of this is that ordinarily during this time the devil, who unceasingly is trying to gain souls, will not fail to cause him some grave temptation, and that in grave temptations he who does not pray, and does not ask God's help, of which he stands in need in order not to fall, will very easily fall. In fact, we should be convinced that without the help of God we have not the strength to resist the violent movements of bad passions and the vehement suggestions of the enemy who comes to assail us, even though we should have taken a thousand good resolutions and made to God a thousand promises; if we then do not recommend ourselves to God, we shall certainly be conquered. We must add that the Council of Trent condemns him who should say that man in the state of grace can persevere in it without the special help of God: "If any one saith that the justified either is able to persevere, without the special help of God, in the justice received; or that, with that help, he is not able; let him be anathema."[13763] Hence, in order to persevere, the ordinary divine help does not suffice; we need extraordinary help, which is not obtained except through prayer.

In this we should be greatly encouraged by the innumerable promises that the Lord has made us, as well in the Old as in the New Testament, that he will hear any one that prays to him. What should, above all, inspire us with great confidence is the consideration of the two promises made by Jesus Christ, in which he teaches us to pray with the certainty of obtaining the graces that we ask in his name. In one promise he says: Amen, amen, I say to you: if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you; in the other: If you shall ask Me anything in My name, that I will do.[13764] When we, therefore, pray to God in the name of the Son, or to the Son in his name, we should be sure of obtaining the grace that we ask; for God cannot fail in his promises. This is to be, however, understood whenever the graces asked for are spiritual goods, the before-mentioned promises not having for their object temporal goods, which the Lord grants to us only so far as they are more profitable to the soul. As for spiritual goods, the Apostle St. James wishes us to ask for them with great confidence, because God grants them in abundance to all: Ask of God, Who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not.[13765] The last two words signify much: they signify that when anyone addresses God prayers useful to his eternal salvation, and when he prays with faith, God will certainly hear him; even when the soul has been unfaithful to him he grants it the grace that it asks, and does not reproach it for the faults that it has committed. When, therefore, we solicit spiritual goods, we should firmly believe that we shall obtain them, and they will be granted to us, as our divine Master has assured us when he says: All things whatsoever you ask when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you.[13766] After this, the preacher should not omit to recommend to him who prays always to be careful to interpose the intercession of Mary, according to the advice given by St. Bernard quoted above: "Let us ask for grace, and let us ask it through Mary."

In concluding this point about the necessity of prayer, I cannot but complain of those preachers, and also of the authors of books of piety, who speak little of prayer; but I especially complain of confessors who take little care to remind their penitents of this necessity of praying in temptations: they carefully tell them to make a firm resolution and to promise to God never more to offend him; but they do not take the trouble to make them understand that when one is tempted, especially against purity, good resolutions and promises are of little use if one does not invoke God's help. When the temptation is strong, we should at once recommend ourselves fervently to God; and if the temptation continues, we should continue to implore the help of God in order not to fall until it ceases, or at least until it grows weaker. Experience proves that the invocation of the holy names of Jesus and Mary, in temptations, is an excellent means not to give consent to them. But I say that if one sees so much backsliding among penitents who are contrite, it is because confessors pay so little attention to persuading them that in the suggestions of the devil they should immediately ask God to assist them.

Some will be astonished at seeing me requiring of preachers that during the missions they should attend to inculcating these two practices on the minds of the hearers, namely, to have recourse to God in temptations, and as is said in the second point, to recommend one's self often to the Blessed Virgin. I say that they will be astonished, because commonly these are two things that preachers always recommend and leave as remembrances, especially in their last sermon.—Yes, I say that such is the custom; but I answer that in order to induce the hearers to take the firm resolution to execute these two things that are so important to salvation, it is not sufficient to recommend them once and to leave them as remembrances in the last sermon: we should recommend them in all the sermons in order that the people may keep them engraven on the memory, and put them in practice in the future.

IV. THE FLIGHT FROM DANGEROUS OCCASIONS

This fourth point should often be recommended in the mission; for an innumerable multitude of souls are lost by not wishing to avoid the occasions of sin. Oh, how many souls are now in hell who cry out, weeping: Unhappy me, if I had kept from this occasion I should never have damned my soul for all eternity!

The Holy Ghost reminds us that he who loves the danger will fall into sin,—will perish: He that loveth danger shall perish in it.[13767] St. Thomas explains to us the reason; commenting on this text, he says that when we voluntarily expose ourselves to danger, or when we neglect to keep from it, God abandons us in it.[13768] And St. Bernardine of Sienna[13769] assures us that among the counsels of Jesus Christ the counsel of fleeing from the occasion of sin is the most important, is, as it were, the foundation of religion.

The preacher should then take care to remind the people that when they are tempted, especially it the occasion presents itself, they should avoid reasoning with the temptation. What the devil desires is precisely that we should parley with it; for thereby he will easily conquer us. We must in this case flee from the occasion at once, and invoke the names of Jesus and Mary without listening to the enemy who tempts us.

St. Peter assures us that the devil prowls around every soul to devour it.[13770] On this text St. Cyprian says that the devil goes about without ceasing, and examines by what door he may enter. When a dangerous occasion presents itself, the devil at once says to himself: Here is the door by which I can enter this soul. And immediately he begins to tempt the soul. If we then neglect to flee from the occasion, we shall certainly yield to it, especially when the object of the temptation is a carnal sin. Hence the devil is not so much afraid of our good resolutions and our promises not to offend God as to see us flee from the occasion; for, if we do not flee from it, it becomes a bandage which is put over our eyes, and makes us forget all the eternal truths, all the lights received, and all the promises made to God. And if any one finds himself sunken in impure sins, he should avoid as much as possible the occasions, not only the proximate, but also the remote occasions, for he is less capable of resisting. We should not, then, labor under the illusion by pretending that it is a necessary occasion which we need not avoid; for Jesus Christ has said: If thy right eye scandalize thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee.[13771] Even if it weie your right eye, to escape damnation it would be necessaiy to pluck it out and cast it from you, that is, by fleeing from this occasion, however remote it may be; for on account of your weakness it is proximate for you.

St. Francis of Assisi, speaking of persons who have the fear of God, gives an excellent advice concerning remote occasions: he says that for persons who fear to lose God, the devil, in the occasions, does not at first excite them to grave faults; he begins by attaching them with a hair, which afterwards, in time, may through his suggestions become a chain, and he thus succeeds in dragging them into mortal sin. Hence in our relations with persons of the other sex, we should take care to break off from the beginning every kind of attachment, however feeble it may be, by avoiding even the remote occasions, such as looking them in the face, saluting them with affection, receiving notes or presents from them, and much more, saying tender words to them.

We should, above all, be convinced that we who are by nature sensual have not the strength to preserve the virtue of chastity; God only in his goodness can grant us this strength. Now it is true that the Lord hears him who prays to him; but if any one exposes himself to the occasion, and knowing it, does not remove from it, his prayers are not heard, according to the words of the Holy Ghost already quoted: He that loveth danger shall perish in it. Alas! how many are there who, for not having fled from the occasions of this kind, although they led holy lives, ended by falling into sin and becoming hardened in it? With fear and trembling, says the Apostle, work out your salvation.[13772] He that does not tremble, and dares to expose himself to dangerous occasions, above all to occasions of carnal sins, will be saved with difficulty.

Since these counsels about the flight of dangerous occasions is so important, it is not sufficient if the preacher speaks about it once to his people, or even devotes an entire sermon to it, as some do, and do well; but as these occasions are numerous, and men are careless about avoiding them, the world becoming thereby so corrupt, we must come back to this point and insist upon it several times during the mission. On this depends the salvation of those persons who, although they come to the mission, yet are not present at the sermon on the flight from dangerous occasions.

I add another remark, which it would be well to make all understand, and especially confessors. When a penitent has never avoided the occasion in which he has been accustomed to sin, it will be necessary for him to make a general confession, because one should judge that all the confessions that he has made in this state are null. One should also presume the same thing in the case of those who, although they have always confessed their sins, yet never gave any sign of amendment, and fell back a little while after into sin; only a general confession can induce these people to amend their lives.

V. THE RUIN OF SOULS WHO THROUGH SHAME OMIT TO CONFESS THEIR SINS

In the missions we should moreover strongly and often inculcate the necessity of overcoming the shame that one feels in confessing one's sins. Those who are experienced missionaries know that this cursed shame has been the cause of the loss of many souls. It follows that as the principal fruit of the missions consists in the remedy that they apply to this evil, they are not only useful but even necessary for country places; for as there is only a small number of confessors, who are very often the relatives or friends of their penitents, false shame has more force in making the people conceal sins in confession.

It is a pity to see how many souls the devil gains by this means, especially in matters concerning impure sins; for he makes them lose shame at the moment of committing them, and gives this shame back to them when there is question of mentioning them in confession. St. Antonine, speaking of this matter, relates that a holy hermit, seeing one day the devil in the church going among those that wished to confess, asked him what he was doing there; the evil spirit answered: "To induce these people to commit sin. I have taken shame from them; now I return it to them in order that they may not confess it." St. John Chrysostom also says: "God has given shame to the commission of sin, and confidence to the confession of it. The devil inverts this: he inspires him who sins with confidence, and him who confesses with shame.[13773]

Alas! Christian soul, you have sinned; if you do not confess your sins you will certainly be damned. Why then do you not confess your sin? You answer: I am ashamed.—Hence rather than overcome this shame you wish to be condemned for all eternity to the fire of hell? It is a shame to offend so good a God who has created us; it is not a shame to confess to have offended him. But since you do not wish to manifest your sin, refrain at least from going to confession. To the sin that you have committed do you wish to add the sacrilege of a bad confession? Do you know what you are doing when you commit a sacrilege? For the sins on account of which you have deserved hell there is no other remedy than the blood of Jesus Christ, who will purify you if you confess it well; but by concealing your sin, you even tread under foot the blood of Jesus Christ.

The present mission is for you a good occasion for making your confession to a priest who does not know you, whom afterwards you will see no more, and who will no more see you; if you do not wish to profit by this occasion, God will perhaps not grant it to you again, and you will be damned. Remember that if you do not confess now, the devil will gain absolute sway over you, and then perhaps God will abandon you, and there will be no more hope for you. Courage, then! go to confession immediately.

What do you fear? Ah! here are no doubt the pretexts that the devil will suggest to you:

1. What will my confessor say when he hears that I have fallen in such a way?—Well! he will say that you have been weak, as happens to so many others who live in this world; he will say that you did wrong to sin, but that you afterwards performed a noble deed in overcoming shame to confess your sins.

2. At least he will not fail to give me a scolding.—Oh no, why should he scold you? Know that confessors cannot have greater consolation than when they hear a person accusing himself of a sin that he has committed; for then he can securely absolve him and thus deliver him from hell.

3. I have not enough confidence to manifest this sin to my spiritual Father.—Well! go to confession to a nother priest of the place or to a stranger.—But if my confessor hears that I have gone to confession to another, he will be offended, and will no more hear my confession.—And you, in order not to displease your confessor wish to commit a sacrilege and to damn your soul? If you go to hell, will your confessor be able to talk you out of it?

4. Who knows whether the confessor will not make known my sin to others?—What folly to think that a confessor could wish to commit so great a crime as to break the seal of confession by manifesting your sin to others! To how many confessors are you to declare your sin? It suffices that you tell it once to one priest only, who hears your sin as he hears a thousand others in other confessions. But why have you so many unreasonable fears, and have not the fear of damning yourself by not confessing your sin? This should deprive you of all consolation and all peace; for, if you do not confess your sin, there will remain in your conscience a viper that will gnaw your heart during your whole life in this world, and after death, during all eternity in hell.

Well now, let us take courage, and make known to the confessor the recesses of your conscience; immediately after confession you will find the peace that you have lost, and you will ever thank God for having given you the strength to overcome the devil. Hasten, therefore, to be delivered from this viper that causes you so much pain, and become reconciled with God. Hear what I say: It is sufficient for you to say to the confessor: My Father, I have a scruple about my past life; but I am ashamed to mention it.—Speak thus, and then it will be the confessor's duty to deliver you from the serpent that torments you as if you were one of the damned, although you are not yet in hell.

I have wished to mention here in a practical manner those pretexts which induce so many poor souls to conceal their sins and are the cause of their damnation. As this cursed shame is everywhere prevalent, especially among women, we must make them understand the answers given above to the false pretexts which the devil puts before them in order to make them conceal their sins.

It is true, I am well aware that, in the missions, usually a special sermon is preached to move the hearers not to hide any sin through shame; but I say that this point is so important that even an entire sermon is not sufficient: first, because it may happen that souls needing it most are not present; secondly, because for persons who have concealed their sins for a long time, it is not enough to hear the remedy spoken of but once; the preacher should often insist upon this matter, which I regard as the most important that one has to treat in the missions; for even in the missions many persons, although they have been present at the sermons, have continued to hide their sins. This is particularly necessary when one preaches in conservatories in which many girls and women are living together. As the occasions of sin are more frequent there, sins are also more frequent; and for persons that live in these establishments it is more difficult to have a confessor to whom they would confess with less repugnance; hence we should oftener speak to them about false shame, which causes them to conceal sins in confession, and it is very useful to make a deep impression upon their minds by relating to them melancholy examples.

In all the missions given by our Congregation it is customary for him who explains the catechism to relate every day one of the terrible examples of persons damned for having concealed sins in confession. Many of these examples are found in good authors, and I have given some of them in my treatise INSTRUCTIONS TO THE PEOPLE ON THE COMMANDMENTS. I think the preacher would do well to put to a profitable use similar examples. They may be of benefit not only to him who preaches the sermon, but also to him who gives the instruction or meditation, and even to him who gives the exercises to priests; for among them are often found parish priests, preachers of Lenten sermons, and other ecclesiastics who are anxious to preach in a profitable manner.

PIOUS ACTS

TO BE MADE IN THE COMMON VISIT TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT AND TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN

IN THE VISIT WHICH THE PEOPLE ARE TO MAKE THE PRIEST SHOULD READ THESE ACTS IN A LOUD VOICE AND WITH PAUSES, AND THE PEOPLE SHOULD REPEAT THEM AFTER HIM

VISIT TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

O my soul! revive thy faith and thy confidence: thou art in the presence of the infinite majesty of thy God, who for the love of thee descended one day from heaven to the earth, became man, and wished to die on the cross to save thee, and who now remains here in the Blessed Sacrament to hear thee, and to grant thee the graces that thou askest of him; speak to him, then, and say:

ACT OF FAITH AND OF ADORATION

My God, because Thou art infallible truth, and hast revealed what we should believe, I believe all that Thou teachest me to believe. I believe that Thou art the Creator and Lord of heaven and earth, and that in eternity Thou rewardest the just in paradise and punishest the wicked in hell. I believe that Thou art only one God in essence and three in Persons, the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost. I believe, O eternal Son of God! that, becoming incarnate and being made man in the womb of Mary, Thou was crucified for our salvation, and that now Thou remainest in the Blessed Sacrament to nourish us with Thy flesh in holy Communion, and to hear our prayers on Thy altars when we come to visit Thee. Prostrate, therefore, at Thy feet, I, a miserable sinner, unworthy to appear before Thee, and worthy only of being in hell, as I have so often deserved, I adore Thee, O infinite Majesty, by uniting myself to the adorations that are rendered to Thee by all the angels and all the saints, with the Blessed Virgin Mary.

ACT OF HOPE

My dear Redeemer, trusting in Thy promises, because Thou art faithful, powerful, and merciful, I hope that Thou wilt grant me through the merits of Thy Passion the pardon of my sins, perseverance in Thy grace till death, and finally the happiness of going to see and love Thee eternally in paradise.

ACT OF LOVE

My dear Lord and my God, because Thou art an infinite good, worthy of an infinite love, I love Thee with my whole heart above all things, and I would wish to see Thee loved by all men of this world as much as Thou deservest to be. I rejoice that Thou art and wilt always be infinitely happy.

ACT OF CONTRITION AND OF A FIRM PURPOSE

My dearly beloved Redeemer, if I had abandoned all for Thee by spending my whole life in the desert, and if afterwards I had died by the violence of the torments endured for Thy love, it would certainly be nothing in comparison with the cruel death that Thou my God hast wished to suffer for me. But how have I treated Thee in the past? I have repaid Thee with ingratitude. Instead of loving Thee, how many times have I offended Thee by turning my back upon Thee, by despising Thy grace and Thy love! I repent of this, O my Jesus! I regret with my whole heart of having offended Thee—Thou who art infinite goodness. Ah! would that I had died rather than have ever displeased Thee! I hate and I detest more than every evil all the injury that I have heaped upon Thee. O Lord, my God! I promise Thee, and I am resolved for the future to die rather than offend Thee again; I also make the resolution to receive the sacraments during my life and at my death. The time that remains to me to live, whether it be short or long, I will spend entirely in loving Thee, O infinite Majesty, my only good, more amiable than every other good! But of what use will be all these promises that I have made to Thee, if Thou dost not help me, O God of my soul! Without Thy help I should betray Thee again, and I should do worse than before. This is, then, the grace that I ask of Thee, and that I hope through the merits of Thy Passion: give me holy perseverance, and do not permit it to happen that I should ever again be separated from Thee; let me die rather than see myself again incur Thy displeasure.

ACT OF THANKSGIVING

My Jesus, I thank Thee for all the graces that Thou hast conferred upon me: for having created me, for having redeemed me by Thy blood, for having made me a Christian by the sacrament of baptism, and for having borne with me so long a time, when I was in disgrace with Thee. How unhappy should I be had I died in this state! I should now be in hell, I should be lost there forever, O my God! and I could no longer love Thee. I thank Thee, therefore, for having waited for me with so much patience, and for having pardoned me, as I trust that Thou hast done, with so much mercy. I especially thank Thee for having left Thyself for us in the Blessed Sacrament, for having so many times given Thyself entirely to me in Holy Communion by making Thyself our food, and for having at this moment deigned to admit me to Thy presence. I thank Thee for all these benefits, and I am confident that I will render Thee more perfect thanksgiving during all eternity in paradise, where I hope to sing Thy praises forever.

OFFERING

My Jesus, through love of me Thou didst wish to die in torments and insults on an infamous gibbet; what can I render Thee in return for so much goodness: I have only myself to offer Thee; I therefore, O Lord, my God, offer and consecrate myself entirely to Thee; I give Thee my soul, my body, my will, by submitting myself in all things and forever to Thy holy will; do with me as Thou willest. Make that I shall always love Thee in this life and in the next, and then dispose of me and of all that I am as Thou wishest. Tell me what Thou wishest of me; I am ready to do all with the help of Thy grace.

PRAYER

O Lord! I recommend to Thee the Sovereign Pontiff, all the Prelates, and all the priests: fill them with Thy spirit, in order that they may sanctify the whole world. I recommend to Thee unbelievers, heretics, and all sinners: give them the light and the strength that they need, in order to give up sin and to study to love only Thee, who art the sovereign good. I recommend to Thee all the dying, all my relatives, my benefactors, and my friends; and I recommend to Thee also, in a special manner, my enemies; for Thou hast given me the command to do so: make them happy, and make them saints. I recommend to Thee the holy souls in purgatory: alleviate their sufferings, and abridge the time of their exile, in order that they may soon go to enjoy Thy presence in heaven.

Finally, in regard to myself, I pray to Thee, O my Jesus, whom I adore on this altar in the Blessed Sacrament! from the height of this throne of love, grant me by Thy merits a great sorrow for my sins, and the pardon of all the offences that I have committed against Thee. Give me holy humility and meekness, in order that I may bear with patience all kinds of contempt and all persecutions. Give me the grace to mortify myself by abstaining from all that is not pleasing to Thee. Give me perfect resignation to Thy holy will, so that I may embrace with peace all the crosses that come to me from Thy hand. Give me sufficient light to know Thy holy wishes, and sufficient strength to fulfil them. Give me great confidence in Thy holy Passion and in the protection of Mary, Thy Mother. Give me the sovereign gift of Thy love, with a great desire of loving and pleasing Thee, so that in future I may always say to Thee what I now say: My God, it is Thou only whom I wish, and nothing more. Give me perseverance in Thy love till death, so that I may never lose Thy holy grace. Above all, do I ask Thee to help me always to ask of Thee this holy perseverance, by recommending myself always to Thee and to Thy holy Mother, especially when I am tempted to offend Thee; make me always repeat then: Jesus and Mary, help me.—Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus, Thy Son, grant me all these graces.

SPIRITUAL COMMUNION

My Jesus, I love Thee with my whole heart, and I desire to be always united with Thee. Since I cannot now receive Thee sacramentally, I receive Thee spiritually. Come, then, into my heart; I embrace Thee, and unite myself wholly to Thee, and I beg Thee not to permit me to be ever separated from Thee.

After this we may recite the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, and then the following hymn should be sung:

Pange, lingua, gloriosi Corporis mysterium,
Sanguinisque pretiosi
Quem in mundi pretium,
Fructus ventris generosi,
Rex effudit gentium.
Tantum ergo Sacramentum Veneremur cernui;
Et antiquum documentum Novo cedat ritui;
Praestet fides supplementum Sensuum defectui.
V. Panem de coelo praestitisti eis.
R. Omne delectamentum in se habentem.

OREMUS

Deus, qui nobis, sub Sacramento mirabili, passionis tuae memoriam reliquisti: tribue, quaesumus, ita nos Corporis et Sanguinis tui sacra mysteria venerari, ut redemptionis tuae fructum in nobis jugiter sentiamus. Qui vivis et regnas in saecula saeculorum. Amen.

VISIT TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN

O great Queen of heaven, Most Holy and Immaculate Virgin Mary! I, a miserable sinner, salute and honor thee as the Mother of my God. Thou art among all creatures the most beautiful, the most holy, the most amiable, and the best beloved of the Lord. My Sovereign, I love thee above all things after God; I wish to see thee loved by every one. I exceedingly rejoice at thy greatness, and I thank the Lord for having so much glorified thee. I also thank thee, who art my Mother, for all the graces that thou hast obtained for me from God in the course of my whole life. I offer myself to thee to be thy perpetual servant, and I place myself under thy protection, I place in thee all my hopes. Accept me, O my Queen! and do not reject me as I deserve to be rejected. I know that thou art so powerful with God that he grants thee everything for which thou dost ask him. O Mother of mercy! O Refuge of Sinners! I place my soul into thy hands; pray, have pity on me: recommend me to thy divine Son, and obtain for me the pardon of all my sins, the love for God, and holy perseverance in his grace till death. Above all, I beg thee to obtain for me the grace of always recommending myself to thee, especially when I am tempted to offend God. Do not cease to help me during my life and my death. My tender Mother, I confide in thee; it is thou that is to save me through the merits of Jesus, thy Son, and through thy intercession. Amen. So I hope; so may it be.

PRAYER OF ST. BONAVENTURE

O Jesus, who for my sake didst not spare Thyself in anything! impress upon me Thy Passion, in order that, on whatever side I may turn, I may look upon Thy wounds, and may find rest only in Thee and in meditating on Thy sufferings. Amen.

METHOD OF GIVING MISSIONS.[13774]

1. THE BEGINNING OF THE MISSION

IN the first place, it must be remarked that no one should go on a mission without having been sent by the Superiors; and the latter should never send missionaries, if they have not been asked for by the bishop or by the people of a place, with the consent of the bishop, of whom a request should be made for permission in writing and for the necessary powers. The subjects may not only show themselves disposed to give the mission, but may also modestly and resignedly manifest a desire to do so.

Then, when they are on the point of setting out, they should inform the bishop, the arch-priest, or the parish priest of the time when they will arrive at the place where the mission is to be given, in order that the people may receive notice by the placards that are to be posted in conspicuous places; so also, in order that on their arrival the bells may be rung as on a festival, and the clergy may come to receive them, at the entrance of the city or village, with the cross which is afterwards handed to the Superior. The giving of this notice will also be necessary in order that the house, the beds, and the things necessary for the kitchen may be prepared or provided for.

Before their departure they shall recite in common, in the church, the Itinerarium Clericorum; then, after having received the blessing from the Superior, who at this time will appoint him whom they should obey in his stead, they shall set out. On the journey they should select a suitable time for making their exercises of piety.

On their arrival at the place of their destination, the clergy having come to meet them, as has been said above, the Superior shall take the cross, and they shall go in procession to the church while reciting in a loud voice the Benedictus. Arrived at the church, they shall visit, before all, the Blessed Sacrament, then the altar of the Blessed Virgin, and the altars of the holy patrons and titular saints, and pray to them most fervently that they may assist them in this great undertaking. They shall specially offer their homage to the guardian angels of the place, of the church, and of individuals, and implore their help for the sanctification of those souls confided to their care.

When the fatigue of the journey does not prevent them, and the hour on a festival is suitable, especially if the number of the people in the church is sufficiently large, they may on that very day begin the mission by preaching the first sermon, which should be preceded by the recitation of one of the three parts of the Rosary. But as this rarely happens, a short address should usually be given to the people assembled, by informing them of the end that the missionaries propose to themselves in coming to that place. They should be told that the missionaries bring with them a heart filled with charity towards all the people; that they come to work for the salvation of their souls by placing before their eyes the eternal truths—truths of which they have neglected to think; by instructing them in the things necessary to save their souls, and by hearing their confessions with all the charity and patience that their state requires. Then without making an act of contrition, the people shall be dismissed, after they have been informed of the time when the mission is to begin on the following day.

It should, however, be understood that, in regard to the beginning of the missions, one should not be positively restricted to an inviolable rule; the circumstances of the places, persons, etc., should be considered, and one should begin the missions in a most suitable manner, either by a discourse on the spot and making briefly an act of contrition, or by a discourse in the church, after having walked through the place, or by a regular sermon with or without an act of contrition.

When the mission does not begin on the day of arrival, the evening exhortation[13775] should not be omitted, and it should continue during three or four evenings, according to the necessities of the place. The first exhortations given as an invitation should be more tender, expressing compassion for souls; the others shall be strong. They shall not be long, and should last a half or a quarter of an hour. They should not be given every evening in the same place; nor shall they be given immediately near suspected places, but where they can be heard by a large number. To give these exhortations the missionaries should always leave the church with the cross, burning candles, and the little bell, while singing the Litany of the Blessed Virgin. Arrived at the place where a stop is to be made, the little bell should be rung, and there shall be said with a loud voice. Praised be the Most Blessed Sacrament and the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin! Then, after having announced to the people that the mission has begun or is to begin the day after, the exhortation should be given. When it is finished, the people, who are accustomed to follow, should be conducted to the church or at the entrance, where an act of contrition is made, and then they may be dismissed with a blessing with the crucifix. The women should be notified not to follow; for after having heard the exhortation, they should go home. The missionaries should attach great importance to these exhortations, which usually produce very great fruit in the holy missions; they should not on any account be omitted; they should not be improvised; and before going forth to give them, one shall take care to prepare for them by fervent prayers.

If the day after the arrival is a festival, and the mission has not been begun by the first sermon, confessions should not be heard in the morning of this festival, but an impassioned sermon should be delivered on the efficacy of the holy mission in securing the eternal salvation of Christians, or on the miserable state in which Christianity is found, or on the dangers to which those that have sinned have exposed themselves, etc.—This sermon should not be concluded by an act of contrition, but by an exhortation to profit by the grace that our Lord has sent in this mission, with an explanation of the exercises that are performed in the course of it; and an invitation that all should attend all these exercises, especially the procession which is to leave the church after dinner. The clergy should specially be invited to come to this procession, clad in long cassocks without surplice.

At twenty-one o'clock,[13776] when all the priests have assembled in the church, the procession with the cross should start from the church and pass through the city or village while singing the Litany of the Blessed Virgin; the place most populated having been reached, a stop should be made, and a Father from an elevation shall deliver a short discourse to the people, to induce them to profit by this occasion to change their lives; but no act of contrition need be added. Then all should re-enter the church. During the procession the Fathers who take part in it may say a few words of exhortation wherever they meet people congregated, by inviting all of them to come to the sermon. The church being reached, one of the three parts of the Rosary with its mysteries should be recited (this should be done every day before the sermon), and then the Father shall ascend the pulpit to preach, but without surplice and without stole, and he shall conclude it with a fervent act of contrition drawn from a motive suggested by the sermon.

If the exercises of the mission has not been announced in the morning, as has been said above, the people should be informed of this after the first evening sermon; they should be exhorted to frequent all these exercises with all possible fervor, the hour for each exercise being mentioned to them. The ecclesiastics, the magistrates, the principal men, should be requested to be the first to be present for the sake of good example; and even when it is possible, two Fathers shall go, in the name of all, to visit and invite the chief man of the place, the governor, or any other distinguished person, to obtain their assistance and their favor; and if the mission is given in the city, they should send a similar invitation to the Chapter when it has assembled before or after Vespers; and its assistance and support should also be asked.

2. VARIOUS EXERCISES

The exercises should take place punctually at the time fixed, namely, the meditation at an early hour in the morning; Christian doctrine or catechism, early after dinner; the exercises for priests in a retired place, after Vespers; and the evening sermon at an hour convenient for the close of the day; however, if the people cannot assemble so soon, as frequently happens in winter where there are workingmen, the sermon may be given later, unless the will of the bishop, or some other reasonable cause, is opposed to such an arrangement.

I. In the morning, as soon as a sufficient number of people have assembled, one of the three parts of the Rosary is recited, unless this would interfere with the Masses, and much more, with hearing confessions. Then a Father shall enter the pulpit and salute the people, saying: Praised be the Most Blessed Sacrament and the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary! After this he shall say the Litany of the Blessed Virgin. Then he shall give, remaining on his knees, a short familiar MEDITATION,[13777] preceded by the Christian Acts. This meditation shall be made on a subject pertaining to the purgative way; but care should be taken not to take the subject that is to be treated in the evening sermon, or at least, the same points. The Father shall conclude by making acts of contrition, without however taking the crucifix. This exercise, including all the acts, should not last more than three quarters of an hour.

II. During the day, the exercise of the CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE, or CATECHISM,[13778] shall take place. It shall be intrusted by the Superior to a subject whom he shall judge to be the most capable; and this exercise should be regarded as one of the most precious and most important of the holy mission.

An instruction shall be given on the precepts of the Decalogue and on the manner of confessing, and shall be given at a time most convenient for the people. If the people can come in the morning at the first hour, the instruction is to be given first, and then the meditation; in case the number of missionaries is insufficient, one may even omit the meditation, but never the instruction; however, when only the instruction is given, one should make moral reflections, and finish with acts of contrition, etc.; and in smaller and poorer places only an instruction made in this manner will do good.

Afterwards, the Prefect of the church shall assemble the children to instruct them on confession and Communion.[13779]

I. Before the sermon a Father shall say the ROSARY[13780] of the Blessed Virgin, and begin by a short introduction or a short example, in order to dispose the people to recite it with devotion; he shall announce the mysteries with some short consideration, having always in view to make the people recite one of the three parts of the Rosary; for the principal end for which this exercise has been introduced is to obtain from the Blessed Virgin that she should deign to co-operate in the success of the mission. However, when the instruction takes place after dinner, it will be better to recite the Rosary before the instruction, in order to have more people to recite it; then, between the instruction and the sermon, a hymn shall be sung, but these hymns should never be sung in the pulpit.

II. Then the principal or great sermon[13781] is to be given at the most convenient hour, as has been said, and without surplice or stole; it should last at most an hour and a half, inclusively of all the acts that are to be performed at the end with the crucifix and the torches. The preacher should be mindful not to finish the sermon without urging the people to invoke the Blessed Virgin; and for this purpose a statue of Mary should be exposed.

In regard to the ceremonies, it is forbidden to letter maledictions, to use the chain or any other instrument to draw blood, to burn one's self with the torch, and the like. But the Superior may sometimes permit the use of the rope and of the skull, when this is done with zeal, prudence, and discretion.

It has been established by the General Chapter, that in the missions and spiritual exercises a sermon on the Blessed Virgin should always be preached, this being most profitable, as experience proves. The Fathers should endeavor, in all their sermons, always to make mention of the love for Jesus Christ and of recourse to the Blessed Virgin; since all of us, if we wish to save our souls, should truly love Jesus Christ, and often have recourse to the divine Mother.[13782]

The Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament shall take place only on the day of the blessing, as is seen farther on.

I. After the evening sermon the exercise of the DISCIPLINE[13783] shall be performed for the men, four or five times during the mission; and on the last evening the exercise of trailing the tongue; but when the exercise of the discipline takes place, the evening exhortations shall cease.

As for the discipline, a Father shall, first, give a short exhortation drawn from the sermon, and then, in the middle of the discipline, at some verse of the Miserere, he shall also say a few words of compunction. The discipline shall last only during this Miserere; then one of the people should be made to say three "Hail Marys" in honor of the Immaculate Conception, with the face on the ground, and finish by a penitential hymn.

On the two or three last evenings, after the discipline, an EXHORTATION OF PEACE[13784] should be given, and those that come to be reconciled shall embrace each other before the crucifix; but before calling the enemy, a Father shall secretly listen to the one that presents himself; he should gather information about the cause of the enmity, and shall see whether he that has come is the offended party who wishes to pardon, whether the enmity is not secret, or whether the reconciliation might not have some other inconveniences.

I. The last day before the exercise of a devout life,[13785] the sermon of the BLESSING[13786] shall be preached after dinner, in the following manner:

At first the recitation of the Rosary shall be begun; and there will be no instruction; in the middle of the Rosary the procession of the Blessed Sacrament will take place, which a Father shall carry only outside of the door of the church, when he shall give three blessings towards the fields, the first blessing being given in the middle, and the other two at the right and the left; then the procession returns, and the Blessed Sacrament is exposed on the altar; and if the preacher has not yet arrived, the Rosary should be continued. The preacher having ascended the pulpit, on this day, with surplice and stole, the Blessed Sacrament should be veiled; then follows the sermon, with the benediction with the crucifix. Afterwards five "Our Fathers" and five "Hail Marys" are recited to gain the indulgence of the mission just finished, and the preacher shall intone the Te Deum. The priest at the altar shall sing the prayer Deus cujus misercordioe. After this the Pange lingua and the Tantum ergo, etc., should be sung; and before the blessing, the preacher shall address from the altar another exhortation to the people, by having them promise to come to the exercises of the devout life.

VII. On the morning of this same day there shall be a GENERAL COMMUNION of grown persons; for the Communion of children of fifteen years of age and over should be made separately on another day, either before or after, as may appear best.

Before the Communion of grown persons, the preacher or another Father shall ascend the pulpit, placed in the middle of the church, and as a preparation for Communion, shall make with the crucifix the acts of faith, humility, love, and contrition; then he shall have them make peace; after that he shall make the act of desire, and then Communion shall be given; he shall conclude with thanksgiving.

At the Communion of children, peace shall not be made, but hymns in honor of the Blessed Sacrament are to be sung as preparation and thanksgiving. After the thanksgiving, they shall go in procession through the city or village, singing the Litany of the Blessed Virgin; on their return to the church, some instruction adapted to their age should be given, and after the blessing with the crucifix they shall return home.

VIII. The last three days, or at least, in certain places, the last two, the EXERCISES OF THE DEVOUT LIFE[13787] are to be given, and should never be omitted, according to a decree of the Chapter; one should try to introduce them permanently. In the afternoon, after having recited the little chaplet of the Sorrows of Mary, or of the Infant Jesus, and the Rosary if time permits, the preacher himself shall give from the pulpit a half-hour's instruction on mental prayer, on the preparation for Communion and thanksgiving after it, and on the rule of life that is to be followed for self-sanctification. Then, on his knees and without a surplice, he shall give a meditation on the Passion of Jesus Christ and on the Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin, whose statue should be draped in mourning. He shall conclude by acts of faith, hope, charity, contrition firm purpose, with the protestation of wishing to die fortified with the sacraments, and by putting into the act of contrition some pious hymn on the Passion of Jesus Christ; and he will dismiss the people with the blessing with the crucifix.

IX. One should not fail to make the mission last at least ten or twelve days in small places.

Moreover, it must be observed that if there should be some little hamlet away from the place of mission, the Superior may send some Fathers there to preach and to hear confessions as long as he shall judge this to be necessary.

It will be the duty of the Prefect of the church (1) to read the prayers; (2) to give notice to the Fathers of the time in which they may say Mass in succession, so that they may finish before the hour of going to the house; (3) to notify the Fathers of the time when the exercises are to take place; (4) after having been told by the Superior, to give the sign when the Fathers should retire; (5) to procure what is needful for the church; (6) to give instructions in catechism, to give the colloquies, exhortations, to say the Rosary, etc.

3. RULES OF CONDUCT FOR THE FATHERS ON MISSIONS

I. No one shall go on missions by himself; in little missions there should be at least two, or at least, in case of necessity, the Father should be accompanied by a lay-brother or a strange priest.[13788] They shall always go united by that charity qua major esse non potest, remembering that it is a special commandment given by his divine Majesty to the apostles, and through the apostles to all the missionaries who should follow them: Hoc est praeceptum meum, ut diligatis invicem, sicut dilexi vos. Mandatum novum de vobis, ut diligatis invicem. Pater sancte serva eos, . . . ut sint unum, sicut et nos.[13789] They should also remember the qualities of charity, enumerated by the Apostle: Charitas patiens est, benigna est; charitas non cemulatur, non agit perperam, non inflatur, etc.[13790]—However, when they must go to give invitations, or do anything that regards the service of God, and have not to spend the night elsewhere, they may be accompanied by some priest or cleric, if their own companions are too few.

II. They shall always travel to the missions on foot, as was done by his divine Majesty, and as was done by the holy apostles, unless strict necessity obliges them to use an ordinary and plain conveyance; they shall not travel on horseback without necessity. No entreaties whatsoever should induce them to accept any other convenience for travelling, unless they must make the journey by water.

Outside of the missions, if a carriage is offered them, they may use it, provided they need not change their dress; the same thing holds good if any person of distinction should invite a Father to ride in his carriage.

I. The place where the mission is to be given having been reached, the time for the exercises should be arranged, and the arrangement should be adhered to as much as possible. There shall be seven hours of sleep in winter, and in spring six and a half hours, with an hour of rest after dinner. Missions should not be given in summer.

The Fathers during the mission should regularly retire from the church about noon, and they should go to bed in the evening about two hours before midnight.

The Superior shall at the same time appoint the Fathers who have to take charge of the church, of the reconciliations, and of the domestic arrangements.

I. In the church the Fathers shall keep the confessionals to which they have been assigned.

II. In the place where the mission is given they should take care always to avoid familiarity and useless conversation with externs.

III. At the house they shall make a half-hour's meditation twice a day, and at least once when they have not sufficient time.

IV. At table silence should be kept. They shall read the lives of the saints during dinner, and a book on the Blessed Virgin at least during part of the supper; but on days of general Communion, and when they are tired from hearing confessions or from some other cause, the reading should continue only a little while.

A half-hour's recreation will be sufficient as well after dinner as after supper.

I. In regard to the expenses of the mission, nothing should ever be asked unless it be a house, beds, furniture, and some kitchen utensils.[13791] If afterwards some one offers them food or wine, or even all that is needed for their meals, they shall receive all with thanks; but they must not fail to refuse whatever is superfluous, and all delicacies. They should usually have only two portions, namely, soup and boiled meat, there being added at most some other frugal portion, as cheese and fruit; they shall touch nothing else, and shall plead their Rule in excuse; for in this manner others will be edified, expense and even scandal will be avoided.

It shall never be permitted to accept money, even for Masses, nor delicacies, as fowl, birds, dainties, sweetmeats, fine confectionery, and the like; nor, finally, presents to be carried away, of whatever kind they may be.

Here is what should be the ordinary food in the missions: at dinner, soup, boiled meat, cheese and fruit; at supper, salad and another portion, cheese and fruit when they can be had: otherwise, one must arrange things as well as one can; but one should always be careful to avoid luxury, delicacy, and what is superfluous in the quantity of food.

I. In the missions or other exercises of devotion for the people, when the bishop asks for them or prescribes them, the spiritual exercises shall be given to the religious or nuns, and one may be extraordinary confessor; but outside of these occasions, such a thing is forbidden, except for the nuns of the Most Holy Saviour when they show a great veneration for these exercises.

2. PERSEVERANCE IN CONVERSION

In the last sermons of the mission we recommend perseverance to the people. We speak to them chiefly of the great danger to which those expose themselves who fall back into sin after the mission; and therefore we try to impress upon the memory of the faithful the means to be employed to avoid a relapse into sin, namely, in the first place, the avoiding of the occasions, of bad company, and of human respect; in the second place, the frequentation of the sacraments and prayer, or recourse to God in temptations, being careful to ask him every day for the grace of holy perseverance.

We add the sermon on the Blessed Virgin, which we recommend in such a way that it should never be omitted; for it produces greater fruit than all the rest. I know by experience that a certain sinner, who had been insensible to all other sermons, was converted by the sermon on the Blessed Virgin. We should not regard this sermon as an extraordinary thing on missions: Blessed Leonard of Port Maurice, in all his missions, never omitted the sermon on the Blessed Virgin; the same thing must be said of Father Segneri, Junior. This is the practice in our Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, and I know that other missionaries have followed the same custom. It is certain that if a soul acquires a true devotion to the Mother of God, and continues to recommend itself often to her intercession, this great Queen will obtain for it the grace of persevering in virtue; for she is called the Mother of Perseverance.

The sermon on prayer should also never be omitted, since it is of the highest importance; for if those that have followed the mission do not continue to recommend themselves to God, it is certain that they will not persevere. When there is no time to treat this sermon separately, the preacher, at least in the other sermons that he preaches in the mission or spiritual exercises, should not omit frequently to exhort his hearers always to recommend themselves to Jesus and to Mary, since prayer, according to the teaching of St. Augustine, is the only means of obtaining God's grace, and especially holy perseverance.

The following are the sermons that refer to perseverance:

The abuse of divine mercy, sermon XLI.
The miserable state of relapsing sinners, S. XXI.
The avoiding of the occasions of sin, S. XXII.
The avoiding of bad company, S. XLII.
Human respect, S. XXVII.
Obedience to the confessor, S. XXV.
Holy Communion, S. XXXI.
The efficacy and necessity of prayer, S. XXIX.
Confidence with which we should recommend ourselves to the Mother of God, S. VII.

Moreover, before preaching the last sermon, several Congregations of Missionaries, such as the Pious Workers, the priests of the Purity of Mary, and our Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, are accustomed, on two or three days, to give, instead of a sermon, a meditation on the Passion of Jesus Christ; this exercise is very useful for the perseverance of the faithful who have made the mission. He that leaves sin only through fear of chastisement, after the mission is finished loses sight of what has frightened him, and easily relapses into his old sins; but he that is attached to God through love, easily perseveres in a good life. Hence, on these two or three days, the preacher of the mission will give a half-hour's instruction on mental prayer by teaching the people the manner of easily making it; he shall also teach them the manner of making preparation and thanksgiving for Communion. Then he shall make the meditation by considering the mysteries of the Passion, and by interspersing it with pious affections, acts of contrition and of love, and holy resolutions.—The missionaries shall recommend to the parish priest to have meditation made every day in common for the people.

Instructions for the People

ST. ALPHONSUS published these INSTRUCTIONS in Italian in the course of the year 1767, during his episcopate. In the following year he published the same in Latin, with this title: Institutio catechistica ad populum in praecepta Decalogi et Sacramenta. The literal translation of the title of the Italian edition is as follows: "Instructions for the people on the precepts of the Decalogue, in order that they may be better observed, and on the sacraments, in order that they may be better received, for the use of parish priests and of missionaries and of all ecclesiastics that are employed in teaching Christian doctrine."

We read in the Life of the holy author: "This work forms, it is true, only a small volume, but its usefulness is very great; it was also favorably received especially by the parish priests. The royal examiner speaks of it thus: 'Whether one considers the matter of the thoughts of his treatise, or the manner in which they are expressed, every one that examines it with attention must see that it is worthy of its author's name, that is to say, of a learned man full of zeal for God's honor and the salvation of souls.'

"In this work the holy prelate again attacks those rigorous minds who, in affecting great purity of doctrine, and in pretending to bring back the faithful to the favor of the Christianity of primitive ages, oppress souls by an insupportable yoke, with which Jesus Christ never loaded them. 'This is not the doctrine of the Church,' he said, 'for she glories in being a mother, and not a cruel step-mother. Jansenius and his followers have invented this severity; I would ask if the number of souls whom they have caused to fall into hell through an erring conscience does not exceed the number of those whom they have led to paradise. Besides, it is clear that the sentiments which they have adopted are not those of the holy bishops whom we honor on our altars, nor of those saintly laborers who have sacrificed their blood and their life for the salvation of but one soul. We have not yet seen a Jansenist who has lost an hour's sleep to insure the salvation of a soul.' " (Tannoia and Villecourt, I. iii. ch. 38.)

He who spoke thus was himself one of those evangelical laborers so denoted to the salvation of souls, and one of those bishops of high perfection whom the Church honors on her altars. The wise teachings that he gives us have produced and do not cease to produce in the whole Church wonderful fruits of salvation.—Ed.

HINTS TO THE CATECHIST IN ORDER TO MAKE HIS INSTRUCTIONS MORE PROFITABLE.[13793]

I. THE catechetical instruction to the people consists of three parts: 1. The INTRODUCTION; 2. The EXPOSITION of the mystery, sacrament, or precept to be spoken of; and, 3. The MORAL, with the means and remedies to be employed against the different vices.

1. INTRODUCTION

The INTRODUCTION must consist in a statement of the subject-matter of the instruction, and of the different points into which the subject is divided. If the matter be connected with that of the preceding instruction, the catechist may begin by briefly repeating the points explained in that instruction; but if the matter be different, he may begin by showing the importance of the subject of which he is about to speak.

2. THE EXPOSITION

With regard to the EXPOSITION of the mystery, sacrament, or precept, the catechist must attend to several things.

I. He must prove the mystery, sacrament, or precept to be explained by authorities, by reasons, by similes, and authentic facts. I say authorities, but let them be few, and be sparing of Latin quotations, as the illiterate, of whom the audience at catechism generally consist, understand little or no Latin. Scholastic questions are not suited to the pulpit, and must therefore be altogether avoided, but particularly before the uninstructed, who are easily disturbed by such questions, and may often draw from them erroneous conclusions.

II. Care must be taken not to propound doctrines which may lead the hearers to a pernicious looseness of conscience. It is one thing to speak in the confessional, where all the circumstances of the case are weighed, and you have to deal with a particular person, and another to speak in the pulpit, where a proposition may be misunderstood by those who are inclined to laxity, and may lead them to loose and improbable conclusions. However, it is necessary to correct the erroneous consciences of some, who believe there is sin where there is none. For example: Some uninstructed persons imagine that their judgments and suspicions are rash even when they have sufficient foundation to judge and suspect. It is necessary to teach them that such judgments or suspicions are neither rash nor sinful, and therefore not matter for confession. Others believe it to be a mortal sin simply to curse a creature —such as the day, the wind, the rain, and the like; others think it a grievous detraction to make known to a parent the sins of his children, even though it be necessary for their correction; others imagine that they sin by not observing a precept of the Church, such as hearing Mass, abstaining from servile work, or fasting, even when they are excused by a legitimate cause. In all these, and similar cases, the catechist should explain that there is no sin.

III. When any actions are certainly sinful, it is the duty of the instructors to teach that they are so, even though some persons should think the contrary; but particularly when there is reason, to fear that these persons will contract a habit of these acts, which they will not be able to correct without great difficulty after they have come to the knowledge of their sinfulness. For example, some think it only a venial sin to curse holidays, such as Holy Saturday, Easter, and Pentecost; it is necessary to teach them that such curses are really injurious to God, and mortal sins. Some also believe that it is only a venial sin to expose themselves to the proximate occasion of sin. The catechist must explain that those who do not abstain from voluntary proximate occasions of grievous sin are guilty of a mortal sin, even though they have the intention of not committing the bad act, to the danger of which they expose themselves. It is also necessary to teach that those who use superstitious and vain observances for the cure of diseases, or the like, are guilty of mortal sin. He must also inculcate on those who are prepared to take revenge for an insult which they may receive, that they are continually in a state of sin, and that, if they die in that disposition, they will be lost. So, also, women must be taught it is a sin to take pleasure in being admired and desired by men, if this pleasure arises from vanity, and not from a wish to be married to them.

IV. There are some catechists who are fond of filling their instructions with amusing and curious stories, and assert that this is necessary to draw a large audience, and to keep up their attention and prevent tediousness. This one thing I know, that the saints, in their instructions, instead of exciting laughter, moved the people to tears. We read in the life of St. John Francis Regis, that the people wept throughout the catechetical instructions which he gave in the missions. I do not censure a jest which naturally arises from the subject treated; but to tell ridiculous stories, for the purpose of making the people laugh, is to turn the instruction into a farce, and is unbecoming the sanctity of the church, and the dignity of the pulpit from which the word of God is announced, and in which the instructor fulfils the office of an ambassador of Jesus Christ. For Christ therefore, says St. Paul, we are ambassadors.[13794] The people certainly take delight in hearing and laughing at such trifles; but what profit do they draw from it? After the laughter, the hearers will be so distracted, that it will be very difficult afterwards to compose their thoughts; and instead of listening to the moral (which our witty catechist will find rather hard to adduce from his jokes, and at the same time avoid appearing to be a quack), if nothing worse happens they will continue to revolve in their minds the witty expressions and ridiculous incidents which they have heard. Such a catechist may acquire the character of a facetious and pleasing instructor, but he will not be considered a man of sanctity and zeal, and therefore will produce but little fruit in the hearts of his hearers. It is a mistake to imagine that without jests of this sort the people will not come to the catechism, nor be attentive to it. I say that greater numbers will come to the church, and will pay more attention to the instruction, when they find that they draw fruit and devotion from it, and that their time is not spent unprofitably.

V. The catechist must pay great attention to the language of his instructions. The style of catechetical lectures should be altogether simple and popular, and does not admit of polished language or rounded periods. These are, as St. Francis de Sales says, the pest even of sermons. Preachers who are full of the Spirit of God do not seek after leaves and flowers of this kind, for by them the fruit of God's word is lost, while hell gathers its harvest of souls. The word of God has no need of ornaments; the simpler it is, the more fruit it bears. Oh! how many preachers shall we see condemned to eternal torments, for having adulterated God's word with their flowery language! If all preached like the apostles, hell could not make such havoc among souls as it does at present, with all these elegant and pompous sermons. Even panegyrics, as the great Muratori says, should be simple, so as to move the people to imitate the virtues of the saints, not so as to make them bestow a little smoke and empty praise on the preacher. But I have written a little work[13795] on this point, in which I show, with Muratori, that all sermons and panegyrics should be simple and popular. For the chief part of the audience is made up of the lower orders, who will find little or no profit unless the language is popular and adapted to their capacity; and this applies to all sermons. But in missions it is an unpardonable mistake to preach in an elegant style, particularly at catechism, where the object is to teach the illiterate what they must believe and practise, how they must make their confessions, and how they should recommend themselves to God. If the style is not altogether popular, and suited to their capacity, the time both of the instructor and of the people is lost. I said that the style should be popular, not childish; some speak with the most childish simplicity; but childishness is never fit for the pulpit. I also said that the language should be accommodated to the capacity of the people. The instructor, then, must use short sentences, so he will have his audience more attentive. It is useful frequently to propose questions, and to reply to them; it contributes greatly to keep up the attention of the people, and to fix the instruction in their memory. Many practical examples of this will be found in the following pages.

3. THE MORAL

In the MORAL, the catechist must not only instruct the understanding, but also more particularly endeavor to move the will of his hearers to avoid sins and to adopt the remedies against them. The sins committed through the malice of the will are much more numerous than those that are committed through ignorance of the understanding. The moral of a catechetical instruction should be shorter than that of a sermon. It should be delivered with warmth, but not in the style of a sermon, and without declamation. It is sometimes useful in the instruction to exclaim against some commoner form of vice, against some current worldly maxim, or against those frivolous pretences which wicked men employ to excuse their vices, or as when they say: "All are not to be saints; we are but flesh and blood; God is merciful; others do as we do." These excuses must be answered with great vigor, so as to root out the prejudices by which many persons regulate their conduct, and therefore never amend their lives. But these declamations must be rare; otherwise the instruction will assume the appearance of a sermon, which is quite out of order.

Let the catechist, then, not only aim at completely extirpating these false maxims, but also labor to impress on the minds of his hearers some really salutary truths, which will contribute greatly to preserve souls in the grace of God. For example: "What will it profit a man to gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul?" Death puts an end to all things. Eternity has no end. Let all be lost, provided God be not lost. Sin is the only evil which we have to fear. He possesses all things who possesses God. All pains are little to him who has merited hell. A man must conquer all his passions to preserve his soul. What does a Christian know, if he has not learned to bear an insult for God's sake? He who prays receives all he wants. What comes from God is all really good and supremely useful. Sanctity consists in loving God. The love of God consists in doing his will in all things. This kind of maxims of Christian morality should be often repeated, as occasion offers, that they may be impressed on the minds of the people, and take deep root in them.

The catechist must frequently repeat, in his instructions, certain admonitions which are peculiarly necessary for the salvation of souls:

1. He must caution people against making sacrilegious confessions by concealing sins through shame. It is certain that through this accursed shame numberless souls are lost. Some are so much under its influence that they make sacrilegious confessions even to the missionaries. Hence, it is necessary to speak frequently on this subject, but particularly in the missions; for the person who conceals a sin during the retreat will never afterwards confess it. To deter the people from these sacrileges, it will be useful to relate a number of instances of souls that have been damned for sacrilegious confessions. I have given several such examples at the end of this book.

2. It is necessary to inculcate frequently the necessity of avoiding dangerous occasions; for, if proximate occasions, especially of carnal sins, are not avoided, all other means will be useless for our salvation.

3. It is necessary to inculcate the necessity of prayer, or of frequently asking help from God to avoid sin. He who does not recommend himself to God, but particularly in the time of temptation, is certainly lost; and, therefore, the catechist must, in his instructions, frequently exhort the people, in all temptations, but particularly in temptations against purity, to invoke Jesus and Mary, and to continue to invoke them as long as the temptation lasts. He who prays is not afraid of falling into sin, for he has God to help him. St. Teresa used to say that she would like to stand on a mountain, and cry out only these words, "O souls! pray, pray, pray."

4. The instructor must frequently exhort the people to the love of God; he who does not love God, and only abstains from sin through fear of hell, is in great danger of relapsing into sin as soon as the lively sensation of fear ceases; but he who has once come to love Jesus Christ, will afterwards find it hard to fall into mortal sin. For this purpose the meditation on the Passion of Jesus Christ is most profitable. St. Bonaventure says that the wounds of Jesus Christ are wounds which would soften hearts of stone and inflame minds of ice.[13796] Hence it is necessary to make a short mental prayer every day, and to make frequent acts of love to Jesus Christ, and to ask frequently of God the gift of his love.

5. The instructor must, above all, recommend to the people frequent confession and Communion, from which souls receive strength to persevere in the grace of God. It is not enough to say this once; he must repeat it over and over again; because all the people are not present at the instruction on confession and Communion, and also because the frequent repetition of an advice contributes to impress on them the necessity of putting it in practice. But it may be said, that the people grow tired of hearing the one thing over and over again. But what then? Some fastidious people may be annoyed, but all the rest will derive profit, especially the uninstructed, who, unless they hear the same thing over and over again, forget it at once.

6. The instructor should, as often as an opportunity presents itself, teach practical lessons to the people, and even suggest the words which they should use in certain circumstances. For example, when a person receives an injury or insult from another, he should be taught to say to his enemy, "God make you a saint; God give you light!" But if this does not allay the other's rage, let him be ready to hold his tongue. When any misfortune happens, let him say, "God's will be done! O Lord, I suffer this willingly for my sins." These, and such practical lessons, should be frequently repeated that they may be fixed in the minds of the people, who will certainly forget all the Latin quotations and the curious erudition of the instructor, and will only remember what they are taught to practise.

All these hints will appear trifling to your pedants, but they will be really very useful for the soul.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE PEOPLE ON THE TEN COMMANDMENTS AND ON THE SACRAMENTS

1. ORIGINAL SIN

To fulfil his duties, it is, first of all, necessary for man to know what is his last end, in which he may find his perfect happiness. The last end of man is to love and serve God in this life, and to enjoy him for eternity in the next. Thus, God has placed us in this world not to acquire riches, honors, or pleasures, but to obey his commands, and, by obedience to them, to gain the eternal beatitude of paradise.

For this end, the Lord created Adam, who was the first man, and gave him Eve for his wife, that from them mankind might be propagated. He created them in his grace, and placed them in the terrestrial paradise, with the promise that they should be thence transferred to heaven to enjoy complete and eternal felicity. During their sojourn on this earth he gave them for their food all the fruits of that garden of delights; but, to try their obedience, he forbade them to eat the fruit of only one tree, which he pointed out to them. But Adam and Eve disobeyed God, and would eat the forbidden fruit, and for this sin they were deprived of divine grace, were instantly banished from paradise, and, as rebels to the divine Majesty, were, with all their posterity, condemned to temporal and eternal death. Thus was heaven shut against them and all their descendants.

This is the original sin in which, as children of a rebellious father, we are all born children of wrath and enemies of God. When a vassal rebels against his sovereign, all the descendants of the rebel become hateful to the prince, and are banished from the kingdom. Thus original sin, by the disobedience of Adam, deprives us of the grace of God.

According to the doctrine of the Church, the Blessed Virgin Mary had the privilege of being exempt from original guilt. It is certain that she was also free from all actual sin. Such is the doctrine of the Church, as the Council of Trent has declared: "If any one saith, that a man once justified. . . . is able, during his whole life, to avoid all sins, even those that are venial,—except by a special privilege from God, as the Church holds in regard of the Blessed Virgin,—let him be anathema.[13797] [In the Bull "Ineffabilis Deus," published by Pius IX., in the year 1854, it was solemnly defined that the Blessed Virgin was, from the first moment of her conception, preserved from all stain of original sin.] But, if she contracted no guilt from which she required to be redeemed, must it be said that she was not redeemed by Jesus Christ as well as all the other children of Adam? No; she was redeemed, but redeemed in a more excellent manner. Others are redeemed after having incurred original guilt; Mary was redeemed by being preserved from it. And this privilege was justly given to her alone—that blessed woman whom God had predestined to be his own Mother.

But all the rest are born with the infection of the sin of Adam, in punishment of which we have our understanding darkened to the knowledge of eternal truth and out will inclined to evil. But by the merits of Jesus Christ at our baptism we obtain the divine grace and the remedy for all our misery. We thus become the adopted sons of God and heirs of paradise, provided we preserve till death the grace given to us in baptism. But if we lose it by mortal sin we shall be condemned to hell, and can obtain pardon only by the sacrament of penance.

2. ACTUAL SINS

With regard to the sins that we actually commit, we must distinguish mortal from venial sin.

I. To understand the nature of mortal sin, it is necessary to know that, as the soul gives life to the body, so the grace of God gives life to the soul. Hence, as the body without the soul is dead, and fit only for the grave, so by sin the soul dies to the grace of God and is doomed to be buried in hell. Hence grievous sin is called mortal because it kills the soul. The soul that sinneth, the same shall die.[13798] I said that the soul is doomed to hell. But what is this hell? It is a place to which all who die in sin go to suffer eternal torments. These shall go into everlasting punishment.[13799] But what pains shall they suffer in hell? Every conceivable pain: there the damned are immersed in a sea of fire, tortured by all sorts of torments, overwhelmed with despair, and abandoned by all for all eternity.

But is it reasonable that a soul should suffer an eternity of torments for a single mortal sin?—He who speaks thus shows that he does not understand what a mortal sin is. Mortal sin is to turn your back upon God. Thus it is defined by St. Thomas[13800] and St. Augustine[13801] a turning away from the unchangeable good. Hence God says to the sinner, Thou hast forsaken Me, thou hast gone backward.[13802] Mortal sin is an insult offered to God by sinners. I have brought up children and exalted them, but they have despised Me.[13803] It is a dishonor done to the divine Majesty. By the transgression of the law thou dishonorest God.[13804] It is to say to God, I will not obey Thee. Thou hast broken My yoke, . . . and thou saidst, I will not serve.[13805] This is the essence of mortal sin; and for it one hell is not enough: a hundred or a thousand hells would not be sufficient to punish a single mortal sin. If a person unjustly injures a peasant he deserves to be punished: if he does it to a nobleman, a prince, or an emperor, he merits far greater chastisement. But what are all the kings of the earth and even all the saints of heaven in comparison with God? They are as nothing. All nations are before him as if they had no being at all.[13806] Now, I ask, what chastisement is due to an insult offered to God, and to a God who has died for the love of us?

However, it must be observed that for mortal sin three things are required: full advertence, perfect consent, and grievous matter. If any of these three be wanting, the sin is not mortal: it can be only venial, or perhaps no sin at all.

I. Venial sin does not kill, but it wounds the soul. It is not a grievous offence, but still it is an offence against God. It is not so great an evil as mortal sin; but it is a greater evil than all the other evils that can happen to creatures. A lie, a venial curse, is a greater evil than if all men, all the saints, and all the angels were to be sent to hell.

Some venial sins are deliberate, others are indeliberate.

1. Indeliberate venial sins, or sins committed without full advertence or perfect consent, are less culpable; all men fall into such sins. The Blessed Virgin only had the privilege of being exempt from them.

2. Deliberate venial sins, which are committed with full advertence and consent, are more criminal, particularly when there is an affection for them; such as certain feelings of hatred, of ambition, certain rooted attachments, and the like. "Who," says St. Basil, "shall dare to call any sin light?"[13807] It is enough to understand that it offends God, to make us avoid it more than any other evil. The deformity of a venial sin was once shown to St. Catharine of Genoa; she afterwards felt surprised that she did not die of horror at the sight of it. And let him who thinks little of venial sin remember, that if he does not amend, he will be on the point of falling into some mortal sin. The more venial sins the soul commits, the weaker she becomes, the greater the power which the devil acquires over her, and the fewer the helps that God bestows upon her. He that contemneth small things shall fall by little and little.[13808]

3. CONCLUSION

Let us, then, be careful to avoid sin, which alone can make us unhappy in this life and in the next; and let us continually thank the goodness of God for not having already sent us to hell for our sins. Let us henceforth attend to the salvation of our souls, and let us consider how little is all that we do for the salvation of our souls—all that we do for eternal life.

St. Augustine[13809] relates that when the Emperor Gratian was in the city of Treves, two of his courtiers went one day to visit a monastery of certain good religious, which was outside the city. In that holy solitude they began to read the life of St. Antony, which lay on the table of one of the religious. One of them, enlightened by God, said to the other: "My friend, after all the anxieties and labors of the world which we endure, what can we obtain? While we remain at court, the most we can hope for is to gain the emperor's favor. This is the greatest happiness that we can expect, and if we gain it, how long will this happiness last? But if I wish for the friendship of God, I can have it this moment." After this he went on reading, and by God's illumination saw more and more clearly the vanity of the world, and resolutely said to his companion: "Now, I will forsake all things and save my soul. I this moment resolve to remain in this monastery to think only of God. If you will not follow my example, at least, I beseech you, do not oppose my design." His companion said that he was resolved to follow his example. Two young women also, who had been betrothed to them, when they heard of their change, left the world and consecrated their virginity to God.

But, to make sure of our eternal salvation, it is not enough to begin: it is necessary to persevere; and in order to persevere, it is necessary to be humble, always distrusting our own strength, confiding only in God, and continually asking his help to persevere. Woe to that man who trusts in himself and glories in his own works.

Palladius[13810] relates that a certain solitary, in a desert, spent day and night in prayer, and led a most austere life, and therefore was honored by many. The unhappy man began to think well of himself, and, on account of his virtues, regarded himself sure of perseverance and salvation. But afterwards, when the devil appeared to him in the form of a woman, and tempted him to sin, the unhappy man was unable to resist the temptation, and fell. Immediately after his fall, the devil burst into loud laughter and disappeared. The solitary afterwards left the desert, returned to the world, and fell into all kinds of vice; thus he became a warning to show how dangerous it is to trust in your own strength.

Still more frightful was the end of the celebrated Brother Justin, who, after refusing offices of great dignity that were offered to him by the King of Hungary, became a religious of the Order of St. Francis, and made such progress in the spiritual life, that he had frequent ecstasies. One day, during dinner, in the convent of Ara Coeli, he was, in the presence of the entire Community, raised into the air, and borne aloft to venerate an image of the Blessed Virgin, which was hanging on the wall. On account of this prodigy, Eugene IV. sent for him, embraced him and made him sit down, and had a long conversation with him. By this act of respect on the part of the Pope the unhappy man was so puffed up, that St John Capistran said to him when he saw him, "Brother Justin, you went out an angel, and you have come back a devil." He afterwards fell into pride and many other vices, and at last he killed a brother in religion. He then fled into the kingdom of Naples, where he committed many other crimes, and died in prison an apostate monk.

PART I

Instructions on the Commandments

Chapter I

THE FIRST COMMANDMENT

"Thou shalt have no other God before me."[13811]

THIS first commandment obliges us to give to God due worship and honor. What this God is, it is impossible to understand. But let it be enough for us to know that his principal attributes are as follows:

1. God is independent. All things depend on God, but he depends on no one; and, therefore, he possesses all perfections, in regard to which no one can set any bounds to him.

2. God is Almighty; for he can do whatever he wishes; by one act of his will he created the world. He first created the heavens, and the angels, who are pure spirits, and he created them in the state of grace. But Lucifer, when he was commanded to adore the Son of God, who was to be made man, through pride refused to obey, and induced a third part of the angels to join with him in his rebellion against God. These rebellious angels were instantly banished from heaven by the Archangel Michael, and condemned to hell. They are the devils, who tempt us to sin, in order to make us companions of their torments. Miserable should we be, if we had not God to assist us. We should not have strength to resist their temptations. But God requires, as the condition of giving us this assistance, that in our temptations we instantly turn to him, and ask his assistance; if we act otherwise, we shall be defeated by our enemies. The angels who remained faithful were immediately admitted into the enjoyment of the glory of paradise; and from among these angels, the Lord has appointed those who were to be our guardians: He hath given His angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.[13812] Let us every day give thanks to our angel guardian, and entreat him to assist us always, and never abandon us. Next the Lord created the earth and all those things that we see. He then made man, that is, Adam and Eve, as we have already said. So God is the Lord of all things, for he created all things; and as he created all things by one act of his will, so by another act he can, if he pleases, destroy all things. This is what is meant by God's omnipotence.

3. God is also most wise. He governs all things created without labor or inconvenience. He sees and has before him all things, past and future, and knows all our thoughts better than they are known to ourselves.

4. God is eternal; he always has been, and always will be, and nothing in him ever had a beginning, or shall have an end.

5. God is immense; he is in heaven, on earth, and in all places.

6. God is holy in all his works, and it is impossible for him to be in any way wicked.

7. God is just; he leaves no sinful act unpunished, and no good act without reward.

8. God is all mercy to penitent sinners, and all love to the souls that love him. In a word, God is infinite goodness; so that he cannot be better nor more perfect than he is.

This God, our Creator and Preserver, we are bound to love and honor, principally by acts of the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity. "God," said St. Augustine, "is to be worshipped with faith, hope, and charity."[13813]

1. FAITH

1. WHAT IS FAITH?

Faith is a virtue, or a gift which God infuses into our souls in baptism; a gift by which we believe the truths which God himself has revealed to the holy Church, and which she proposes to our belief.

2. WHAT IS THE CHURCH?

By the Church is meant the congregation of all who are baptized (for persons not baptized are out of the Church), and profess the true faith under a visible head, that is, the Sovereign Pontiff. I say the true faith, to exclude heretics, who, though baptized, are separated from the Church; I say under a visible head, to exclude schismatics, who do not obey the Pope, and, on that account, easily pass from schism to heresy. St. Cyprian well says: "Heresies and schisms have no other origin than this—the refusal to obey the priest of God and the notion that there can be more than one priest at one time presiding over the Church, and more than one judge at a time filling the office of Vicar of Christ."[13814]

We have all revealed truths in the sacred Scriptures, and in the traditions gradually communicated by God to his servants. But how should we be able to ascertain what are the true traditions and the true Scriptures, and what is their true meaning, if we had not the Church to teach us? This Church Jesus Christ established as the pillar and ground of the truth.[13815] To this Church our Saviour himself has promised that she shall never be conquered by her enemies. The gates of hell shall not prevail against her. [13816] The gates of hell are the heresies and heresiarchs that have caused so many miserable, deluded souls to wander from the right way. This Church it is that teaches us, through her ministers, the truths that we are to believe. Thus, St. Augustine says: "I would not believe the Gospel, were I not moved by the authority of the Church."[13817]

3. WHAT IS THE MOTIVE OF FAITH, AND HOW SHOULD WE MAKE AN ACT OF FAITH?

The cause or motive, then, which imposes on me the obligation to believe the truths of faith is, because God, the infallible Truth, has revealed them, and because the Church proposes them to my belief. So we should make out a rule of faith in this way: "My God, because Thou, who art the infallible truth, hast revealed to the Church the truths of faith, I believe all the Church proposes to my belief."[13818]

This is the reason or motive which makes me believe the truths of revelation. Let us now see what are those truths which we are obliged to believe.

4. WHICH ARE THE PRINCIPAL ARTICLES OF FAITH?

There are four principal articles of faith:

1. There is an ever-present God.

2. He is a rewarder who rewards with the eternal glory of paradise all who observe his law, and punishes all who transgress it with the everlasting torments of hell.

3. In God there are three Persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and these Persons, though distinct from one another, are but one God, because they are one essence and one divinity. Hence, as the Father is eternal, omnipotent, infinite, so are the Son and the Holy Ghost equally eternal, omnipotent, and infinite. The Son is begotten of the intelligence of the Father. The Holy Ghost proceeds from the will of the Father and the Son, by the love with which they love each other.

4. The Incarnation of the Eternal Word—that is, of the second Person—the Son, who, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, was made man in the womb of the Virgin Mary—for the person of the Word assumed the nature of man, so that the two natures, the divine and the human, were united in the person of Jesus Christ, who suffered and died for our salvation. But what necessity was there that Jesus Christ should suffer for our redemption? Man had sinned; and to obtain pardon it was necessary that man should make a full satisfaction to God for the sins that had been committed. But how could man make such satisfaction to the infinite majesty of God? What, then, did God do? The Father sent the Son to take upon himself our nature; and the Son, Jesus Christ, true God and true Man, atoned to the divine justice in behalf of man. Such is the debt and the love that we owe to Jesus Christ. Denis the Carthusian tells us of a young man who, at Mass, did not kneel down at the words of the Creed, Et homo factus est; upon which a devil with a club appeared to him, and said: "Thou ungrateful wretch, dost thou not thank the God who was made flesh for thee? If he had done for us what he has done for thee, we should be always prostrate in thankful adoration. And thou dost not even make a sign of thankfulness." Then he gave him a terrible blow with his club, and left him half dead.

5. Which are the Things that we Must Know and Believe as Necessary BY Necessity of Means, and Others by NECESSITY OF PRECEPT?

Moreover, we must know that some articles are to be believed by necessity of means, without which we cannot obtain salvation, others by necessity of precept.—The necessity of means implies that if we do not believe certain articles of faith, we cannot be saved.—The necessity by precept signifies that we must believe certain other articles; but if it happens that we are ignorant of them by an invincible ignorance, we are excused from sin and may be saved.

I. To know and believe the first two articles already laid down, namely, that there is a God, and that he is a just rewarder of virtue and punisher of vice, is certainly necessary as a means of salvation, according to the words of the Apostle, For he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and is a rewarder to them that seek Him.[13819] Some authors hold that the belief of the other two articles—the Trinity of Persons, and the Incarnation of the Word—is necessary by necessity of precept, but not necessary as a means without which salvation is impossible; so that a person inculpably ignorant of them may be saved. At any rate it is certain, as Innocent XI. declared,[13820] when condemning a contrary proposition, that he who is ignorant of the two mysteries of the Most Holy Trinity, and of the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, cannot receive absolution.

II. We are obliged only by necessity of precept, which, however, binds under grievous sin, to know and believe the other articles of the Creed, at least the principal articles among them—such as, that God has created heaven and earth; that he preserves and governs the universe; that the Blessed Virgin Mary is the true Mother of God, and is ever a Virgin; that on the third day after his death Jesus Christ rose from the dead by his own power; that he ascended into heaven, and there sits on the right hand of his Eternal Father. By this it is meant that Jesus Christ, even as man, sits at the right hand of God—that is, that he permanently possesses a glory equal to that of the Father, as Bellarmine explains in his catechism.[13821] I said even as man. For as God, Jesus Christ is, in all things, equal to the Father; but, as man, he is inferior to the Father, but, because our Saviour is at the same time both God and man, and only one person, therefore the humanity of Jesus Christ in heaven has a glory and majesty equal to that of the Father, not by its own dignity, but because it is united with the person of the Son of God. When a king sits on his throne, the regal purple that he wears is there upon the throne with him; thus the humanity of Christ by itself is not equal to God, but because it is united with a divine Person, it is seated on the same throne with God, with a glory equal to that of God.

We are also bound to know and believe that, on the last day of the world, all men shall rise, and shall be judged by Jesus Christ; we must also believe that the Roman Catholic Church is the only true Church. Hence they who are out of our Church, or separated from it, cannot be saved, except infants who die after baptism. We are obliged to believe the communion of saints—that is, that each of the faithful in the state of grace partakes of the merits of all the saints, living and dead. We must also believe in the remission of sins—that is, that our sins are remitted in the sacrament of penance, provided we are sincerely penitent for them. Lastly, we must believe in eternal life—that is, that he who is saved by dying in a state of grace will go to heaven, where he will enjoy God for all eternity; and, on the other hand, that he who dies in sin will be sent to hell, where he will be tormented for all eternity.

Moreover, every Christian is obliged to know the precepts of the Decalogue, and those of the Church, and the principal obligations of his own state of life, whether he be an ecclesiastic or secular, married or single, lawyer or doctor, etc.

Every one is bound also to know and believe the seven sacraments, and their effects, particularly the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, Penance, and Eucharist, and the other sacraments when he is about to receive them.

All are obliged to know the "Our Father." The "Our Father," or Lord's Prayer, is a prayer that Jesus Christ himself composed, and left to us, that we may know in what manner to ask the graces that are most necessary for our salvation. St. Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble, on one occasion, when he was ill, repeated the "Our Father" three hundred times in one night. His chamberlain advised him not to repeat it so often, for fear of increasing his illness. The saint answered, that the oftener he said it, the faster he recovered. It is particularly useful to repeat over and over again the words, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven;" for the greatest grace that God can bestow upon us is to make us do his holy will here on earth. It is also very profitable to repeat the petition, "and lead us not into temptation," begging the Lord to deliver us from the temptations in which he foresees that we should fall.

Moreover, every one should learn the "Hail Mary" in order to know how to recommend ourselves to the Mother of God, through whom, as St. Bernard says, we receive all the graces God gives us.

All should likewise know that there exists a purgatory, a place for expiating sins after death, where the faithful suffer those temporal punishments for their sins that they did not fully undergo in this life. We should, therefore, be mindful to pray and offer our suffrages for the holy souls in purgatory, whom we are, as far as we can, bound to relieve in their sufferings; indeed, the least pain of purgatory is greater than all the pains of this life put together; for the pains of these spouses of Christ are most intense, and these poor souls are unable to assist themselves. If, on this earth, our neighbor were suffering great pain, and we could relieve him without any great inconvenience, should we not be obliged to do so? We are equally bound to render assistance to these holy souls, at least by our prayers.

We should also know that it is very useful to us to obtain the intercession of the saints, and particularly of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This is of faith, as the Council of Trent[13822] has declared against the impious Calvin, who said it was wrong to ask the assistance of the saints. Nay, according to the doctrine of St. Thomas we mortals are absolutely bound to go to the saints, in order to obtain, through their intercession, the divine graces necessary for our salvation; not because God cannot save us without the intercession of the saints, but because the order established by God requires that, while we remain in this life, we should he converted. The order of the divine law requires that we who are absent from the Lord, while we remain in our mortal body, should be brought back to him by means of the saints—to God by the prayers of the saints.[13823] This doctrine is also held by other theologians.[13824] We should likewise venerate the relics of the saints, the cross, and sacred images.

5. WHICH ARE THE PROOFS OF THE TRUTH OF OUR FAITH?

Before I proceed farther, I will answer an objection which may be made. A man may say, the truth of our faith is clear and evident: but how can it be clear when there are so many mysteries, such as the Trinity, the Incarnation of the Word, and the Eucharist, which are obscure and incomprehensible?

I answer, the mysteries of the faith are obscure, but not its truth. The truth of our faith, that is, that our faith is true, is evident by the plainest and most irrefragable arguments. The mysteries of faith are obscure to us, and God himself wishes them to be obscure: first, because he wishes to be honored by our believing, though we cannot comprehend all the truths that he has revealed: and, secondly, because we acquire merit by believing what we do not see. What merit should a man have for believing something because he sees and comprehends it? St. Gregory says that faith has no merit if human reason furnishes a proof for it.[13825] But if we are unable to comprehend the material things of this world—for who is there that comprehends how the magnet attracts iron? how a single grain of corn, sown in the earth, produces a thousand other grains? Who comprehends the action of the moon, or that of lightning?—what wonder is there if we cannot comprehend the mysteries of God?

The objects, then, of our faith are obscure; but the truth of our faith is established by so many evident proofs, that he who does not embrace it can only be called a fool. These proofs are numerous. We shall mention only three of them:

I. The first is taken from the prophecies written in the Holy Bible so many ages before the event, and afterwards exactly fulfilled. Long before it happened, the death of our Redeemer was foretold by several prophets—David, Daniel, Aggeus, and Malachy foretold the time and circumstances of his death. It was foretold that in punishment of the murder of Jesus Christ by the Jews, their temple should be destroyed, and they should be driven from their country; that they should remain blinded in their sin, and should be scattered over the whole earth. We know that all this has taken place. It was also foretold that, after the death of the Messias, the world should be converted from idolatry to the worship of the true God—and this was done by the holy apostles, who, unaided by learning, nobility, riches, or the protection of the great, and even in spite of the opposition of the potentates of the earth, recalled the world to the worship of the true God, inducing men to forsake their gods and their inveterate habits of vice, in order to embrace a faith that taught them to believe so many mysteries which they could not comprehend, and imposed on them so many precepts hard to be observed, because they are so contrary to our bad passions; such as to love our enemies, to abstain from pleasures, to bear insults, and to place all our affections, not on the goods that we see, but on the goods of a future life that we do not see.

2. We have further evident proofs of our faith in the multitude of miracles wrought by Jesus Christ, by the apostles and other saints, in the presence of the very enemies of the faith, who, when they could not deny the prodigies, said that they were performed by diabolical agency. But true miracles that surpass the power of nature, such as the raising of the dead to life, giving sight to the blind, and the like, cannot be wrought by devils; they have no power to work such miracles. God cannot permit a miracle except in confirmation of the true faith; should he permit a miracle in confirmation of error, he himself would deceive us. Therefore, the true miracles that we witness in the Catholic Church (it is sufficient to mention the miracle of St. Januarius[13826]) are infallible proofs of the truth of our faith.

3. The constancy of the martyrs is again a very strong argument in favor of our faith. In the first ages of the Church, in the reign of the tyrants, there were so many millions of persons, and among them so many tender virgins and children, who, rather than deny the faith of Jesus Christ, endured with joy torments and death. Sulpitius Severus writes[13827] that, in the time of Diocletian, the martyrs presented themselves to their judges with a desire of martyrdom that surpassed the avidity with which men of the world pursue the riches and honors of the earth.

The martyrdom of St. Mauritius, and the whole Theban legion, is one famous in history. The Emperor Maximian commanded all his soldiers to assist at an impious sacrifice which he was going to offer to his false deities. St. Mauritius and his soldiers, because they were all Christians, refused to obey the order of the emperor. Having heard of their refusal, Maximian, to punish their disobedience, ordered them to be decimated—that is, the head of every tenth man in the legion to be cut off Each of them desired to die; and the soldiers who were left alive envied the happiness of those who were put to death for Jesus Christ. As soon as this was made known to Maximian, he ordered them to be decimated a second time; but this only increased their desire of martyrdom. In the end the tyrant ordered them all to be beheaded; and all, with joy in their faces, laid down their arms, and, like so many meek lambs, gladly and without resistance submitted to death.

Prudentius[13828] relates that a child seven years old, whose name is unrecorded, was tempted by Asclepiades to deny the faith of Christ; but when the boy refused, saying that he had been taught this faith by his mother, the tyrant sent for her, and in her presence caused the child to be scourged till his whole body became one wound. All the spectators shed tears of pity; but the mother exulted with joy at the sight of the fortitude of her son. Before death, the child, being thirsty, asked his mother for a little water. "Son," said the mother, "have patience a little while; you shall soon be satiated in heaven with every delight." The prefect, enraged at the constancy of the mother and the son, commanded his head to be cut off instantly. After the execution of the order, the mother took the dead child in her arms, and kissed him with feelings of the most joyful triumph because he had laid down his life for Jesus Christ.

1. Practical Conclusion.

From all that we have said, we ought to gather that we are bound to return God the most heart-felt thanks for having given us the gift of the true faith. How great is the number of infidels, heretics, and schismatics! Catholics do not amount to a tenth part of the human race. God has placed us in this number; by his providence we were born in the bosom of the true Church. Few thank him for this great benefit. Let us at least be careful to thank him for it every day.

II. HOPE

1. WHAT IS HOPE?

Hope is a virtue which God infuses into our souls, by which we expect from the divine mercy, with certain confidence, eternal beatitude through the merits of Jesus Christ, and also by means of the good works that we shall perform with God's assistance.

2. WHAT IS THE OBJECT OF HOPE?

Hence the primary object of Christian hope is eternal life—that is, God himself, whom we hope to enjoy; the secondary objects are the means to obtain everlasting happiness, which are God's grace, and our good works which we shall perform with the assistance of grace.

3. WHAT IS THE MOTIVE OF HOPE?

The motive or formal object of hope is the omnipotence of God, by which he is able to save us; his mercy, by which he wishes to save us; and the fidelity of God to his promise to bring us to glory through the merits of Jesus Christ, provided we pray to him for salvation through the merits of Jesus Christ. Behold the promise: Amen, amen, I say to you, if ye ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[13829] Without this promise we should have no certain grounds to hope for our salvation, and for God's grace to obtain it.

4. HOW IS THE BLESSED VIRGIN OUR HOPE?

But if God is our hope, for what reason does the holy Church make us call the Blessed Virgin Mary our hope: Spes nostra salve?

We must make a distinction: God, as the author of grace and of every good, is our principal hope; and Mary is our hope, because she prays for us to Jesus Christ. Hence, St. Bonaventure thus addresses her: "Through thee, O first finder of grace, Mother of salvation, we have access to the Son, that, through thee, he may receive us, who through thee was given to us."[13830] He meant to say, that as we have access to the Father only through Jesus Christ, who is the mediator of justice, so we have access to the Son only through Mary, who is a mediatrix of grace, and by her prayers obtains for us and dispenses those graces that Christ merited and provided for us. Hence, St. Bonaventure called Mary the entire ground of his hope.[13831] So also the holy Church teaches us to call her "our life, our sweetness, and our hope."[13832]

5. HOW DO WE SIN AGAINST HOPE?

How is the precept of hope violated? It is violated—

1. By despair of the divine mercy. Thus Cain sinned when, after having killed his brother Abel, he said: My iniquity is greater than that I may deserve pardon.[13833] As if God, who has said: Turn ye to Me . . . and I will turn to you,[13834] could not pardon him even though he should repent of his sin.

2. The precept of hope is violated by presumption, or thinking to be saved either without God's assistance, or without renouncing sin.

If we wish, therefore, to obtain holy perseverance, we must always distrust ourselves, and place our confidence in God. He who trusts in his own strength to conquer temptations will receive no aid from God, and will be defeated by his enemies. They who wish to overcome temptations must have recourse immediately, and with confidence, to God. None of them, said David, that trust in Him shall offend.[13835] And God himself says: Because he hoped in Me, I will deliver him.[13836]

6. HOW DO WE MAKE AN ACT OF HOPE?

This, therefore, is the way of making an act of hope: My God, trusting in Thy promises, through the merits of Jesus Christ, because Thou art almighty, merciful, and faithful, I hope to receive from Thee the glory of paradise hereafter, and the means necessary to obtain it here.[13837]

Hope is necessary for the attainment of eternal life; but hope alone is not sufficient for salvation: in order to gain everlasting glory, good works are also necessary. The saints have made all conceivable sacrifices to gain heaven.

St. John Damascene, in his life of Josaphat, the monk, relates that this young man was the son of a king, and heir to the throne, but, enlightened by a celestial admonition, in order to secure his salvation, he despised all the riches and delights of the earth, and fled from the royal palace, and retired into a desert, where he spent all the remaining days of his life in prayer and penitential austerities. At his death, angels were seen carrying his blessed soul to heaven.

Listen to what a woman did in order to gain heaven. Socrates[13838] relates that when the Arian Emperor Valens had commanded the prefect of the city to put to death all the Catholics who should assemble at a certain place in order to perform their devotions, the prefect, on his way to execute the barbarous order, met a young woman carrying an infant in her arms, and walking very quickly. Being asked where she was going, she replied: "I am going to the place where the other Catholics assemble." "But do you not know," said the prefect, "that they are all to be put to death?" "It is for that very reason," rejoined the woman, "that I am hastening thither with this my only child, that we may have the happiness of dying for Jesus Christ, and of going to enjoy him in heaven. As soon as the prefect heard this, he returned to the emperor, and related the fact. Confounded by the generous resolution of the woman, the emperor ordered her to be left in peace.

III. CHARITY

1. WHAT IS CHARITY?

Charity is a virtue which God infuses into the soul, by which we love God above all things, because he is infinite goodness, and by which we love our neighbors as ourselves, because God commands us to love them.

2. WHAT IS THE MOTIVE OF CHARITY?

The motive of loving God is his infinite goodness, for which he deserves to be loved for himself alone, though there were no reward for loving him, nor any chastisement for not loving him.

While St. Louis, King of France, was once travelling, he encountered a woman on the road with a lighted torch in one hand, and a vessel filled with water in the other. When she was asked why she carried them she answered: "I should like to set fire to heaven with my torch, and to extinguish hell-fire with the water, that God might be loved, not for the hope of heaven, nor for the fear of the torments of hell, but simply and solely because he deserves to be loved."

3. WHEN SHOULD WE MAKE ACTS OF CHARITY OR LOVE OF GOD?

Let us now examine when we are bound to make acts of faith, hope, and charity. These acts should be made from time to time because it is by acts that virtues are preserved. We are obliged to make acts of the love of God more frequently than acts of faith and hope; for in the Holy Scripture God tells us that we ought to meditate constantly on this precept of loving God, sitting in our house, walking in our journey, sleeping and rising: that we should bind it as a sign on our hands, keep it before our eyes, and write it on the entry and doors of our house.[13839] This passage of Deuteronomy signifies that we should continually endeavor to make acts of divine love; for he who does not frequently exercise himself in loving God can scarcely observe his law. St. Teresa used to say that acts of love are the fuel that keeps the holy fire of divine charity burning in our heart.

Some theologians hold that we are bound to make an act of charity at least on every festival; others, once a week. I say that we are obliged to make an act of divine love at least once a month. But it is right that every Christian should make acts of faith, hope, and charity every day.[13840]

4. WHEN SHOULD WE MAKE ACTS OF LOVE FOR OUR NEIGHBOR?

Hence we should, at least once a month, make a formal act of the love of our neighbor; because, without frequent acts of fraternal charity, we shall scarcely practise the charity that we owe to our neighbor.

With regard to the precept of fraternal charity, it is necessary to know that Pope Innocent XI. condemned the following proposition: "We are not bound to love our neighbor by an internal and formal act."[13841] This proposition has been condemned; because we are bound to love all men, not only externally, but also internally with the heart, and by formal acts of love. Hence, it is a sin to take complacency in the misfortune of a neighbor, or to be grieved at his welfare. This is the meaning of the precept: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.[13842]

However, it is not sinful to desire or to be glad at the temporal misfortunes of an obstinate sinner, in order that he may amend his life, and cease to give scandal, or to oppress the innocent. It may often happen that, without losing charity, we may rejoice at the ruin of an enemy, or be sorry for his exaltation, if we believe that his ruin will be the salvation of others, and that his prosperity will bring oppression and injustice in its train. Such is the doctrine of St. Gregory.[13843] But he who delights in the death or in any other misfortune of a neighbor, for any temporal benefit to himself, is guilty of sin. But observe, that it is one thing to rejoice in the cause which is productive of any advantage, and another to take complacency in the effect produced by that cause. It is lawful to rejoice in the effect, but sinful to be glad at the cause. For example: it is lawful to rejoice at the acquisition of property which comes to us after the death of a parent; but it is unlawful to rejoice at his death; for Innocent XI. has condemned the proposition[13844] which asserts that it is lawful for a son to rejoice at the death of his father, on account of the inheritance that shall fall to him.

We are bound, then, to love our neighbor with an internal love ; and, therefore, we ought, at least once a month, as has been already said, to make an explicit act of fraternal charity. We will speak in the sequel of the external acts of charity that we owe to our neighbor.

IV. ACTS OF FAITH, HOPE, AND CHARITY

Let us now see how we are to make all the acts of which I have spoken.

1. AN ACT OF FAITH

"My God, because Thou who art the infallible truth hast revealed to the Church the truths of faith, I believe all that the Church proposes to my belief: and I believe that Thou art my God, the Creator and Lord of all things, who rewardest for all eternity the just in heaven, and chastisest forever the wicked in hell. I believe that Thou art one in essence, and three in Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three Persons and only one God. I believe that the second Person, that is, the Son, in order to save us sinners, was made man, died on a cross, and rose again from the dead."

These are the four principal mysteries. Let us also make an act of faith in the other truths, which we are bound by a strict precept to believe:

"I also believe that the Blessed Virgin Mary is the true Mother of God, and is and has always been a virgin. I believe that on the third day after his death, Jesus Christ rose again by his own power, and, after forty days, ascended into heaven, where he sits at the right hand of his Eternal Father, that is, in equal majesty and glory with the Father. I believe that on the last day, when all men shall rise again from the dead, Jesus Christ will come to judge them. I believe that the Roman Catholic Church is the only true Church, out of which no one can be saved. I believe in the communion of saints—that is, that each of the faithful, while he remains in the state of grace, shares in all the merits of the just. I believe that God remits sins to penitent sinners. I believe in the seven sacraments, and that through them the grace of Jesus Christ is communicated to us. I believe in the Ten Commandments of the Decalogue. In fine, I believe all that the holy Church believes. I give Thee thanks, O my God ! for having made me a Christian, and I protest that in this holy faith I wish to live and die."

2. AN ACT OF HOPE

"My God, trusting in Thy promises, because Thou art faithful, powerful, and merciful, I hope, through the merits of Jesus Christ, for the glory of heaven and the means to obtain it; that is, the pardon of my sins, and final perseverance in Thy grace."

3. AN ACT OF LOVE AND CONTRITION

"My God, because Thou art infinite goodness, worthy of infinite love, I love Thee above all things with my whole heart, and for the love of Thee I also love my neighbor: and I am sorry, and repent with my whole soul for having offended Thee, the sovereign good. With the aid of Thy grace, which I ask for this moment and for my whole life, I purpose to die rather than evermore offend Thee, and I purpose to receive the holy sacraments in life and at death."

Every Christian is bound to make these acts when he comes to the use of reason, and when he is in danger of death. During life, we are, as has been already said, obliged to make acts of the love of God and our neighbor, at least once a month. At any rate, we are not obliged to make these acts as frequently as the acts of charity. However, we are sometimes bound indirectly, or by accident, to make these acts, such as when we receive the sacraments, or when we are tempted grievously against faith, or hope, or charity, or chastity; and when, by any of the preceding acts, we can free ourselves from the temptation. Nevertheless, let us be careful to make them always at least once a day: and let us make the act of charity more frequently. Because, my dear Christians, we may be sure that he who does not come to love God truly, will scarcely persevere in the grace of God; for, it is very difficult to renounce sin merely through fear of chastisement; and he who abstains from sin through such a motive, perseveres but a short time. Let us, then, implore of God to give us his holy love, and let us endeavor continually to make acts of love, which are so pleasing to him.

V. PRAYER

1. NECESSITY OF PRAYER

Let us also attend to the obligation we are under to recommend ourselves to God, that he may give us his aid to conquer temptations and to persevere in his grace. We cannot merit the grace of final perseverance, as the Council of Trent[13845] has declared. It is a gift which God gives gratuitously to whom he pleases, but he infallibly gives it to all who ask it with humility and confidence. Theologians commonly teach that to pray, that is, to recommend ourselves to God and to ask his graces, is necessary for all adults as a means of salvation ; and that, for him who neglects prayer, it is impossible to persevere in grace and to be saved. And they therefore conclude that a Christian who neglects for an entire month to recommend himself to God is guilty of mortal sin.

2. EFFICACY OF PRAYER

The Lord desires to give us his graces; but he will have us ask them. For, every one that asketh, receiveth.[13846] Mark the words every one, which shows that even sinners, who ask God's grace, obtain it: "Every one," says the author of the Imperfect Work, "whether he be a just man or a sinner." [13847] It is true that a sinner is unworthy of God's graces, but according to St. Thomas[13848] the efficacy of prayer is founded, not on the merits of the person who prays, but on the mercy of God, and his fidelity to his promises. He has said: Ask and you shall receive.[13849] These are the words of God, they cannot fail.

It is necessary to observe that this promise has been made only for spiritual, but not for temporal, favors. Because he loves us, the Lord often refuses temporal blessings such as riches, honors, and bodily health. He foresees that they would be injurious to the soul, and therefore he withholds them. Therefore, when we ask temporal favors, we should pray for them with resignation, and on condition that they may be profitable to our souls, otherwise the Lord will not grant them to us. But we ought to ask spiritual graces absolutely and unconditionally.

3. QUALITIES OF PRAYER THAT IT MAY BE EFFICACIOUS

We should pray with confidence, with humility, and with perseverance.

1. With confidence. All things whatsoever you ask when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you.[13850]
2. With humility. God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.[13851]
3. With perseverance. Thousands of graces are necessary for the attainment of salvation. To save our souls, we stand in need of a chain of graces, which must come from God. And there must be on our part a chain of prayers to correspond to this chain of graces. If our petitions cease, God's aid will also cease, and we shall never be saved. Hence, as we are continually tempted to offend God, we must continually pray to him for aid. We must always act like beggars with God, always saying: Lord, assist me; Lord, be with me; keep Thy hand upon me; give me perseverance, give me the gift of Thy love. We must begin to make these petitions as soon as we rise in the morning, and continue to repeat them during the day, in hearing Mass, in our visits to the Most Holy Sacrament, before going to bed at night, and particularly when we are tempted, saying: My God, assist me; Mother of God, help me. In a word, if we wish to be saved, it is necessary to have always on our tongue a prayer to Jesus Christ and our Mother Mary, who obtains from her Son whatsoever she wishes.[13852]

VI. CHARITY TO OUR NEIGHBOR.[13853]

The love of God and the love of our neighbor are but two sides of the same thing. This commandment, says St. John, we have from God. That he who loveth God, loves also his brother.[13854] He who loves not his neighbor loves not God. However, charity has its proper order.

1. WHAT ORDER IS TO BE PRESERVED IN OUR CHARITY TO OUR NEIGHBOR

We ought to love God above all things, and our neighbor as ourselves.[13855] "Sicut te ipsum,"—as ourselves, but not more than ourselves. Hence, we are not bound to prefer the good of a neighbor to our own unless when the good of the neighbor is of an order superior to ours, and when he is in extreme necessity. The order of goods is this: first, the spiritual life of the soul; then, the temporal life of the body; next, reputation or character; and after that property. Therefore, when he is in extreme necessity, we are obliged to prefer a neighbor's good to our own of an inferior order; that is, his spiritual salvation to our temporal life; his life to our reputation; and his reputation to our property. But we are bound by this obligation, as I have said, only when he is in extreme necessity. If he is not in such necessity, we are not bound to prefer his good, though it be of a superior order. So, if I am unjustly assailed by another, who attempts to kill me, I can lawfully defend myself, and (provided I have no other means of escaping death) I can take away his life, though, by dying in that state of sin, he should lose his spiritual life and be damned: for, in that case, it is not necessary for my neighbor to kill me in order to save his soul.

2. WHOM SHOULD WE LOVE AS OUR NEIGHBOR?

By the precept of charity we are bound to love all who have died in favor with God. We cannot love the damned; on the contrary, we are bound to hate them eternally as the enemies of God.

We must love all the living, even though they be sinners, and even though they be our own enemies.

I say even sinners; for, though they are now indeed enemies of God, they may still be reconciled with him, and may obtain eternal life.

I also say, even our enemies; because the law of Jesus Christ is a law of love. God wishes that all, even our enemies, should love us; and in like manner, he commands us to love even those who hate us. The pagans love all who love them; but we Christians are obliged to love even those who wish us evil. But I say to you, love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you.[13856] When a Christian forgives an enemy, he may be sure of obtaining from God the pardon of his sins; for the Lord has said: Forgive, and you shall be forgiven.[13857] But, on the other hand, he who will not pardon others, cannot expect forgiveness from God. For, says St. James, judgment without mercy to him that hath not done mercy.[13858] It is but just that God should not have compassion on the man who has not compassion on his neighbor. "With what face," says St. Augustine, "can he ask forgiveness of his sins, who refuses to obey him that commands him to pardon others?"[13859] Do you wish to take revenge for the injuries that your neighbor has done you? If you do, God will take vengeance on you for the numberless insults that you have offered to his divine Majesty.

It is not thus the saints act: the saints seek to do good to those from whom they have received evil. St. Ambrose settled a pension sufficient for his comfortable maintenance on an assassin who had made an attempt on his life. St. Catharine of Siena performed the office of a servant for a woman who had endeavored to destroy her reputation. In the life of St. John the Almoner, it is related that one of his relatives, who had been outrageously insulted by an inn-keeper in Alexandria, laid his complaint before the saint. St. John said to him: "As this publican has been so audacious, I will teach him his duty, and will treat him so as to excite the wonder of the whole city." And what did the saint do? He ordered his steward never afterwards to exact the yearly rent that the inn-keeper had to pay him. Such was the revenge that the saint inflicted, and that truly excited the wonder of the whole city. Thus the saints sought revenge, and thus they became saints.

But, on the other hand, how miserable is the soul that bears hatred to a neighbor! The author of the "Parish Priest's Companion" relates a story of two men who hated each other, one of whom, being on the point of death, was persuaded by his confessor to be reconciled to his enemy. The sick man consented; the other came, and peace was made between them. But as he was going out of the sick man's room, he said: "This fellow would never be reconciled to me if he had not lost all hopes of ever being able to take revenge." The dying man overheard the words, and answered: "If I recover you shall see whether I will not take revenge." But he was choked with passion and died. Nevertheless he had his revenge as he had promised. For one day, while his enemy was in the street, a frightful spectre appeared with an iron mace in his hand, and said to him: "I have come to have revenge; as we have been enemies in life, we will be enemies forever in hell." And he killed him with his mace.

3. WHAT ARE OUR DUTIES TOWARD OUR NEIGHBOR?

I. Among the obligations, then, of the precept of charity, the first is to love all men, not only with an internal, but also with an external love. Hence, we are bound to exhibit to an enemy all the ordinary signs of benevolence which we show to friends. We are bound to salute him when he salutes us; and with regard to Superiors, and persons whose rank is superior to ours, it is our duty to salute them before they salute us. And if without a grievous inconvenience I can salute even an equal, and thus free him from the hatred that he bears me, I am obliged to do so. Moreover, if a person who had received an injury or wound from another should say, that he forgave the person who inflicted the injury or wound, but should refuse to remit the injury, on the pretence that it is useful to punish malefactors, I should scarcely absolve him, because I can hardly be persuaded, if there are no other just causes to excuse him, that he is free from the desire of revenge.

II. The second obligation that we owe to our neighbor is to give him alms when he is in need, particularly if he is ashamed to beg, and we have it in our power to assist him. But yet that which remaineth, give alms,[13860] is the precept of Jesus Christ. However, it is necessary to make a distinction: when a poor person is in extreme necessity, and in danger of death, we are obliged to relieve him with those goods that are not necessary for the preservation of our life. When he is in grievous necessity, we are bound to assist him with our superfluities, that is, those things that we have beyond what is necessary for our state or condition.

How many blessings will God bestow upon us if we give relief to the poor! The Archangel Raphael said to Tobias, Alms delivereth from death, and the same is that which purgeth away sins, and maketh to find mercy and life everlasting.[13861] Alms delivereth from death—that is, eternal death; for no one can escape temporal death. It purgeth away sins that is, it obtains for us the divine graces to enable us to cleanse our souls from sin. And maketh to find mercy and life everlasting; because by the mercy we show to others, God is moved to extend mercy to us, and to bring us to the glory of heaven. He that hath mercy on the poor, lendeth to the Lord; and He will repay him. [13862] When we can do nothing else, let us at least assist our neighbor by recommending him to God. If we have nothing else to give him, let us at least say a "Hail Mary" for his soul.

In the life of St. Francis Xavier, it is related that he one day asked of Peter Veglio, a man who was in comfortable circumstances, a marriage-portion for a young woman who was exposed to great danger. Peter was playing chess, and jocosely said to the saint: "How can you expect that I will give you my own property, when I am trying to win what belongs to another?" And then added immediately: "Here is the key of my desk; go, and take as much as you want." The saint took three hundred crowns, and afterwards said to his friend: "Peter, know that God has accepted your alms, and on his part I promise that, during life, you shall always have the means of living in comfort; and before you die, in order that you may be well prepared for death, you shall be warned of its approach by wine tasting bitter in your mouth. The prediction was verified. One day as Peter was drinking, his wine tasted bitter; and immediately he began to prepare for death. Thus he led a happy life, and died a happy death.

Alms, then, "make us find the divine mercy that is, mercy for past sins, but not license to sin with impunity. "For," says St. Augustine, "he who would corrupt, as it were, the divine justice by charity to the poor, shall be damned in spite of all his alms, and shall experience the divine justice."

I. The third obligation is fraternal correction, which we ought to apply to our neighbor when he is in mortal sin, or in danger of falling into mortal sin, and when there is reason to hope that the correction will be profitable to him. Go and rebuke him,[13863] says Jesus Christ. You are obliged to do this, even when the person who sins is your Superior, or even your father. And, according to St Thomas, if the first admonition has not been effectual, you are bound to repeat the correction several times, where there is reason to hope that it will be useful.

We are bound to this obligation:

1. When the sin of our neighbor is certain, but not when it is doubtful;

2. When there is no other person capable of giving the admonition, and when it is not expected that any other will give it;

3. When there is no ground for a prudent fear that by correcting him, we shall suffer a grievous loss or inconvenience. For when we have just reason to apprehend such loss or inconvenience, we are excused from the obligation of correction, because it is only an obligation of charity. But fathers and mothers are bound to correct their children, even when the correction is attended with grievous inconvenience. But we shall speak at length on this point in treating of the fourth commandment.

Remember, however, that it is frequently requisite to defer the correction, and wait for a more convenient time and occasion, that the admonition may be more profitable.

IV. The fourth obligation of fraternal charity is, when we are able to comfort the afflicted, and particularly the sick. Jesus Christ says that what is done to the poor he accepts as done to himself. As long as you did it to one of these My least brethren, you did it to Me.[13864] St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say that it was more pleasing to her to be employed in assisting a neighbor than to be united with God in ecstasy: and for this she assigned the following reason—"When I am in ecstasy God assists me; but, in relieving a neighbor, I assist God." Hence, St. Cyprian writes, "that he who assists his neighbor makes God his debtor."[13865]

I may here relate that act of heroic charity towards a neighbor which the ecclesiastical historians tell us of St. Didymus. St. Theodora was a virgin, whom a tryannical magistrate, in hatred to the faith, sent to a brothel. St. Didymus went to see her there, and said to her: "Theodora, fear no injury from me; I am come to save your honor. Take my clothes and put them on, and leave me yours. In this way you may escape unsullied from this place of infamy;" and so it was. St. Theodora, in her soldier's dress, was not recognized, and escaped unsullied; and St. Didymus remained there dressed as a woman. For this act he was condemned to death by the tyrant. Theodora, hearing of this, went to see him in his prison, and said to him: "I consented that you should save my honor, but not that you should rob me of the crown of martyrdom: this belongs to me of right. If you intended to rob me of it, you deceived me." The judge, when he heard of this holy contest, condemned both to be beheaded; and both had the happiness of suffering martyrdom for Jesus Christ.

V. The fifth obligation of fraternal charity is, to show good example and not to give scandal to our neighbor. Scandal is defined an improper word or act that leads another to sin.

Scandal is twofold—direct and indirect. It is direct when a person deliberately intends to induce others to commit sin; and indirect when he uses language, or gives an example, calculated to lead others into sin. Both the one and the other are mortal sins when they are actually the occasion of any one committing a grievous fault.

There are also two other kinds of scandal—scandal of the weak, and Pharisaical scandal. A person gives scandal to the weak when he does an indifferent, or even a good act, which is to others, on account of their weakness, an occasion of sin; for example, a young woman knows that by going to the chapel, or to the park, she gives a dissolute young man, who waits there for her, an occasion of bad thoughts. She is, in such a case, obliged, if she can do it without great inconvenience, to take away the occasion by abstaining from going there. But for how long? Must she forever abstain from going to these places? No; but only as long as Christian prudence dictates; otherwise it would be a grievous inconvenience, and to that charity does not oblige her.

Pharisaical scandal is the scandal taken by those who, without reason, and through their own malice, wish to be scandalized at any action. The occasions of this kind of scandal we are not bound to avoid, because it is not true scandal.

The worst kind of scandal is that which is given by those who are tale-bearers. They hear one person speaking ill of another, and immediately go and relate to the other what they have heard; from tale-bearing of this kind arise hatred, discord, and quarrels. For all these sinful consequences, tale-bearers have to render an account to God. Observe the advice of the Holy Ghost on this point: Hast thou heard a word against thy neighbor?—let it die within thee.[13866] Have you heard a person speaking ill of another?—let what you have heard die within you; tell it to no one.[13867] Others, though there is no intention of marriage, carry love-messages to married or unmarried women. Others perform the very office of the devil by positively tempting a neighbor to sin; and some go so far as to teach others to sin, and to point out the means of committing it—the devil himself does not go so far as this. Some (and this is a common scandal) speak immodestly before women, before young persons, and even in the presence of innocent little children. Oh, what havoc of souls do they cause! It is a saying of William of Peraldo that obscene words are the spittle of the devil,[13868] which murders souls. "It is but one person who speaks," says St. Bernard, "and he speaks but one word, and destroys thereby a multitude of souls."[13869]

Miserable is the man that gives scandal! Our Lord says: He that shall scandalize one of these little ones that believe in Me, it were better for him that a millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be drowned in the depth of the sea.[13870] Is there the least glimmer of hope for a man who is cast into the sea with a millstone about his neck? The Gospel appears to say that there is no greater hope for the salvation of the authors of scandal. St. John Chrysostom writes that the Lord is more inclined to show mercy to those who commit other more grievous sins, than to those who are guilty of the sin of scandal. What! says the Lord to the authors of scandal, are you not satisfied with offending me by your own sins? Do you wish to induce others also to insult me? In the Mirror of Examples, it is related that Jesus Christ said one day to a scandalous sinner, "Accursed wretch, you have despised what I have purchased by my blood."

A mortal sin of scandal is committed by women who go about with their bosom immodestly exposed, or who expose their limbs improperly. Also by actors in immodest comedies, and still more by the persons who compose such comedies; also by painters who paint obscene pictures, and by the heads of families who keep such pictures in their houses. The father who speaks obscenely, or blasphemes the saints, in presence of his children, and the mother who brings into her house to live among her daughters young men who are in love with them, or betrothed to them, or other suspected persons, are guilty of a still more grievous sin of scandal. Some mothers say: I do not suspect any evil. I answer, that it is their duty to suspect; otherwise they will have to render to God an account of all the sins which may follow.

Woe to that man by whom the scandal cometh.[13871] Listen to a horrible thing that happened in the city of Savona in the year 1560. I have read it in the chronicles of the Capuchins, and it is also related by Father Ardia. There was a woman who, even after marriage, did not cease giving scandal. This woman one day fell into a fit, and while she was in a state of unconsciousness, she saw the Lord condemning her to eternal fire. When she recovered the use of her senses, she did nothing but cry out, "Alas! I am damned, I am damned!" A confessor came to comfort her, but she answered, "What have I to do with confession? I am damned." Then her daughter approached the bed, in order to encourage her, but she cried out: "Ah, accursed child! on your account, too, I am damned: for through you I have given scandal to others. After these words the devils, in presence of all who were in the apartment, raised her up to the ceiling, and then dashed her so violently against the floor that she instantly expired.

The author of the Parish Priest's Companion relates that a boy, who associated with a dissolute young man was scandalized by his bad example, and lost his innocence. On the following morning, the boy went to the house of his companion, that they might, as usual, go to school together. The father of this wicked young man went to the room in which he slept, to reprove him for his sloth; but on opening the door he was driven back by a frightful spectre. The mother ran to the window, and saw her unhappy son dead on the bed, with his head hanging down, black as a coal, and covered with marks of fire. The parents learned from the boy the scandal that had been given to him on the previous day, and thus perceived the cause of the vengeance inflicted on their unhappy son.

Is there, then, no hope of salvation for him who has been guilty of the sin of scandal to others? Yes; the mercy of God is infinite; but he who has given scandal must do great penance, and must unceasingly ask pardon of God; he must also repair the scandal by giving good example, by frequenting the sacraments, and leading a life of piety.

Fearing that he had given scandal by dissuading a person from a religious vocation, St. Raymond de Pennafort left the world, and became a religious of the Order of St. Dominic.[13872] We read in the Mirror of Examples of a young woman who was tormented by the attention of a young man who had fallen in love with her eyes, that she tore out her eyes and sent them to him, with this message: "Take my eyes and do not trouble me any more." St, Euphemia cut off her nose and lips to prevent herself from being seduced. St. Euphrasia said to a soldier who made an attempt on her virtue: "If you will leave me alone I will tell you of certain herbs that will make you invulnerable," and she consented that the soldier might first try the efficacy of her receipt upon herself. After she had prepared the herbs, the simple soldier struck a hard blow with his sword upon her neck and of course cut her head off. Such were the deeds which these great women performed in order to take away all occasion of scandal.

VII. RELIGION

1. WHAT IS RELIGION?

By the first precept of the Decalogue we are also obliged to practise the virtue of religion.

It is a virtue which renders to God the honor due to him. It also includes the duty of venerating the divine Mother, the angels, and the saints. We should venerate their relics and sacred images, for in these we do not venerate the metal, the wood, or the canvas of the images, as the idolaters did, but the saints whom these images represent to us.

The vices opposed to the virtue of religion are superstition and irreligion.

2. WHAT IS SUPERSTITION?

Superstition consists in giving to God or the saints a false honor, as would be the case if a person gave to the Blessed Virgin the adoration due to God, as some heretics did, or if a person exposed false relics of the saints to the veneration of the faithful, or should publish false miracles. It is also superstition, and a most grievous sin, to give to creatures what is due to God.

Superstition contains four kinds of sin: Idolatry, divination, magic, and vain observance.

1. Idolatry, such as the worship of the pagans, who adored as gods men who were dead, and even animals, statues, and other creatures.

2. Divination consists in seeking, by an express or tacit compact with the devil, to know things that are future or occult, through his agency, as those who try to discover a theft by turning a Sieve.

3. Magic is nearly the same thing as divination, and consists in seeking to produce, through the devil, any effect that exceeds human power.

All these are most grievous sins, against which God has threatened the most severe chastisements. The soul that shall go aside after magicians and soothsayers, and shall commit fornication with them, I will set my face against that soul, and destroy it out of the midst of its people.[13873]

1. Vain observance consists in endeavoring to attain any object, or to get rid of any infirmity or pain, by the employment of certain vain and disproportionate means, such as by uttering certain words, by saying a prayer in a certain posture, with yellow candles, or with a fixed number of candles, or with the eyes closed, or making the sign of the cross with the left hand. Give up all such vain, foolish practices. Either you expect the favor from God, and in that case these things are not wanted, or you expect it from the devil, and that is a most grievous sin, because it is not lawful to have any communication with the enemy of God.

Abstain, then, from all these kinds of superstition: such as from those signs, cards, or words that persons employ in order to prevent worms from doing injury; to tie up dogs in order to remove pain, stop the flowing of blood, make tempests cease, gain the affection of others, and the like. All these are most grievous sins. He assured that all these superstitions are lies, deceits, and thefts; if you believe in them, you will lose, not only your money, but your soul also. When you meet with any tribulation, have recourse to the Most Holy Sacrament, to the crucifix, to the Virgin Mary, to St. Antony of Padua, to St. Vincent Ferrer; get some of the oil from their lamps, get a medal of the Immaculate Virgin or a little picture of a saint; so without sinning you will obtain the favor you seek; but if you have recourse to any superstitious means, you will not receive the favor you want, and you will lose your soul.

3. WHAT IS IRRELIGION?

Let us now say something on irreligion, which is an irreverence offered to God, and contains three species—tempting God, sacrilege, and simony.

1. A person would be guilty of tempting God if he threw himself into a deep pool of water to try whether God is able to save him; to tempt God in such a manner is a mortal sin.

2. Sacrilege may be committed in three ways:

First, by offering an injury to a person consecrated to God—that is, by striking an ecclesiastic or a religious. A person who strikes an ecclesiastic or a religious incurs excommunication. It is also a sacrilege to commit a sin against purity with a person who has made a vow of chastity.

Secondly, it is a sacrilege to defile a holy place by any external sin, whether in act, or in word, by theft, by speaking obscenely, by blaspheming God or the saints, etc.

Thirdly, it is a sacrilege to profane holy things, such as to receive a sacrament in the state of mortal sin, to treat with contempt the relics of the saints, the cross, sacred images, beads, and the like. It would be a still greater sacrilege to employ sacred things as a means of committing any sin.

2. Finally, simony consists in buying or selling anything spiritual for a temporal price. Hence, it is a sin against religion to endeavor to purchase by money, service, or anything temporal a relic of a saint, absolution from a confessor, any ecclesiastical order any benefice from a bishop, and other things of the same kind.

Chapter II

THE SECOND COMMANDMENT

"Thou shalt not take the name of thy God in vain."[13874]

THIS commandment imposes three obligations, not to utter blasphemies, not to be guilty of false oaths, and to fulfil vows. Let us treat each of these separately.

I. BLASPHEMY

God is honored by praise and prayer: he is dishonored by blasphemy.

1. WHAT IS BLASPHEMY?

1. Blasphemy is committed by attributing to any creature a divine attribute; for example, by saying that the devil is omnipotent—that he is infinitely holy or wise. Hence, it is a sin to believe that the devil knows all future contingent things, such as what numbers a man will throw with the dice, and the like. God alone knows all the things that are future; the devil can only know external things that have already happened, and from present things make some guess at the future.

2. Blasphemy is also committed by ascribing to God what is injurious to him: by saying, for example, Cursed be God, or bad luck to God, or in spite of God. But to say that God does what is unjust, that he creates men and afterwards forgets them, is a heretical blasphemy.

3. But blasphemy may also be committed by acts; for example, if a person should contemptuously spit against heaven, or if he should trample on the cross, on beads, or images.

4. It is also grievous blasphemy to curse the saints or holy things, such as the Mass, the Church, holidays, Easter Sunday, Christmas Day, Holy Saturday, or the like.

5. It is blasphemy to curse the souls of men, particularly of the dead, unless the curse be intended for the souls of the damned.

6. To say—not, ill befall such a saint, but—something else which conveys n0 grievous insult, is no very great blasphemy. Nor is it blasphemy to say, ill befall St. Giles, St. George, when you only refer to the place so called, not to the saint.

7. To curse creatures—such as the wind, the rain, the year, the day, and the like—is not blasphemy nor a grievous sin, but only a venial fault, provided such maledictions are not referred to God, as would be the case if a person said, Cursed be the wind of God, the day of God; and provided also that they are not creatures in which the power and greatness of God are shown forth in a special manner, as they are in heaven and the human soul. It would be blasphemy to curse the world, unless the malediction were confined to the wicked world, of which St.John says: The whole world is seated in wickedness.[13875]

8. It is not blasphemy to curse in general terms the faith of another person, provided no words such as the Christian faith, or the holy faith, be used, for, if such words be not used, the curse may be intended for the human faith, or the fidelity of the person to his word.

9. Neither is it blasphemy to curse the dead, unless the malediction be uttered or intended against the saints, or the souls of the dead. The reason why it is not blasphemy nor a grievous sin to curse the dead in general terms is, because the word dead signifies men deprived of life; particularly since the word dead is applicable, not to the souls, but, strictly speaking, to the bodies; for the bodies only die, but not the souls. I add, it is certain that a man who is living has both a body and soul: and, according to St. Thomas[13876] and the generality of theologians, it is not a mortal sin to utter an imprecation or curse against him, unless the evil implied in the curse be interiorly desired. Now, if to utter a curse against a living person, in whom there certainly are a soul and a body (without internally wishing evil to him) is not a grievous sin, why should it be mortally sinful to utter an imprecation against a dead man, without desiring any evil to befall him? I add, moreover, that they who curse the dead ordinarily do not intend to curse their souls. In general, they intend to injure not the dead, but the living, against whom they are enraged. This is not merely my opinion; I have seen only three authors who have written on this point. They all hold the doctrine I have laid down. Besides, I have asked the opinion of several learned men in Naples, and of the three celebrated Congregations of secular missionary priests, of Father Pavone, of the Archbishop and of St. George, which Congregations contain the flower of the Neapolitan clergy; and all have been of my opinion.[13877]

For my part, I know not how some persons can have courage to condemn certain actions as mortal sins, when all theologians, ancient and modern, teach that no act should be condemned as a mortal sin unless it be certain that it is mortally sinful. "One thing," wrote St. Raymond to one of his friends, "I advise you, do not be too prone to decide sins to be mortal where you have no certain proof from Scripture."[13878] And St. Antoninus taught, "unless there is express authority of Holy Scripture, or of a canon or definition of the Church, or an evident reason, it is very dangerous to determine a sin to be mortal; for even though it be not mortal, if it is defined to be so, the person who acts against this decision will sin mortally."[13879] But if the confessor cannot clearly make out that it is a mortal sin, it is not fitting that he should burden the conscience with the guilt of mortal sin. But, to curse the dead, even without internally wishing evil to them, is a sin; it is at least a venial sin, and more grievous than other venial sins. Some people have the dead always in their mouth. What a shameful vice!

2. HOW GREAT IS THE SIN OF BLASPHEMY?

Let us now say something on the enormity of any blasphemy. In the Old Law, God ordained that every blasphemer should be banished from the city and the camp, and that he should be stoned by all the people. Bring the blasphemer without the camp . . . and let all the people stone him.[13880] Not very long ago, when a man uttered a blasphemy in Venice, an officer was sent from the court to seize the blasphemer in his own house; his tongue was cut out. Even at the present day, the penalty sanctioned by the King of Naples against blasphemy is, to brand the forehead of the blasphemer with a red-hot iron, and then to send him to the galleys; but the penalty is not often inflicted, because human motives prevent the witnesses from giving testimony against blasphemers. To accuse a blasphemer through hatred of his person is not right; but it is a good and holy act to convict blasphemers, in order that the accursed vice of blasphemy, and the scandal that it gives to those who hear it, may be abolished by the infliction of chastisement.

I say the scandal; for children, by listening to the blasphemies of grown-up persons, learn to become blasphemers. What a misery to see so many little ones who know nothing about the things of God and yet know very well how to curse St. Peter 0r St. Mark. St. Peter! St. Mark! What evil have these saints done you, that you should blaspheme them? You quarrel with your wife, your master, or with a servant, and you assail the saints! The saints continually pray to God for us; and will you blaspheme them? I wonder that the earth does not open and swallow up the blasphemer! Some are found to blaspheme him who keeps them in existence! Instead of thanking God for preserving their life, and not sending them to hell, they blaspheme his divine Majesty.

Every blasphemy uttered against a saint or a holiday is a most grievous sin. St. Jerome says that compared with blasphemy, every sin is small.[13881] St. John Chrysostom says that when a person blasphemes, his mouth should be instantly closed. The holy Doctor says: "Strike him 0n the mouth; bruise it so that he cannot speak.[13882] Blasphemers are worse than the damned, for they blaspheme the author of their torments, but you blaspheme your benefactor.

Oh! what frightful chastisements have I seen inflicted by God on blasphemers! In the kingdom of Naples, a man who had blasphemed the crucifix of a certain place suddenly fell dead as he was passing before the crucifix. Not many years ago, in another place (I have spoken with a person who was present), a coachman blasphemed a saint, and was immediately upset into the water; the pole of the carriage pressed on his neck, and he was drowned. But if a blasphemer escapes chastisement in this life he shall be punished all the more in the next. Our Lord showed St. Frances of Rome the special and horrible torments of the tongue that blasphemers suffer in hell.

3. EXHORTATION

My brother, if you have been hitherto in the habit of blaspheming, endeavor now with all your strength to get rid of that accursed vice. What profit do you derive from your accursed blasphemies? You gain nothing by them; on the contrary they keep you always in beggary. You receive no pleasure from them; what pleasure can you feel in cursing holy things? You receive no honor from them, but infamy; blasphemers are avoided and hated, even by their fellow blasphemers.

But I want you to understand that unless during this mission you renounce this vice, you will never get rid of it. It increases with years, because with years your sorrows and infirmities increase; and thus acts of impatience become more frequent. Thus, you will take this vice with you to the grave. A blasphemer, who had been sentenced to be hanged, the moment he was thrown off the gibbet, gave way to the bad habit he had contracted, burst out into a blasphemy against a saint, and so ended his life. A coachman, who had the habit of this vice, blasphemed at the hour of his death, and died miserably. Make now a good confession; make a firm resolution during this mission to blaspheme no more. And for the future say every morning, as soon as you rise, three "Hail Marys," in honor of the Blessed Virgin, that she may obtain for you the grace to be delivered from so horrible a vice. And when you meet with any occasion of impatience, accustom yourself to curse the devil or your sins, and leave the saints alone. Banish forever from your mouth the curse and imprecation, and say instead: Mary, pray for me; Virgin Mary, give me patience and strength. In the beginning you will have great troub le in conquering yourselves, and shaking off the habit of blaspheming. But when the habit is once overcome, you will, by God's assistance, easily abstain altogether from this vice.

But that you may conceive a greater horror of blasphemy, listen to the vengeance that God once inflicted 0n a blasphemer. Cardinal Baronius relates in his Annals[13883] that an inhabitant of Constantinople, after having uttered a blasphemy, went to take a bath. After washing, he suddenly rushed out of the bath, crying out that he was a dead man, at the same time lacerating his legs with his nails, and tearing the flesh off his arms with his teeth. He was seized, and wrapped up in a sheet; but this, instead of mitigating, only increased his tortures, so they took it away again; but his skin adhered to it, and came away with it, and thus the miserable man died, and became the prey of the devils, who carried him off to be tormented forever in hell.

St. Gregory also relates[13884] in his dialogues that a child five years old, the son of a Roman nobleman, by listening to the blasphemies of the servants, contracted a habit of blaspheming, and was not corrected for it by his father. One evening, after having been guilty of several blasphemies during the day, he was suddenly seized with terror in the presence of his father, and began to cry out: Oh! look at those black men, who want to take me away with them! He threw himself in the arms of his father, and began as usual to blaspheme, and so expired in the act. Woe to you, O fathers! who do not correct your children when they blaspheme; and still greater woe, if you give them bad example by blaspheming in their presence.

II. OATHS

1. WHAT IS AN OATH?

An oath is an invocation of the name of God to attest the truth of what is asserted.

It is an oath to say, in confirmation of an assertion: By God, or by any saint, or by anything sacred; by the sacraments, by the Gospel, by the Church, by the cross, by the Mass. It is also an oath to swear by any creature in which the goodness and power of God shine forth in a special manner, such as when a person swears by his soul, by heaven, or by the earth.

Is it an oath to say, God lives; God sees it? It is necessary to make a distinction. If God be called on to attest the truth of what is asserted, it is an oath; but if the words be uttered by way of assertion, without calling God as a witness, there is no oath.

Neither is it an oath to say, By my conscience; or By my faith; unless divine faith is expressed or understood.

It is not an oath simply to say, I swear that such is the case; that is, provided the person who uses the words has not been asked to swear by God, or by any saint, or by anything sacred.

2. HOW MANY KINDS OF OATHS ARE THERE?

There are four kinds of oaths:

1. An assertory oath, by which a person swears to the truth of an assertion.
2. A promissory oath, by which a person swears to fulfil a promise.
3. An imprecatory oath, when, for example, a person says, May God chastise me unless I do such a thing.
4. A comminatory oath, when a person says, Unless you do such a thing, by God, I will make you repent.

3. WHEN DOES ONE SIN ON ACCOUNT OF AN OATH, AND TO WHAT IS ONE OBLIGED?

In assertory oaths, he who asserts a falsehood is guilty of sin.

In promissory oaths, it is a sin to swear without the intention of fulfilling the promise. But if, in a matter of small moment, a person swore with the intention of performing his promise, that afterwards did not adhere to it, it is very probable, as several theologians say, that he would not be guilty of a mortal sin, because God is called on to attest the present intention of the man who makes the promise, and not the future execution of the promise.

Two rules ought to be observed with regard to promissory oaths. The first is, that the oath can never oblige a person to do what is unlawful.[13885] The second is that when the thing promised is lawful, the oath is always binding.[13886] For example: if through fear of injuries threatened by a robber you promise on oath to send him what he asks, are you bound to fulfil your promise? Yes, you are bound to adhere to your promise, because, although the robber extorted the promise unjustly, there is nothing unlawful in its fulfilment. However you may go to the bishop for a dispensation from the oath, and then you will be no longer bound by the promise that had been extorted by threats. "If there is a sufficient cause, it is lawful to swear, without the intention of swearing, whether the matter is small or great."[13887] This proposition is a proposition condemned by Pope Innocent XI. But can a person swear to fulfil a promise without having the intention of taking an oath? No; that cannot be done; it would be contrary to the declaration of Innocent XI.

Imprecatory oaths bind only when the name of God or something sacred is invoked.

The same is to be said of comminatory oaths. But when the punishment threatened is unjust, the oath does not bind. Thus the oaths that fathers unjustly make in threatening their children are not obligatory; such as "By God! I will kill you, if you do not return soon, if you do not finish this work," etc.

To be lawful, an oath must have three conditions: truth, justice, and judgment.[13888] It must have truth—that is, the person who swears must be certain of the truth of his assertion; it is a sin to swear to what is doubtful. An oath must have justice, hence a person is guilty of a double sin by swearing to do what is unjust or unlawful. It must have judgment—that is, there must be a reasonable cause for taking the oath; otherwise, though the oath may have truth and justice, the person who takes it will be guilty, not of mortal, but of venial sin.

It is necessary also to remark, that he who swears falsely before a judge in a court of justice is guilty of a double sin; and should his testimony do injury to a neighbor, he is bound to make restitution for the damage done. A witness is always bound to give true answers whenever he is lawfully interrogated by a judge.[13889] But some one may say: "Father, if I told the truth, my neighbor would be damaged; through charity for him, I said that I knew nothing about him." Oh, what charity! Will you, in order to treat a neighbor with charity, commit a most grievous sin, and condemn your self to hell? It is thus that crimes are multiplied; witnesses deny what they have seen, malefactors are acquitted, and thefts, homicides, and so many other evils increase. If the guilty were punished, we should not hear of so many crimes.

4. WHEN DOES THE OBLIGATION OF AN OATH CEASE?

How is the obligation of an oath taken away? It may be taken away by annulment, by dispensation, commutation, and relaxation.

1. It may be annulled by any one who has dominative power, such as a father, a husband, a guardian, prelate or abbess; and to annul an oath a just cause is not necessary.

2. By dispensation or commutation, and such dispensation or commutation may be given by the Pope or bishop; but to grant a dispensation or commutation a just cause is required.

3. By relaxation: this may be given by the bishop, and by all who have episcopal faculties.

III. THE VOW

With regard to the obligation of a vow, I have to say to the people a few things that all ought to know: the knowledge of the rest is necessary only for Superiors or confessors.

1. WHAT IS A VOW?

It is a deliberate promise made to God to do or to omit some act, the performance or omission of which is possible, and more perfect than the opposite.

1. I said that it is a promise which is understood to be made with the intention of imposing an obligation; for if the promise be made without an intention of imposing an obligation, it is not a vow. When there is a doubt whether there was any intention of imposing an obligation, it is presumed that there was such an intention; because every act is presumed to be done as it ought. When it is doubtful whether a person has made a vow, or only a simple resolution, he should be asked whether in making it he was under the impression that, were he to transgress it, he would commit a grievous sin. If such were his impression, the vow must be regarded as a true and valid one.

2. I said a deliberate promise; because, for a vow, the perfect use of reason and free will are necessary. Hence, vows made by children before the age of seven years are not obligatory, unless it be certain that at the time of making the vow they had the perfect use of reason. Hence, also, a vow made by a person through fear excited by another in order to extort the vow imposes no obligation.

3. I have said, to do or to omit some act, the performance or omission of which is possible and more perfect than the opposite; for if the matter of the vow be impossible, the promise does not bind. But if it be in part possible, and it the object of the promise be divisible, the vow obliges to what is possible, provided it be the principal matter of the vow. I have also said, more perfect, for if the object of the vow be indifferent, or an inferior good, the vow is invalid, unless the circumstances render it more perfect.

Remember that if a person do the thing to which he bound himself by vow, although at the time of doing it he did not advert to the vow, he is not obliged to do it again in order to fulfil his promise; for, every one has a general intention of first satisfying his obligation, and then doing what is merely an act of devotion. For a person who is in doubt about having made a vow it is safer to fulfil it, but he is not strictly bound to do so. A person who is certain of having made a vow, and not certain of having fulfilled it, is obliged to do what he promised, because the obligation of the vow still holds good.

2. WHEN DOES THE DELAY IN THE EXECUTION OF A VOW BECOME A MORTAL SIN?

Many theologians say that, if one defers it for two, or at most for three years, he is guilty of a mortal sin. This is to be understood of vows the matter of which is not perpetual, but temporary—such as, to visit a holy place; to get Masses said; and the like. But when the matter of the vow is perpetual, theologians say that then to defer the execution of the vow for six months is a grievous sin.

But I entreat all, and particularly women (ordinarily speaking), to abstain from making vows. So many persons make vows, and afterwards years and years pass away, and the vows are not fulfilled. When you wish to offer anything to God, make not a vow, but a simple resolution, which imposes no obligation. And it any one sees that he can scarcely fulfil a vow already made, let him procure a commutation from the bishop, or from a confessor to whom the bishop has given power to commute the vow.

It is taken away, 1, by a change of the matter; that is, when some circumstance occurs, which, had it been foreseen, would have prevented the person from making the vow.

2. It is taken away by annulment, as we have said regarding oaths. A vow may be annulled by a father, a husband, or any other person who has dominative power. And to take away the obligation of a vow in this manner a cause is not necessary. A father or a husband may, without cause, invalidate the vow of a child or of his wife, and then the obligation of the vow ceases.

3. The obligation of a vow is taken away by dispensation or by commutation, which may be obtained from the Pope or from one's own bishop. But for the validity of a dispensation or commutation a just cause is necessary; without it it is null.

There are five vows from which no one but the Pope can dispense, namely, a vow of perpetual chastity, of entering a religious Order, of making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, to the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome, and of St. James in Compostella. These are called the five reserved vows. They are reserved only when the vows are made through a love of virtue, not when they are penal or conditional vows. For example, when a person makes a vow to enter religion if he returns to gaming, or on condition that he is freed from a certain infirmity, the vow is not reserved. It may be dispensed or commuted by the bishop, because it has not been made through a love of virtue.

Chapter III

THE THIRD COMMANDMENT

"Remember to sanctify the Sabbath-day."[13890]

THIS precept imposes two obligations: the first is, to abstain from servile works on Sundays and holidays; the second is, to hear Mass on these days.

In the Old Law the festival day was Saturday; but the apostles changed it to Sunday, a day sanctified by God over and over again, as St. Leo has remarked. For it was on Sunday that the world was created; that Jesus Christ rose from the dead; and that the Holy Ghost descended on the apostles. The precept of sanctifying the Sunday, according to St. Thomas,[13891] and the generality of theologians, is moral, so far as it is the duty of all men to employ some part of their life in the worship of God; but ceremonial, so far as it determines the exact time of this worship. So far as it is moral, all men are bound to observe it. As a ceremonial precept it is no longer obligatory; because the Old Law has ceased. Hence we are bound to the observance of festivals by a precept of the Church, which has determined the days that are to be kept holy.

I now ask, Why has God instituted festival days? He has instituted them that every Christian, having attended to the concerns of his body during the other days of the week, may attend on the festivals to the concerns of his soul, not only by hearing Mass, but also by hearing a sermon, visiting the Blessed Sacrament, recommending himself to God, and by performing other acts of piety. But how do many persons spend the holidays? In gambling, in drinking to excess, in obscene discourses. I may here tell you a story related by Surius.[13892] In the city of Dia there was a holy bishop called Stephan. Being unable to correct a great irregularity among his people who spent the holidays and Sundays in gaming, dancing, and drunkenness, he begged of God that a multitude of hideous devils might appear in the city on a certain day. So it happened, and so much terror was excited, that all cried aloud for mercy. The people promised to amend and the holy bishop by his prayers delivered them from these horrible monsters.

I. THE OBLIGATION OF ABSTAINING FROM SERVILE WORKS

1. HOW MANY KINDS OF WORKS ARE THERE?

It is necessary to distinguish three kinds of works—servile, liberal, and common.

1. Servile works, as St. Thomas[13893] teaches, are in the mystic sense sins, but literally they are the works that are usually performed only by servants. They are also called corporal works—such as building, digging, sewing, working iron, stone, or wood, and similar occupations, which require bodily labor. These are, properly speaking, the works which were forbidden in the Old Law. You shall do no servile work thereon.[13894]

2. Liberal works or occupations, which are called works of the mind, are those that are performed by men in a liberal condition of life—such as to study, to teach, to play music, to write, and the like. These are permitted on holidays, even though performed for gain. Theologians also reckon transcribing among the Liberal works, because transcribing is connected with the instruction of the mind.

3. Finally, common works, called also intermediate works, are those that are performed, not only by servants, but also by men in a liberal condition of life.

2. WHICH ARE THE WORKS FORBIDDEN ON FESTIVALS?

On festivals, servile works only are prohibited, but not those which are called liberal or common. This is the doctrine of theologians who follow the opinion of St. Thomas.[13895] Corporal works that have nothing to do with the ceremonies of worship, are called servile only so far as they properly belong to servants, but not so when they are commonly performed as well by persons of liberal condition as by servants. Before this passage, the saint had explained that in the precept of sanctifying holidays servile works only are understood to be forbidden. Hence, according to the more common and more probable opinion, it is not forbidden on holidays to travel or to fowl; because these are at least common to persons in a servile and liberal condition of life. Fishing, when attended with great labor, appears to be a servile work, as may be inferred from the canon law in which the Pope[13896] has given the dispensation to fish for sardines.

It is necessary to remark that the third commandment forbids all work connected with the law courts, such as to cite parties, to carry on trials, to pronounce or execute sentences, unless they are excused by necessity or piety.[13897]

It is also forbidden on festivals to sell goods in public shops; but this is permitted at fairs and markets where it is the custom to do so, or when the things sold are necessary for daily use, such as food, wine, beer, and the like.

3. WHAT CAUSES PERMIT SERVILE WORK ON A HOLIDAY?

1. A dispensation of the bishop or even of the parish priest, when there is a just cause for dispensation, excuses servile work on festivals.

2. Servile work on holidays is excused by any custom existing in the place, provided the custom is permitted and not censured by the bishop.

3. Charity, or the relief of a neighbor who is need, is a sufficient excuse.

4. Necessity, as when a person would not have food for the day it he did not work, or when a person works in order to avoid a grievous loss. Hence it is lawful to reap corn, to gather grapes in the vintage, to gather coin, hay, olives, chestnuts, and other fruits that are in danger of being damaged. It is also lawful to do whatever is necessary for the day, such as to prepare food, to arrange and sweep the house, to make the beds, etc.

5. Piety excuses servile work; thus, it is lawful to cultivate the ground belonging to poor churches, or to build them through charity; but this cannot be done without the leave of the bishop, or without great actual necessity.

6. Smallness of matter excuses from the violation of the precept. But what should we consider to be sufficient matter for mortal sin? Some theologians say, that to work for an hour is a mortal sin; others extend the time to two hours; but unless there is a just cause, the shortness of the time employed in work does not excuse from venial sin.

4. CONCLUSION

Some will not work on the other days of the week, and 0n holidays they are not ashamed to work for half the day, and even compel their servants and children to work. "Father," they say, "we are poor." But it is not every kind of poverty that excuses from w orking on festivals. Your poverty or necessity must be such that, unless you work, you will not have food for the day for yourself and for your family. Every one who lives by his labor is poor, and in some necessity; but such necessity does not excuse from sin.

Let children remember that when a parent commands them to work on a holiday, in opposition to the law of God, they are not bound to obey him: on the contrary, if they work, they are guilty of sin. They are excused from sin only when, if they do not work, they will suffer a great loss, or at least a grievous inconvenience; for the precepts of the Church are not binding when the observance of them is attended with grievous inconvenience.

But the servants of a master who obliges them to work on holidays of obligation should plainly say to him: "This is a holiday; I am a Christian, and I will not work." If the master compels them by grievous threats, it is their duty to leave him, and to seek a master who observes the Christian law.

I will tell you how God punishes those who work on holidays of obligation. In the diocese of Fano (Pontifical States) they were celebrating the feast of St. Ursus, the bishop and the patron of the place. A countryman went on that day to plough as usual; and when he was asked why he did not respect the festival of St. Ursus, he answered: "If he is Ursus, I am a man in want of bread." At these words the earth opened, and swallowed him up alive, with his plough and oxen; and the marks of the chasm may still be seen in the place where it happened, which is now called Villa de Rossano.

My good man, what do you expect? Do you imagine that by working on festivals you will improve your fortune? You are mistaken. By your work you will only increase your misery. There were two shoemakers; one of them lived in comfort with his family; the other, though he was always working, Sundays and week-days, was ever starving, and had nothing to give to his children. This man began once to complain of his misery, and said to the other, who always observed the festivals: "Friend, how do you contrive to live? I work and toil unceasingly, and yet I am not able to provide food for my family." The other replied: "I have a friend to whom I go every morning—he supplies me with whatever I want." The former rejoined: "Introduce me to your kind friend. The other promised to comply with his request, and brought him one morning to the church, where they heard Mass. On leaving the church the former said: "Where is the friend who provides for you?" The other answered: "Did you not see Jesus Christ on the altar? He is the friend who supports me." Thus my brethren, be assured that it is God alone, and not sin, that provides for us. He provides for all who observe his law, and not for those who despise it.

It is right that all should know (many already know it) that in 1748 Benedict XIV. permitted the inhabitants of the kingdom of Naples and Sicily to work on all holidays, except on the Sundays and principal festivals; but did not exempt them from the obligation of hearing Mass. The festivals on which they are not allowed to work are all Sundays, Christmas-day, the Circumcision (that is, New Year's Day), the Epiphany, Ascension Day, Corpus Christi; the festivals of the Conception, Nativity, Annunciation, Purification, and As sumption of the Most Holy Mary; the feasts of St. Peter and St. Paul, of All Saints, and of all the principal patrons of every city or town of the diocese. [In the United States: All Sundays in the year, the Circumcision of our Lord (January 1), the Ascension of our Lord, the Assumption of the B. V. Mary (August 15), All Saints (November 1), Immaculate Conception (December 8), Nativity of our Lord, or Christmas-day.]

II. THE OBLIGATION OF HEARING MASS

I. WHAT IS MASS?

It is the sacrifice which is offered to the divine Majesty of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, under the appearance of bread and wine.

2. HOW SHOULD ONE HEAR MASS?

To satisfy the obligation of hearing Mass, two things are necessary: an intention and attention.

1. It is necessary to have an intention of hearing Mass, so that a man who is forced into church against his will, or who enters only to look about him and see the place, or to wait there for a friend, or for any other purpose except hearing Mass, does not fulfil the obligation. But, should a person hear Mass through devotion, believing that the day is not a holiday, is he bound, when he finds that it is a holiday, to hear another Mass? No; it is enough to have done the work commanded without having adverted to the intention of fulfilling the precept of hearing Mass.

2. It is necessary to hear Mass with attention—that is, to attend to the sacrifice that is celebrated. This attention may be external and internal. It is certain that a person who hears Mass without external attention does not fulfil his obligation; for example, if during the Mass you are asleep, or are drunk, or are employed in writing, talking, or other external operations, you do not fulfil the precept of hearing Mass.

It is disputed among theologians whether a person who attends Mass without internal intention satisfies his obligation; that is, if he sees what is going 0n, but is at the same time interiorly distracted, and employed in thinking not on God, but 0n other things. Many theologians say that he is guilty of a venial, but not of a grievous sin, as often as he is voluntarily distracted, and that he fulfils the substance of the precept because he hears Mass with a moral presence. But the greater number of theologians, following St. Thomas, teach that such a person does not fulfil the obligation of hearing Mass, namely, when he is conscious that he is distracted, and not attending to the Mass, and positively wishes to continue in his distractions.

Hence I exhort you, in hearing Mass, to reflect on the great sacrifice which is being offered. Meditate 0n the Passion of Jesus Christ; for the Mass is a renewal of the sacrifice that Jesus Christ offered on the cross. Or meditate on some eternal truth—on death, judgment, 0r hell. Let him who knows how to read make use of some little book, or let him recite the office of the Blessed Virgin. Let those who cannot read, if they will not meditate, say the Rosary, or some other vocal prayers: let them, at least, attend to what the priest is doing.

Does a person who makes his confession during Mass satisfy the obligation of hearing Mass? No; for then he would attend it as a criminal accusing himself of his sins, and not as a person offering sacrifice; and it is certain that all who hear Mass offer sacrifice along with the priest.

Hence it would be advisable during Mass to offer the holy sacrifice for the ends for which it was instituted. The Mass was instituted, 1. In order to honor God; 2. To thank him; 3. To obtain the satisfaction for sin; 4. To obtain the graces we stand in need of.

During the Mass, then, we ought, first, to offer to God the sacrifice of his Son in honor of his divine Majesty; secondly, in thanksgiving for all the benefits we have received from him; thirdly, in satisfaction for our sins; and fourthly, to implore of God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, the graces necessary for our salvation. At the elevation of the Host, let us ask God to pardon our sins, for the sake of Jesus Christ, and at the elevation of the chalice, let us beg of God, through the merits of that divine blood, the gift of his love and holy perseverance. And during the Communion of the priest, let us make a spiritual Communion, saying: My Jesus, I desire to receive Thee; I embrace Thee; do not permit me to be ever separated from Thee.

3. WHAT SIN IS IT WHEN ONE IS ABSENT FROM A PART OF MASS?

There are several other things that must be noticed. First, he who is absent from a considerable part of the Mass is guilty of mortal sin. But what part of the Mass is to be regarded as considerable? According to some theologians, a person who is present from the beginning of the Offertory, or of the secret prayer which the priest says after the Gospel, to the end of the Mass, is not guilty of mortal sin; because, as St. Isidore writes, in ancient times the Mass began with the Offertory. However, the more probable and more common opinion is that it is a grievous sin to be absent from the beginning of the Mass to the end of the first Gospel. But it is commonly taught that a person who is absent from the beginning of the Mass to the Epistle, or during the part of the Mass that follows the Communion of the priest, does not sin mortally. I say that he who is not present at the Consecration, or at the Communion of the priest, does not satisfy the obligation of hearing Mass.

In the second place, you take notice that Innocent XI. condemned a proposition[13898] which asserted that the obligation of hearing Mass is fulfilled by being present at the half of two Masses celebrated at the same time by two different priests. But is the obligation fulfilled by a person who hears the half of two Masses successively—that is, the half of a Mass celebrated by one priest, and another half of a Mass afterwards celebrated by a different priest? Many theologians answer in the affirmative, provided the person is present at the Consecration and Communion of the same Mass.

4. WHERE SHOULD ONE BE TO HEAR MASS?

It must be remembered that a person satisfies his obligation, who, in hearing Mass, remains in the choir behind the high altar, or behind a wall or a pillar in the Church, 0r immediately outside the Church, though he does not see the priest, provided he is united with the people in the church, so that at any rate, from what they are doing, he may know what the priest is doing at the altar.

With respect to those who have oratories in their houses, only the following persons can satisfy the obligation of hearing Mass there: 1. The heads of the family to whom the privilege is granted ; 2. Their family, that is, their relatives and connections to the fourth degree, provided always they live in the same house, and at the expense of the privileged party, and provided that one of the privileged persons is present at the Mass; 3. With regard to servants, it is only those that board in the house, and are required by the master during the Mass—either to serve the priest, or to assist the master when he kneels or sits down, to read the meditation, or the like. [Only these persons can satisfy the obligation by hearing Mass in the oratory; the rest must go to the parish church; but this usually applies only to Catholic countries.]

5. WHAT ARE THE CAUSES THAT EXCUSE FROM THE OBLIGATION OF HEARING MASS?

1. A physical or moral impossibility is an excusing cause. A person is in a physical impossibility when he is confined to bed by sickness, when he is in prison, or when he is blind, and has no one to conduct him to the church.

2. A person is in a moral impossibility of hearing Mass when he cannot go to the church without exposing himself to the danger of some grievous temporal or spiritual evil.

Hence the persons 0n guard in cities, or in armies, or entrusted with the care of herds of cattle, or of houses, or of infants, or of the sick, are exempt from the obligation of hearing Mass, when they have no person to take their place.

Any grievous inconvenience is also an excusing cause; hence the sick who are convalescent, and unable to go to the church without great pain, or danger of relapse, are excused from the obligation of hearing Mass.

Also servants who cannot leave the house without grievous inconvenience to their master or to themselves, who, for example, if they left the house, would be in danger of being dismissed, and would scarcely be able to get employment from others.

A notable distance from church (theologians say three miles) is a sufficient excuse; a less distance excuses from sin when it is raining or snowing, or when a person is infirm, or the road to the church is very bad.

In those places where it is prevalent, the custom of not leaving home for some time after childbirth, or after the death of a near relative, is a sufficient excuse for not hearing Mass. But some absent themselves from the church, and go to public places. Such persons are not excused by the custom of the place from hearing Mass.

Persons may sometimes be excused by want of clothes, or the means of appearing in church in a manner suited to their condition; but if there be a chapel in the neighborhood in which Mass is celebrated at an early hour, they are bound to go there and hear Mass.

My dear Christians, would that I could persuade you all to hear Mass every day! Oh, how great a treasure is the Mass to all who hear it with devotion and piety! Besides the indulgences which are granted for hearing Mass, great graces are obtained (Innocent VI. annexed an indulgence of more than three thousand years to each Mass that is heard). The fruits of the Passion of Jesus Christ are applied to every one that hears Mass; for, as I have already said, each person who hears Mass offers sacrifice along with the priest, and offers to God, for himself and for others, the death and all the merits of the Saviour.

Now see what great temporal and spiritual blessings are bestowed on those who hear Mass. Three merchants one day agreed to set out together from Gubbio. One of them wished to hear Mass before his departure; but the others would not wait for him, and set out by themselves. But in passing over the river Corfuone, which had swelled to a great height in consequence of the rain that had fallen during the night, the bridge gave way, and they were drowned. The third, who had waited to hear Mass, found his two companions dead on the bank of the river, and thankfully acknowledged the grace he had received on account of having heard Mass.

Listen to another fact still more appalling. It is related that in the court of a certain prince there was a page who was so devout that he never omitted to hear Mass every day. Another page, through envy, accused him to the prince, saying that he was too familiar with the princess, his wife. The prince was so enraged, that without further examination he gave orders to some iron-founders, who had care of a furnace, to throw into it the first of his pages that should go to the place, and immediately to make known to him the result. He then sent the page who had been accused to the place in which the furnace was. On his way the page heard the bell for Mass, and waited to be present at the holy sacrifice. Not hearing immediately what he expected from the persons employed at the furnace, the prince sent the other page to see what had happened. The miserable accuser, being the first that arrived, was cast into the furnace, and burned alive. The innocent page afterward appeared, and being reproved by the prince for not having promptly obeyed his order, said that he had stopped on his way to hear Mass. The prince began to suspect the accusation to be false, sought for better information, and discovered the innocence of the devout page.

6. WHY HAVE FESTIVALS BEEN INSTITUTED, AND HOW SHOULD WE USE THEM?

God has instituted festivals that we may honor him, and lay up merits for heaven, by going to the confraternity, or to the church, to hear a sermon, to say the Rosary, to visit the Most Holy Sacrament, to recommend ourselves to the Virgin Mary, or to our holy advocates.

But how many are there who spend the festivals in dishonoring God, and gaining greater merits for hell? How do so many spend the holidays? In disputes and quarrels (how many murders are committed on festivals!); in making love, even in the church; in standing in a public place to indulge in bad thoughts, in immodest discourses with wicked companions, or in going to the tavern to gamble, to blaspheme, and to get drunk. The parish priest preaches, and some will not hear his Mass in order to avoid the trouble of hearing a sermon. Of what use, then, are holidays to such persons? They serve only to bury the soul deeper in hell by multiplying sins.

I have said that some, for the purpose of escaping the sermon, absent themselves from the church. St. John Chrysostom says that it would be better for some if they never entered the church; because they commit greater sins by their irreverences than they would by not coming at all. It would not be so criminal not to come at all to church, as it is to come in such a manner. Oh, what a horrible thing to see the irreverences which are committed nowadays in churches! And after all this, we hear of persons complaining of the rigor of the divine chastisements!

Many authors state that it was in punishment of irreverences committed in the church that the kingdom of Cyprus was lost, and fell into the hands of the Turks Eugene Cistenius, who was ambassador of Ferdinand I. at the court of Soliman, relates that at the sepulchre of Mohammed the Turks neither speak, nor spit, nor cough, nor turn about to look at any object of curiosity; and in leaving the temple they walk backwards, in order to avoid turning their back to the sepulchre. Compare this with the conduct of Christians in church! They speak in a loud tone; they look about in every direction to gaze at the women, and see who is pretty and who is ugly; they indulge in bad thoughts; and some even have the temerity to come to the church to make love, without one thought of the reverence due to Jesus Christ in the Holy Sacrament. Ah, my God, how does it happen that the church does not fall upon such persons? Why does not Jesus Christ depart from us, as he has done before now?

Verme tells us that in a church where scandalous irreverence was committed, a horrible voice was once heard at the elevation of the Host, pronouncing these words: "People, I depart hence." Then the Host was seen raised up to about the middle of the church, and the same words were again heard: "People, I depart hence." Then it gradually ascended as high as the roof, when the same words were heard for the third time: "People, I depart hence." The Host then vanished, and immediately the church fell, and the miserable congregation was crushed beneath the ruins. Ah, brethren! how can God bear with us when he sees that in order to offend him we go to the church in which he dispenses his graces to us?

III. FASTING ON VIGILS AND DURING LENT

Before I conclude this precept of sanctifying holidays, I will explain briefly the fast which the holy Church commands us to observe on vigils in honor of the festivals which occur on the subsequent day, and in Lent, as a preparation for the celebration of Easter. [We must here include the fast of the Ember days, and add the abstinence that is to be observed on Fridays throughout the year.]

1. WHAT MUST WE DO IN REGARD TO FASTING?

In the fast of the Church three things are commanded:

1. To abstain from forbidden meats; 2. To eat but one meal in the day; 3. Not to eat the meal before the hour prescribed.

With regard to the abstinence, the use of flesh-meat and of white-meats (milk food) is forbidden, except in places in which the custom exists of eating white-meat (milk food) and eggs. But this is to be understood only for vigils; for, with regard to Lent, it is certain that the use of white-meats is opposed to the condemnation of the thirty-second proposition by Alexander VII. Benedict XIV.[13899] has declared that a person who has obtained the permission of his physician and parish priest or confessor, to eat flesh-meat during Lent, or on vigils of the saints, cannot take flesh-meat and fish at the one meal, but must abstain from fish if he eats flesh-meat, but not if he uses only white-meats (milk food). [See diocesan regulations as to fasting.]

2. The second obligation of the fast is to eat but one meal in the day, and a small collation, which must not exceed eight ounces. Some persons eat at collation more—ten, fifteen, or even twenty ounces: what a fast! "But, Father, I eat so that I am still hungry after eating." But this is not enough. In ancient times Christians ate only once a day—in the evening; and except at that meal, they tasted nothing during the day. The Church afterwards permitted a collation, but not to exceed eight ounces. A person who notably exceeds the quantity allowed for collation is guilty of a mortal sin. However, young persons who have not attained the age of twenty-one, and the old who have completed their sixtieth year, and require to eat more frequently than once a day, are excused from the obligation of fasting. They also are excused who are employed in laborious business, such as laborers, weavers, masons, etc. Women who are pregnant, or who give suck, are exempt from the obligation to fasting, and also the poor, who at their one meal could not get sufficient food to support them during the day.

3. The third obligation imposed by the law of fasting is, according to the present custom, not to take the meal before mid-day. Hence to dine an hour before mid-day 0n fast days is a mortal sin, as the generality of theologians rightly maintain, in accordance with St. Thomas,[13900] who says that he who notably anticipates the hour prescribed for the meal violates the fast.

It is necessary also to remember that Benedict XIV., and still more clearly Clement XIII.,[13901] declared that persons who have obtained permission to eat flesh-meats or white-meats (milk food) are obliged to take but the one meal in the day; and at their collation they can use no other food than that which is permitted to those who are bound to fast, and are not dispensed; that is, at their collation they cannot use either flesh-meat or white-meats.

Chapter IV

THE FOURTH COMMANDMENT

"Honor thy father and thy mother."[13902]

THIS commandment principally regards the duty of children to their parents; but it also comprehends the duty of parents to their children; the mutual obligations of masters and servants, and of husband and wife.

1. THE OBLIGATION OF CHILDREN TOWARDS THEIR PARENTS

A child is obliged to love, to respect, and to obey his parents. He is bound first to love them.

1. HOW DOES ANY ONE SIN AGAINST THE LOVE THAT HE OWES TO HIS PARENTS, OR AGAINST FILIAL PIETY?

He commits a mortal sin against this obligation of love:

1. If he desires any grievous evil to his father or mother; and in this he is, guilty of a double sin: he sins against charity and against the filial piety due to a parent.

2. He sins if he detracts from the reputation of his parents, and he then commits three sins, one against charity, another against filial piety, and the third against justice.

3. He is guilty of sin if he neglects to assist his parents, as well in their temporal as in their spiritual necessities; thus, if a parent is dangerously ill, his children are bound to admonish him of his danger, and to induce him to receive the last sacraments. A child is obliged to support a father or mother when they are in great want. Son, says Ecclesiastics, support the old age of thy father.[13903] Our parents have provided for us in our childhood; it is but just that we support them in their old age. St. Ambrose[13904] says that the stork supplies its parents with food when it sees them old and unable to provide for their wants. How horrible the ingratitude of the son who, though he knows that his mother is dying of hunger, squanders away his money in the tavern!

It is wonderful what love has been shown by children to their parents. In Japan, in 1604, there were three brothers, laborers, who had to support their mother, but with all their efforts they could not give enough. What then had they to do? It so happened that the emperor had issued an edict promising a large reward to any one who should bring a thief to justice. The brothers, therefore, agreed among themselves that one should pretend to be a thief, and that the other two should bring him to prison, and so support their mother with the reward they would obtain. They then cast lots which of them was to die—for death was in that country the punishment of theft; the lot fell on the youngest, who was bound and taken to prison; but when his two brothers left him there it was observed that they embraced him with tears. When this was told to the judge he ordered the other two to be followed to their home. On their arrival there the mother was told what had been done; but she said that she would rather die than that her son should die for her sake. "Take back the money," she said, "and restore me my son." When the judge heard of this he acquainted the emperor with it, who so admired their filial piety that he settled a large pension on the three brothers. Thus did God reward their love and affection to their mother.

But now listen, on the other hand, to the chastisement that God inflicted on an ungrateful child. Bishop Abelly[13905] mentions a fact related by Thomas Cantipratensis, which occurred in his own time. There was a rich man in France who had an only son whom he wished to marry to a person far superior to him in rank. The parents of the lady consented to the marriage on the condition that the father of the young man would transfer all his property to the son, and depend on him for his support. The father consented. In the beginning he was treated with great kindness; but after some time, in order to please his wife, the son banished him from his house, and gave him but little assistance. The father came to ask relief one day when his son had prepared a great banquet for his friends, but his son drove him away with harshness and disrespect. He was, however, soon punished, for as soon as he had sat down to table a toad flew on his face which no skill could remove. Then he began to repent of the ingratitude with which he had treated his father, and went to the bishop to receive absolution. The bishop enjoined as a penance that he should go through all the provinces of the kingdom with his face uncovered, confessing his sins, as an example for other children. Cantipratensis states that the fact was related to him by a Father of the Order of St. Dominic, who had seen the unhappy man in Paris with his face horribly disfigured, and had heard the circumstances from him.[13906] Be careful, then, O children! to love your parents, and to assist them when they are in poverty, in sickness, or in prison. If you do not, you must expect to receive great chastisement from God. At the very least, he will permit your children to treat you as you have treated your parents. Verme relates that a son had banished his father fr om his house; the father fell sick and went to the hospital, and sent to his son for a pair of sheets. The son sent them to him by one of his own children. The child took only one of them to his grandfather; and when his father asked him why he had not taken both, he answered, I have kept the other for you when you go to the hospital. You see, then, as you treat your parents so your children will treat you.

2. HOW DOES ONE SIN AGAINST THE RESPECT DUE TO ONE'S PARENTS?

In the second place, a child is obliged to show respect to his father and mother. Honor thy father in work, and word, and all patience,[13907] says God. It is, then, the duty of a child to honor his father in work and word.

Hence it is a sin to reply to parents in a tone of resentment, or in a loud, disrespectful tone of voice. It is a greater sin to deride them, to mock them, to utter imprecations against them, to insult them by calling them fools, beasts, robbers, drunkards, sorcerers, miscreants, or any such opprobrious names. Words of this kind, when uttered in their presence, are mortal sins. In the Old Law, they who injured their father or mother were condemned to death. He that cursed his father or mother shall die the death.[13908] At present they are not punished with temporal death, but they are accursed by God and condemned to eternal death. He is cursed of God that angereth his mother.[13909]

It would be a still greater sin to raise the hand, or to threaten, as though you were going to strike a parent. Few shall be your days, you who have struck your mother. For the Scripture says,—Honor thy father and thy mother, that thou mayest live a long time, and that it may be well with thee in the land.[13910] If, then, he that honors his parents shall have a long life, and comfort in this world, surely the child that maltreats a father or mother shall live but a short time, and shall live in misery.

St. Bernardine of Siena[13911] relates that a young man who had died on the gibbet appeared to have the hoary beard of old age. It was revealed to the bishop, while praying for his soul, that if, in punishment of his disobedience to his parents, God had not abandoned him to the crimes which brought him to a shameful death, he should have lived to a great age.

St. Augustine[13912] tells us of a still more terrible case. In the province of Cappadocia there was a mother who had a great number of children. One day her eldest son first insulted her and then beat her. The other children did not interfere with their brother as they ought to have done. The mother was enraged at this conduct, and committed another sin; she went to the church, and, before the baptistery in which her children had been baptized, she cursed them all, begging of God to inflict on them a chastisement that would excite the terror of the whole world. All her children, accordingly, were seized with great tremor in all their limbs. They were afterwards dispersed in different places, carrying with them the marks of their mother's malediction; and she, grieving at the scourge that had fallen on her children, yielded to despair, and strangled herself. St. Augustine adds that while he was one day in a church which contained the relics of St. Stephen, two of these young men came in trembling to such a degree that every one took notice of them, but through the intercession of St. Stephen they were restored to health before the relics of the saint.

I will give another example. A young man was barbarously dragging his father by the feet along the road. When they had reached a certain place the father said: "Have done, my son; no farther: for I once dragged my father thus far; and in punishment of my sin God has justly permitted me to be dragged here by you."

O children, have you heard how God punishes those who maltreat their parents? You will perhaps say: "I have a father and a mother who are unendurable." But attend to what God says: Son, support the old age of thy father, and grieve him not in his life.[13913] "Son," says the Lord, "do you not see that your father is a poor old man, afflicted with the evils of old age? You must not grieve him in the few remaining years of his life." The Scripture adds: And if his understanding fail, have patience with him, and despise him not when thou art in thy strength.[13914] The aged sometimes appear to be unreasonable; but it is in bearing with their fits of impatience that the virtue of children consists.

2. HOW DOES ONE SIN AGAINST THE OBEDIENCE DUE TO ONE'S PARENTS?

In the third place, a child owes obedience to a parent in all things that are just. Children, says St. Paul, obey your parents in the Lord.[13915] Hence, a child is bound to obey his parents in what concerns the service of the family, and particularly in all that regards morals—for instance, when they command him not to play or associate with low companions, or to enter a suspected house, and if he disobeys he is guilty of sin.

Theophilus Rainaud relates that on the borders of France and Savoy there was a young nobleman who was disobedient to his widowed mother; for though she had over and over again commanded him to come home before dusk, and not to stay out till midnight, as was his habit, he still persisted in doing so. So one night she ordered the door to be locked. When he came and found it closed against him, and could not make himself heard, call as loud as he would, he began to curse and reproach his mother, and then, along with his brother and a servant, who were with him, he took shelter in a neighboring house. After going to rest the brother and servant heard a frightful noise, and saw a hideous giant entering the room in which the young man lay. The giant took him by the feet, stretched him on a table, and cut him in pieces with a sabre, and then gave him to be devoured by four horrible dogs. The brother and servant afterwards made search for his body, but could not find it. The brother was so terrified that he became a Carthusian, and after a holy life died a holy death.

This is how God chastises children who are disobedient to their parents. But I must say one word on the text of St. Paul, already quoted: Children, obey your parents in the Lord.[13916] Mark the words in the Lord. They mean that we should obey parents in all things that are pleasing to God, but not in what is offensive to him.

If, for example, a mother commanded a child to commit theft, or to strike a person, is he obliged to obey her? Not at all—he sins if he does obey. Thus, also, in choosing a state of life, whether to be married or to remain single, to become a priest or a religious, a son, according to St. Thomas,[13917] and all theologians, is not bound to obey his parents. However, a son who contracts a marriage that brings dishonor on the family is guilty of sin. With regard to entering religion, if your parents are poor and in great necessity, and if you can by your industry relieve them, it is not lawful for you to abandon them and become a religious. But, on the other hand, fathers or mothers who oblige their children to become priests or monks commit a mortal sin; and if they force their daughters to become nuns, or to enter a monastery, they incur excommunication, according to the Council of Trent.[13918]

Parents are guilty of sin if they force a child to marry who wishes to lead a life of celibacy, or if they hinder a child from entering a religious Order. Some parents make no scruple of turning away children from their vocation; but they ought to know that it is a mortal sin to do so. We are to be saved according to the vocation God gives us; and, therefore, the child, if he enter the religious Order to which God calls him, will be saved; but if, at the instigation of his father or mother, he remain in the world, he will lead a wicked life, and be damned. But some parents care not whether a child is damned or not, provided he remains in the family. "Such fathers," says St. Bernard, "should not be called fathers, but murderers of their children."[13919] But God will chastise them severely, not only in the next, but also in this world; he will make the very child whom they diverted from his vocation the instrument of their chastisement; for, having lost his vocation, he will abandon himself to vice, and bring ruin on the family. Oh, how many families have been ruined on account of parents making children give up their vocation! I will give you an instance.

In his exposition of the 4th and 25th psalms, Father Alexander Faia, of the Society of Jesus, relates that at Tudela, in Spain, in Old Castile, a very rich man had an only son, whom he had destined to perpetuate the family. But the son, having a vocation for the Society of Jesus, sought admission with so much earnestness that the Superiors at last received him. When his father heard of this, he went to the novitiate and made so many complaints, that to please him the son went home again. But he felt himself again called to forsake the world. Being unwilling to return to the Society, he entered into the Order of St. Francis. But the father induced him a second time to renounce the religious state. Soon afterward it happened that the old man wanted his son to marry a person he had fixed upon; but his son had selected another lady. This gave rise to so many altercations, and even hatred, that one day, in a quarrel, the son killed his father. For this he was taken, tried, and hanged.

Fathers and mothers, take care not to interfere with the vocation of your sons or daughters: do not hinder them from giving themselves to God. What greater source of consolation can a father or mother have than to see a son or a daughter consecrated to God, and leading the life of a saint? The mother of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, who was the Marchioness of Castiglione, seeing him called to the Society of Jesus, endeavored, though he was her eldest and only son, to facilitate his entrance into religion. This is the real duty of parents, to help and induce their children to become saints. And should your parents even endeavor to prevent you from entering a more perfect state, where you could serve God better, do as Theodore, a young man mentioned in the life of St. Pachomius, did. He was an Egyptian, an only son, and heir to large possessions. On a certain festival he prepared a great banquet: on that day God made him feel that all his riches would profit him nothing at the hour of his death. That very day he shut himself up in his chamber, and besought the Lord, with many tears, to make known to him the state that he ought to choose in order to secure his eternal salvation. God inspired him to go to the monastery of Pachomius. He forsook all things, and fled from his family. His mother went to St. Pachomius with an order from the emperor to restore her son; but Theodore prayed to God with so much fervor that he obtained also for his mother the grace to leave the world, and retire into a convent of nuns.

II. OBLIGATION OF PARENTS TOWARDS THEIR CHILDREN

There are two principal obligations of parents towards their children—to provide food for them, and to give them a religious education.

1. WHAT IS THE DUTY OF PARENTS IN REGARD TO THE SUSTENANCE OF THEIR CHILDREN?

A father is bound to give sustenance to his children, though they are disorderly, though they have squandered away their portion, and though they have contracted an unsuitable marriage. And why? Because they are still his children. Therefore, a father is guilty of sin if, without a just cause, he banishes a son from his house, or if at death he deprives a child of his legitimate portion, or if he refuses a dowry to a daughter who wishes to marry a person suited to her condition. But what are we to say to those inhuman fathers who squander their money in eating and gaming in the tavern, and leave their poor children in want of bread?

The most savage beasts are careful to provide food for their offspring. Men alone are brutal enough to suffer their children to die of hunger!

We may here remark, that brothers also, when they are able, are bound to provide for their brothers, and give a dowry to their sisters, when in great distress. This is the common opinion of theologians.

2. WHAT IS THE DUTY OF PARENTS IN REGARD TO THE EDUCATION OF THEIR CHILDREN?

With regard to education, it is certain that the good or ill success of children depends 0n the good or bad education that they receive from their parents. God has instituted matrimony, that, with the direction and instruction of their parents, children may come to serve God, and be saved; otherwise they would be mere outcasts, if they had no one to tell them what to do, nor to correct and chastise them if they neglected to correct their vices and improve their lives; for it often happens that, when admonition fails, the fear of punishment is effectual.

We see, by experience, that holy parents bring up holy children. St. Catharine of Sweden, because she was the daughter of St. Bridget, became a saint. St. Henry the Emperor became a saint because he was the son of St. Stephen, King of Hungary. Queen Blanche, the mother of St. Louis, King of France, was a great servant of God, and thus he became a saint. This good mother used to say to her son in his childhood, "My son, I would rather see you dead in your coffin than guilty of mortal sin." I remember another good mother, whose great care was the sanctification of her children. She would say, "I do not want to be the mother of children damned in hell."

But, on the other hand, there are fathers and mothers who care not whether their children are virtuous or wicked—whether they are saved or damned. Origen has justly said, that parents shall have to answer for all the vices of their children. It is unquestionably the fact that, ordinarily, parents are the cause of the sins of their children, though the children will have to answer for their own faults. Some fathers and mothers, through fear of displeasing a child, neglect to reprove and chastise him, and are thus the cause of his ruin. Barbarous and cruel fathers and mothers! Tell me now, if a father saw his child fall into the water and, though the child might easily be saved by dragging him out by the hair, were to let him be drowned for fear of hurting him by pulling his hair, would you not call that father cruel and unfeeling? Far more cruel is the father who, through fear of giving them pain, neglects to correct or chastise his children for their faults. Would it not be cruelty in a father to give to an inexperienced child a razor with which he might inflict on himself a deadly wound? Much more cruel is the father who gives money to his children to spend on their appetites, or who permits them to associate with bad companions, or to frequent a dangerous house; for the greatest concern of parents should be to remove their children from the occasions of sin.

When admonition or correction is not sufficient, it is necessary to inflict corporal chastisement, especially while the children are young; for when they are grown up, it is impossible to restrain them. He that spareth the rod hateth his son.[13920] Parents hate the child whom they neglect to chastise when he stands in need of chastisement, and they shall be chastised by the Lord. In punishment of not having chastised his children as he ought, the high-priest Heli and his sons all perished together in one day, by the judgment of God, as we read in the Scriptures.[13921]

But a parent must chastise his children in moderation, not in passion, as some fathers and mothers do; such chastisement produces no fruit; on the contrary, it makes children more perverse. First, they should admonish, then threaten, and in the end chastise; but always with the tenderness of a parent, and not with the harshness of a galley-sergeant; with discretion, and without imprecations or offensive words. It will be sufficient to shut them up in a room, to diminish their food, to forbid them to wear their best clothes, and, when necessary, to use the rod, but not a thick stick. Do not, therefore, touch your children while your passion continues. First allow your anger to cool, and then calmly inflict chastisement.

3. HOW DO PARENTS SIN IN REGARD TO THE EDUCATION OF THEIR CHILDREN?

1. Parents, then, are guilty of sin against the duty of educating their children, if they do not instruct them in matters of faith, and in what regards their eternal salvation. They ought at least to send them on Sundays to the parish church to learn the Christian doctrine, and not send them on errands, as some do. So their children grow up without knowing how to make their confession, and are even ignorant of the principal articles of faith; they know not what is meant by the Trinity, by the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, by mortal sin, judgment, hell, heaven, 0r eternity; and through their ignorance they are damned. But their parents will have to account to God for them.

2. A parent violates his duty towards his children, if he does not correct them when they are guilty of blaspheming, of stealing, or of uttering obscene words, or if he neglects to chastise them when chastisement is necessary; and parents are bound to inquire what kind of life their children lead, what places they frequent, and with what sort of persons they associate when they leave home. This is a duty of every parent. I should like to know, then, how is it possible to excuse mothers who allow their daughters to keep company with persons in love with them? They desire to see their daughters married, but they do not care whether they commit sin. These are the mothers of whom David speaks, who, for the interest of the family, immolate their daughters to the devil. And they sacrificed their sons and their daughters to devils.[13922] Some mothers bring young men into the house to amuse themselves with their daughters, that they may be under an obligation of marrying them, and that they may be bound with the chain of sin. But do not such mothers see that for every sin that these lovers commit they themselves are bound by a new chain of hell? "Father," they say, "there is no harm in it." Is there n0 evil in it? Do you expect that tow thrown into the fire will not burn? Oh, how many mothers shall we see condemned on the day of judgment for seeking to hasten the marriage of their daughters by such means as this!

3. Parents are guilty of sin if they neglect to make their children receive the sacraments at the proper time, or to make them observe the festivals and precepts of the Church.

4. They commit a sin (and this is a double sin) if they give scandal to their children by blaspheming, or by speaking immodestly, or by committing any other scandalous sin in their presence; for a father is bound to give good example to his children, who, like young monkeys, imitate whatever they see, but with this difference, that they more readily imitate bad actions to which our corrupt nature is inclined, than examples of virtue, to which nature has a repugnance. How can children begin to lead a life of virtue when they hear their father blaspheming, talking scandal, and insulting his neighbor, uttering imprecations, expressions of revenge and obscenity, and indicating his diabolical maxims: You must not submit to maltreatment from any one. God is merciful: there are some sins that he tolerates. Mothers say to their daughters, "You must talk, and not be so stiff and unyielding." What virtue can be expected from children who know that their father spends the whole day in the public-house, and comes home drunk; that he frequents a house of ill-fame, that he goes to confession only at Easter, or perhaps not even then? St. Thomas[13923] says, that such parents, as much as in them lies, oblige their children to commit sin. Hence arises the ruin of so many souls that are damned; because children take bad example from their parents, and afterwards give bad example to their children: and thus fathers, children, and grandchildren all go to hell. Some parents complain that their children are vicious. Do men, says Jesus Christ, gather grapes off thorns?[13924] Did you ever see grapes gathered from thorns? How, then, can the children be virtuous when the parents are vicious? It would be a miracle if they were.

Hence we see that a father who leads a bad life never corrects the vices of his children. For, after giving bad example to his children, he is ashamed to reprove them for the sins that he himself commits. And if he ever does correct them, the children disregard his admonitions. Did you ever hear of the crab that saw his little ones walking sideways, and at once scolded them, and said: "Why do you walk sideways like that?" They replied: "Father, let us see how you walk." The father walked more crookedly than they did, and therefore he never dared to rebuke them after. It is the same with the parent who gives bad example. He is ashamed to correct the faults of his children. He sees them running to the precipice, and remains silent, because he has not courage to censure what he himself does. But it is certain that a parent who does not correct the faults of his children is guilty of sin. What, then, must a parent who scandalizes his children do? St. Thomas says, that he should at least entreat his children not to imitate his bad example. But of what use, I ask, is this ignominious reproof, if the father continues to give bad example? The truth is, that when a parent gives bad example, neither corrections nor entreaties nor chastisements produce any fruit; all is lost.

4. RULE OF LIFE FOR A FATHER OF A FAMILY

A father who desires to regulate his family well should endeavor first to remove from his house all evil, and afterwards to promote virtue. What I say of fathers is intended also for mothers.

5. WITH REGARD TO REMOVING EVIL

1. A father must prevent his children from associating with bad company, or with ill-conducted servants, or with a master who does not give a good example.

2. He must remove from his house any male or female servant that may be a source of temptation to his daughters or sons. Virtuous parents do not admit into their house young female servants when their sons are grown up.

3. He should banish from his house all books that treat on obscene subjects, or on profane love, romances, and all similar works; such books are the ruin of innocent young persons. Videumaun tells us of a young man who was an example to all his fellow-citizens. He accidentally read an obscene book, and fell into such horrid crimes that he became the scandal of the entire people. His conduct was so scandalous that the magistrates were obliged to banish him from the city. Another young man, who had failed in his efforts to seduce a woman, put a book in her way that treated on love, and thus he made her lose her honor and her soul. A parent is still more strictly bound to remove the class of books that has now become so common, which, besides the other poison, contains also errors against faith or against the Church.

4. He is bound to remove from his house immodest pictures, particularly if they are obscene. Father Rho tells us that Cardinal Bellarmine went into a private gentleman's house, where he happened to see some immodest pictures; so he said to him: "My friend, I am come to entreat you for God's sake to do a work of charity in clothing the naked." The gentleman promised to do so; so the Cardinal pointed to the picture, saying: "There are the naked people I mean." Oh, how delighted is the devil when he sees in any house an immodest picture! It is related in the life of Father John Baptist Vitelli that a troop of devils was once seen in the hall of a certain nobleman offering incense to an immodest picture that hung there, in return for the souls which they gained by it.

5. A parent should forbid his children to frequent masquerades or public dancing-houses, or to act a part in comedies. He should not allow his daughters to be taught by any strange man. Oh, how dangerous is it for young women to receive instructions from men! Instead of learning to read, they learn to commit mortal sins. A parent should get his daughters instructed by a woman, or by a little brother; I say little, for even in a brother, when he is grown up, there is some danger.

Parents must be very particular never to allow their sons and daughters to sleep in the same bed, and much less in the same bed with their father and mother. They should also take care not to permit their daughters to converse alone and familiarly with any man, though he be the first saint in the world. The saints in heaven only are incapable of falling; but the saints on earth are flesh like others, and if they do not avoid the occasions of sin, may become devils. Hence, a father will do well to recommend the most virtuous and steady of his daughters to let him know secretly whenever she sees any of her sisters keep up such familiarity, or when she sees any other disorder in the family.

6. WITH REGARD TO THE ADVANCEMENT OF PIETY

1. A father should make all the members of the family ask of God every morning the grace not to offend him during the day. For this purpose they may say three "Hail Marys" to the Mother of God. The best thing would be to have half an hour's meditation in common for all the members of the house, and to make one of them read aloud the points for consideration, as is done in many families.

2. A parent should make his children receive the sacraments at the proper time; that is, the sacrament of confession at the age of seven, and that of Communion at the age of ten, as St. Charles Borromeo ordered; he should also make them receive the sacrament of confirmation at the latter age. Let him make them go afterwards to confession and Communion at least every fifteen days; but he must not force nor oblige them to go to a fixed confessor, lest they might be guilty of sacrilege. To make children fulfil strict duties, it will be very useful to accustom them to do things that are not obligatory; such as to fast on Saturdays, to say the Rosary and Litany of the Blessed Virgin every day, to make an examination of conscience at night; to make acts of faith, hope, and charity; to visit the Most Holy Sacrament; to make a novena before the seven festivals[13925] of the Blessed Virgin. For the same reason he should send his children to sermons, to the Exposition of the Most Holy Sacrament, and to other devotions that are performed in the church. Bow down their neck from their childhood,[13926] says the Holy Ghost. St. Louis, King of France, whenever he was beginning anything, used to sign himself with the sign of the cross, and say: "Thus my mother taught me when I was a child." Oh, that all parents would endeavor to bring up their children in such habits!

But the misfortune is, that they are more careful to provide for the temporal than for the spiritual welfare of their children, who thus lose both.

3. A parent should often try to instil Christian maxims into the minds of his children, and inculcate the necessity of avoiding bad company and dangerous occasions; of conforming to the will of God; and of patience under crosses and contradictions. Let him place before their eyes the unhappy state of those who live in sin; the importance of salvation; the vanity of the world; the hour of death, which puts an end to all earthly pains and pleasures; the necessity of recommending themselves to God in time of temptations; and the advantages and efficacy of devotion to the Virgin Mary. These maxims make a deep impression on the tender minds of children, they begin to practise them, and thus they persevere in virtue all their life.

III. THE OBLIGATION OF MASTERS, SERVANTS, AND MARRIED PERSONS

1. HOW DO MASTERS SIN IN REGARD TO THEIR SERVANTS?

A master is guilty of sin—

1. If he hinders his servants from observing the holidays by obliging them to work, or by not allowing them time to hear Mass. On the other hand, he is obliged to see that his servants make the paschal Communion, and fulfil the other obligations of a Christian.

2. A master is guilty of sin if he does not correct his servants when they offend God by blasphemies, by obscene words, by scandalous acts, and the like.

3. He commits a sin if he refuses or defers the payment of the wages that he promised.

2. HOW DO SERVANTS SIN IN REGARD TO THEIR MASTERS?

A servant is guilty of sin—

1. If he fails in the performance of the work for which he was hired, or if he does not obey his master as he ought.

2. If he permits any injury to his master, when he can, without inconvenience, prevent it. Indeed when such injury is not done by his fellow-servants, but by a stranger, if he does not prevent it, he is bound to make restitution.

3. A servant is guilty of sin if he leaves his master before the expiration of the time for which he was engaged.

4. He is guilty of sin if he takes occult compensation for services which he judges to be deserving of more wages than his master agreed to give him; for the following proposition was condemned by Innocent XI. "Men and women servants can secretly abstract from their masters sufficient to remunerate them for services which they judge to be worth more than the wages they receive."[13927] This proposition is condemned as false.

5. A servant is guilty of sin if he co-operates in the sin of his master, even against his will. He can be excused only in some cases, when, by refusing to obey, he would suffer a great loss, and when his co-operation is not in itself intrinsically bad.

3. HOW DO HUSBANDS SIN IN REGARD TO THEIR WIVES?

With regard to married persons, the husband commits sin—

1. If through his fault he leaves his wife in want of food or clothes.

2. If he maltreats her by beating her, slapping her face, or calling her insulting names. The wife is a companion, not a slave. Before marriage, some husbands make great promises: "You shall be the mistress of the house, mistress of me." And after the lapse of a few months, they treat their wives as slaves. "What! can I not chastise my wife when she is guilty of misconduct?" Yes; if there is a just cause (particularly if your wife fails in chastity), and if, after being corrected several times, she does not amend, you can chastise her, but with moderation. But it is not lawful to beat your wife for trifling defects, such as for saying a word in anger, or for disobedience in a matter of little importance.

3. A husband is guilty of sin if he hinder his wife from fulfilling her obligations as a Christian, hearing Mass, making her Easter Communion, and going to confession several times in the year; for a person in the world can scarcely preserve himself in the grace of God by going to confession only once in the year. "But, Father, she wants to go to confession and Communion every day." I answer, if, by frequenting the sacraments, she neglects the care of the family, you can then forbid her to go so often to confession and Communion; but it is not lawful for you to interfere, unless she fails in the good government of the house, or unless some other inconvenience arises from her frequenting the sacraments.

4. HOW DO MARRIED WOMEN SIN IN REGARD TO THEIR HUSBANDS?

A wife commits sin—

1. If she is not obedient to her husband in those things in which she is bound to obey him, and particularly in the matrimonial dues; and let wives remember that, as often as they disobey, they are guilty of a mortal sin.

2. A wife commits sin if, of the goods that are common, she spends, against her husband's will, more than her equals usually spend; for of these goods the husband, and not she, is the master. She can only spend what is necessary for the family, when the husband neglects to make provision.

3. She commits sin if she unjustly refuses to go with her husband to any place in which he wishes to live; for a wife is bound to accompany her husband wherever he goes, unless at their espousal an agreement was made to the contrary, or unless by accompanying him she would suffer serious damage, or be exposed to great danger.

4. She commits sin, when, by angry answers, she gives occasion to her husband to blaspheme. Certain wives complain that their husbands beat them continually; but when you see your husband in a passion, why do you provoke him still more?—why do you not remain silent? Do you know the fable of the oak and the bulrush? An oak and a bulrush were growing in the same place; a furious storm sprung up; the oak would not bend, and so was broken to pieces; the bulrush bent its head, and let the storm pass over it, and so received no injury. Do you understand what I mean? Be silent when you see your husband in a fury; allow the storm of his indignation to go down by itself, and you will not be beaten. This is precisely what happened to a woman who was always complaining of being beaten by her husband. An honest man said to her: "I will give you some water: if you keep it in your mouth when your husband is in a passion, he will maltreat you no more." He gave her the water: she kept it in her mouth the first time she saw her husband in a rage, and he left her in peace. She afterwards asked the man who gave her the water where he had got it. He answered: "It is to be had in every well; be silent hereafter when your husband is angry, and you will receive no more maltreatment from him."

5. St. Augustine says that St. Monica, his mother, always lived in great peace with her husband, though he was hard to be pleased, and prone to anger. Her neighbors, who had frequent quarrels with their husbands, asked her one day how she managed to live in such peace with her husband. She said, in reply: “Sisters, the disputes that you have with your husbands do not arise from their imperfections so much as from yours. You answer and rejoin, and thus exasperate their minds; and so you are always in trouble. When I see my husband in a passion I do not speak; I bear with him, and pray to God for him; and thus I live in peace. Do you the same, and you too shall have peace.”

Chapter V

THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT

"Thou shalt not kill."[13928]

GOD forbids us to do any injury to a neighbor in his person, in his property, or in his reputation. Of the injuries done to property or character we shall speak in treating the seventh and eighth commandments. Here we will speak only of the injuries done to his person.

1. WHAT DOES THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT FORBID?

This commandment principally forbids us to kill any man, or to injure his person by wounding or striking him.

The vindictive man says: "I will have your life." Life! Have you dominion over a neighbor's life? God alone is the Lord of our life. It is Thou, O Lord, that hast power of life and death.[13929] Oh, how hateful to God is the bloodthirsty man; even in this life God punishes them who shed blood. David says that they shall not live half the time that God would have given them had they not indulged in revenge. Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days.[13930] The Scripture tells us that Cain, after having murdered his brother Abel, dwelt as a fugitive on the earth.[13931] Such is the chastisement of murderers. When the deed is done, there is no rest for them; they run first here and then there, to conceal themselves from justice, or from the relatives of the murdered man, and nowadays more than formerly, for now there are no churches to fly to which have the privilege of sanctuary.

And though no one should pursue them, they will he unceasingly persecuted by their own conscience. In the "Geographical and Historical Atlas," vol. ii., we read, that Constans II., after having put to death his brother Theodosius, could never lie down in his bed without fancying that he saw his murdered brother by his side, holding in the hand a cup filled with blood, and saying, "Drink, brother, drink." To escape the torments of this vision Constans wandered through the world, but it never left his eyes, till at last he died miserably. There was also a robber who had murdered a child; after having committed the murder he imagined that he saw the child before him, and heard the child cry out: "Barbarous wretch, why did you murder me?" This apparition continued for nine years. At last the robber, being unable to bear its reproaches any longer, voluntarily confessed his crime before the judge, and was executed.

2. IS IT ALLOWED TO DESTROY ONE'S LIFE, TO DESIRE ONE'S DEATH, OR TO INJURE ONE'S HEALTH?

God alone, then, is the Lord of our life; even we ourselves have no right to destroy our own life. If any of the saints have ever caused their own death, as is related of St. Apollonia, who threw herself into the fire prepared for her by the tyrant, they did so from an inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and therefore they did not sin. But it was only folly and crime in the Donatist heretics to kill themselves and call themselves martyrs: martyrs they were, but of the devil, not of Christ; for in destroying their bodies they lost their souls.

It is also a sin wilfully to produce any serious illness, by eating to excess, or by eating food injurious to health; for we are bound to preserve our life, and to avoid all danger of death. It is likewise a sin to desire one's own death. It is, however, lawful[13932] to desire death, as St. Paul did when he said: I am straitened, . . . having a desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ,[13933] in order to go to heaven and be with Christ; or in order to be delivered from the danger of offending God, or from some great calamity, which might lead to despair, or any other sin; as Elias[13934] desired to die, in order to be rescued from the persecution of Queen Jezabel. But it is not lawful to desire one's own death through rage or impatience.

It is a mortal sin to get drunk so as to lose your senses; that is, to make yourself a beast instead of a man. What a brutal vice it is, that people cannot leave the bottle till they cannot stand, but reel every step they take, and cannot see out of their eyes! I say again that this is a mortal sin, and that it includes several mortal sins; for to the drunkard is imputed the guilt of all the sins, all the blasphemies, immodest acts, and injuries to his neighbors, which he foresees, or ought to foresee, that he will commit during his drunkenness. If in drunkenness there were no other evil, you at least wilfully deprive yourself of your senses and of the use of reason; and this cannot be excused from mortal sin. You may say, "I go to sleep, and thus digest what I have drunk." But to commit sin it is enough to take a quantity which you know from experience will be sufficient to deprive you of the use of the senses. On this vice of drunkenness you may read the learned work lately published by Father Aniello Cyril, of the Congregation of St. Peter in Cesarano: in that work he shows the great evils that flow from drunkenness.

3. WHICH ARE THE CAUSES THAT PERMIT THE KILLING OF ANY ONE?

What has been already said regards ourselves; with regard to others, I say that there are only three causes that render it lawful to take away the life of man: Public authority, self-defence, and a just war.

1. It is lawful to put a man to death by public authority: it is even a duty of princes and of judges to condemn to death criminals who deserve it; and it is the duty of the officers of justice to execute the sentence; God himself wishes malefactors to be punished.

2. It is lawful in self-defence to kill an unjust aggressor, when there is no other means at hand for saving your own life. This is the common opinion of all theologians: it is taught by St. Thomas,[13935] by the Roman Catechism,[13936] and in the canon law,[13937] in which it is said that all laws permit us to repel force by force. It is also commonly held by theologians, by St. Antonine[13938] and by St. Thomas,[13939] that it is lawful to kill a robber who, after being admonished to desist, obstinately perseveres in the robbery; and they ground their doctrine on the following passage in Exodus: If a thief be found breaking open a house or undermining it, and be wounded so as to die, he that slew him shall not be guilty of blood.[13940] But this decision is to be admitted only when the theft is very considerable; and, as several theologians hold, only when the owner or his family would be reduced to great want and inconvenience if he permitted the robbery. Theologians also teach that it is lawful to kill a person who attempts to violate your chastity, if you have no other means of preserving it.

3. It is lawful to kill enemies in a just war; and even in a war when its justice is doubtful, if you are commanded by your own sovereign.[13941] Duels and private challenges are unlawful, and are forbidden under pain of excommunication, which is incurred not only by the principals, but also by their seconds. He who dies in a duel is deprived of Christian burial. They who advise persons to fight duels incur the same excommunication.

Except in these three cases, it is always a sin to kill a man, or to wound or beat him.

4. HOW DOES ONE SIN BY CAUSING ABORTION AND BY EXPOSING THE LIFE OF AN INFANT?

It is also forbidden to cause an abortion, though the foetus should be inanimate. But when it is animated, the sin is reserved, and an excommunication incurred by the person who causes the abortion, and by all who co-operate in it by act or counsel. Oh, what an enormous sin it is to cause an abortion! to make an infant die without baptism—that is, to cause a soul to be lost for all eternity! What a barbarous remedy, to endeavor to repair the evil of sin committed by a far greater sin!

And here allow me to remind you of the great danger to which mothers expose their infants by keeping them in their own bed. For it not unfrequently happens that in the morning infants are found dead, smothered in the arms of the mother.

5. IS IT ALSO A SIN TO WISH EVIL TO ONE'S NEIGHBOR?

As it is a sin to injure a neighbor, so it is a sin to desire evil to him: therefore, as often as you by imprecation call down a curse 0n another, and desire that the evil may happen to him, you sin mortally. It is not necessary that the evil desire should last for a long time. To sin mortally, it is enough that you for a single instant deliberately desire death, or any other grievous evil, to a neighbor.

Banish, then, forever from your mouth these accursed imprecations, and accustom yourself to say, "God make you a saint; God bless you." And when any person addresses you in a tone of anger, adopt the great remedy taught by the Holy Ghost: A mild answer breaketh wrath.[13942] Answer with sweetness, "Have compassion on me; have patience with me; excuse me, I did not perceive the evil I was doing; I did not mean to offend and you will soon calm the anger of the person, and he will offer you no further offence. If a person say to you, "I wish I were dead," let your answer be: "And I wish to see you happy and in good health." Thus you will extinguish his fury. But when you feel angry, it is better to remain silent, and not to speak at all; for passion will make certain answers appear necessary; but when it has subsided, you will see that you have said what you ought not to have said, and that you have committed many sins, venial at least, if not mortal.

When you receive an injury or insult, recommend yourself immediately to God: and should a thought of resentment spring up within you, reflect on the offences that you have offered to God. He has borne with you: is it too much for you to submit to an offence from a neighbor for God's sake?

If you wish to know what sort of revenge is lawful and holy, I will tell you what a father inflicted on the murderer of his son. The history is told by Father Gifolfi, in his life of Caesar de Consulibus, whose only son it was that was murdered. The murderer, not knowing whose it was, took shelter in the palace of Caesar himself. But Caesar knew that he was the murderer of his child, and what did he do? He received him kindly, and gave him money and a horse, that he might save his life. This is the manner in which true Christians take revenge.

Chapter VI

THE SIXTH AND NINTH COMMANDMENTS

"Thou shalt not commit adultery."[13943]

OF this commandment we can say but little. St. Francis de Sales says that chastity is sullied by the bare mention of it. Hence, let each person in his doubts on this subject take advice from his confessor, and regulate his conduct according to the direction that he receives.

1. WHAT IS ONE OBLIGED TO CONFESS IN THE MATTER OF IMPURITY?

I will only observe here, in general, that it is necessary to confess not only all the acts, but also improper touches, all unchaste looks, all obscene words, especially when spoken with pleasure, or with danger of scandal to others. It is, moreover, necessary to confess all immodest thoughts.

Some ignorant persons imagine that they are bound only to confess impure actions: they must also confess all the bad thoughts to which they have consented. Human laws forbid only external acts, because men only see what is manifested externally; but God, who sees the heart, condemns every evil thought: Man sees those things that appear; but the Lord beholdeth the heart.[13944] This holds good for every species of bad thoughts to which the will consents. Indeed, whatever it is a sin to do, it is also in the sight of God a sin to desire.

2. WHAT DISTINCTION IS TO HE MADE IN REGARD TO BAD THOUGHTS?

I said, thoughts to which the will consents. Hence, it is necessary to know how to determine when a bad thought is a mortal sin, when it is venial, and when it is not sinful at all. In every sin of thought there are three things: the suggestion, the pleasure, and the consent.

1. The suggestion is the first thought of doing an evil action that is presented to the mind. This is no sin; on the contrary, when the will rejects it we merit a reward. "As often," says St. Antonine, "as you resist, so often you are crowned."[13945] Even the saints have been tormented by bad thoughts. To conquer a temptation against chastity, St. Bernard threw himself among thorns, St. Peter of Alcantara cast himself into an icy pool. Even St. Paul writes that he was tempted against purity. There was given me a sting of my flesh, an angel of Satan to buffet me.[13946] He several times implored the Lord to deliver him from temptation. For which thing thrice I besought the Lord that it might depart from me.[13947] The Lord refused to free him from the temptation, but said to him: My grace is sufficient for thee.[13948] And why did God refuse to remove the temptation? That, by resisting it, the saint might gain greater merit. For power is made perfect in infirmity.[13949] St. Francis de Sales says that when a thief knocks at the door outside, it is a sure sign he has not yet got in; thus when the devil tempts us we have a strong proof that the soul is in the state of grace. St. Catharine of Siena was once assailed by the devil for three days with impure temptations; after the third day our Lord appeared to her in order to console her. She said to him: "Ah, my Saviour, where hast Thou been these three days?" He replied: "I was in your heart to give you strength to resist the temptation by which you were attacked." He then showed her that her heart had become purer than it was before.

2. After the suggestion comes the pleasure. When a person is not careful to banish the temptation immediately, but stops to reason with it, the thought instantly begins to delight him, and give him pleasure, and thus draws the person on to give his consent to it. As long as the will withholds the consent, the sin is only venial, and not mortal. But if the soul does not then turn to God, and make an effort to resist the pleasure, it will easily go on to give its consent. "Unless," says St. Anselm, "a person repel the pleasure, it passes into consent, and kills the soul."[13950] A woman who had the reputation of a saint was tempted to sin with one of her servants; she neglected to banish the thought instantly, and so in her heart consented, and fell into sin, but only in thought. She afterwards fell into a more grievous sin, for she concealed in confession the complacency she had taken in the bad thought, and died miserably. But because she was believed to be a saint, the bishop had her buried in his own chapel. On the morning after her burial she appeared to him, enveloped in flames, and confessed, but without profit, that she was damned on account of the bad thought to which she had consented.

3. The soul loses the grace of God and is condemned to hell the instant a person consents to the desire of committing sin, or delights in thinking of the immodest action as if he were then committing it. This is called morose delectation, which is different from the sin of desire.

My dear Christians, be careful to banish these bad thoughts, by instantly turning for help to Jesus and Mary. He who contracts the habit of consenting to bad thoughts exposes himself to great danger of dying in sin, for the reason that it is very easy to commit sins of thought. In a quarter of an hour a person may entertain a thousand wicked desires, and for every evil desire to which he consents he deserves hell. At the hour of death the dying cannot commit sins of action, because they are unable to move; but they can easily indulge sins of thought, and the devil suggests every kind of wicked thought and desire to them when they are in that state. St. Eleazar, as Surius[13951] relates, was so violently and frequently tempted by bad thoughts at the hour of death, that he exclaimed: "Oh, how great is the power of the devils at the hour of death!" The saint, however, conquered his enemies, because he was in the habit of rejecting bad thoughts; but woe to those who have acquired a habit of consenting to them! Father Segneri[13952] tells us of a man who during his life had often consented to bad thoughts. At the hour of death he confessed his sins with great compunction, so that every one regarded him as a saint; but after death he appeared and said that he was damned; he stated that he made a good confession, and that God had pardoned all his sins; but before death the devil represented to him that, should he recover, it would be ingratitude to forsake the woman who loved him so much. He banished the first temptation: a second came; he then delayed for a little, but in the end he rejected it: he was assailed by a third temptation, and consented to it. Thus, he said, he had died in sin, and was damned.

3. IS IMPURITY A GREAT EVIL?

4. My brother, do not say, as many do, that sins against chastity are light sins, and that God bears with them.

I. What! Do you say that is a light sin? But it is a mortal sin: and if it is a mortal sin, one act of it, though it be only the consent to a wicked thought, is sufficient to send you to hell. No fornicator . . . hath inheritance in the kingdom of Jesus Christ and of God.[13953] Is it a light sin? Even the pagans held impurity to be the worst of vices on account of the miserable effects that it produces. Seneca says: "Immodesty is the greatest evil of the world;[13954] and Cicero writes: "There is no plague so fatal as bodily pleasure;"[13955] and (to come to the saints) St. Isidore says: "Run through all sins, you will find none equal to this crime."[13956]

In the lives of the ancient Fathers it is related that a hermit, who once by God's grace was walking with an angel, met with a dead dog that stank horribly, but the angel gave no sign of disgust at the smell that it exhaled. They afterwards met a young man elegantly dressed and highly perfumed; the angel stopped his nostrils. When the hermit asked him why he did so, he answered that the young man, on account of the vice of impurity in which he indulged, sent forth a far more intolerable stench than the putrid dog that they had passed. Lyranus writes that impurity is an object of horror even to the devils: "Luxury is hateful to the devils themselves.[13957] So much so that a magician who had frequent communication with the devil, on one occasion invoked him after having once committed a sin of impurity. The devil appeared, but would not come near him, and kept his back turned to him. The magician asked him why he treated him in that manner. The devil answered that it was on account of his impurity: "Your lust does not permit me to approach you.[13958]

Nevertheless, as St. Thomas says, the devils delight in no sin so much as in those against chastity. The reason why the devil takes so much delight in this vice is that it is difficult for a person who indulges in it to be delivered from it.[13959] And why? First, because this vice blinds the sinner, and does not allow him to see the insult that he offers to God, nor the miserable state of damnation in which he lives and slumbers. The prophet Osee says that sinners of this kind lose even the desire of returning to God. They will not, he says, set their thoughts to return to their God. And why? For the spirit of fornication is in the midst of them.[13960] Secondly, because this vice hardens the heart, and makes it obstinate. Thirdly, the devil takes peculiar delight in this vice, because it is the source of a hundred other sins—of thefts, hatred, murder, perjury, detraction, etc. Do not, then, my dear Christians, ever say again that impurity is but a light sin.

I. You say: But God bears with it and winks at it. Does he, indeed? I tell you that God has chastised no vice so severely in men as the vice of impurity. Read the Scriptures,[13961] and you will find that in punishment of this sin God sent fire from heaven and burnt five cities, along with all their inhabitants. In punishment of this vice he sent the universal deluge. For all flesh has corrupted its way upon the earth.[13962] Men were polluted with this sin; and God caused the rain to fall forty days and forty nights: thus all were destroyed, except eight persons who were saved in the ark. The deluge came and destroyed them all.[13963] We also read in the Scriptures that the Hebrews, having entered Setim, a city of the Moabites, fell into sin with the women of the place, and, by an order from God, Moses put twenty-four thousand of the Hebrews to the sword. The people committed fornication with the daughters of Moab. . . . And there were slain twenty-four thousand men.[13964] We may see any day that God chastises the sin of impurity even in this life. Enter into the hospital of incurables, and ask why so many miserable young persons of both sexes are obliged to submit to the most painful operations, to the knife and the branding-iron, and you will be told that it is on account of sins of impurity. Because thou hast forgotten Me, said the Lord, and cast Me off behind thy back, bear thou also thy wickedness and thy fornication.[13965] Because you have forgotten Me, and have banished Me from you, in order to gratify the flesh, suffer, even on this earth, the chastisement of your impurities.

Hitherto I have only spoken of the temporal punishment inflicted in this life on impure persons. But what shall become of them in the next? You say that God bears with this sin; but St. Remigius says that not many Christian adults are saved, and that the rest are damned for sins of impurity.[13966] Father Segneri says[13967] that three fourths of the reprobate are damned for this vice.

St. Gregory relates[13968] that a nobleman committed a sin against purity. In the beginning he felt great remorse of conscience; but, instead of going to confession immediately, he deferred it from day to day, until, disregarding his sin, and the voice of God, which called him to repentance, he was suddenly struck dead without giving any sign of conversion. After he was buried a flame was seen issuing from his grave for three successive days, which reduced to ashes not only the flesh and bones of the unhappy man, but also the entire sepulchre.

Listen to another horrible fact related by the celebrated Fortunatus, Bishop of Triers, in his life of Marcellus, Bishop of Paris. A lady of high rank defiled herself with this sin; she died, and was buried. After that a large serpent was seen every day entering her tomb to feed on her flesh. The inhabitants were filled with terror at the sight; so St. Marcellus went and struck the serpent with his pastoral staff, and commanded him to come no more to the place: whereupon the serpent disappeared never to return.

4. WHICH ARE THE REMEDIES AGAINST UNCHASTE TEMPTATIONS?

For those who are unable to abstain from impurity, or who are in great danger of falling into it, God has instituted a remedy in the marriage state as St. Paul says, But if they do not contain themselves, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to be burnt.[13969] "But, some may say, "Father, marriage is a great burden." Who denies it? But have you heard the words of the Apostle? It is better to marry, and to bear this great burden, than to burn forever in hell.

But do not imagine that for those who are unwilling or unable to marry there is no other means but marriage by which they may preserve chastity, for those who recommend themselves to God may by his grace conquer all the temptations of hell. What, then, are these means? I will tell you.

I. The first remedy is to humble, ourselves constantly before God. The Lord chastises the pride of some by permitting them to fall into a sin against chastity. It is necessary, then, to be humble, and to distrust altogether our own strength. David confessed that he had fallen into sin in consequence of not having been humble, and of having trusted too much in himself. Before I was humbled, I offended.[13970] We must then be always afraid of ourselves, and must trust in God only, to preserve us from this sin.

II. The second remedy is instantly to have recourse to God for help, without stopping to reason with the temptation. When an impure image is presented to the mind we must immediately endeavor to turn our thoughts to God, or to something which is indifferent. But the best rule is immediately to invoke the names of Jesus and Mary, and continue to invoke them until the temptation ceases, or at least till the heat of it is over. When the temptation is violent, it is useful to renew our purpose of never consenting to any sin, saying: "My God, I would rather die than offend Thee." And then let us ask aid: "My Jesus, assist me; Mary, pray for me." The names of Jesus and Mary have special power to banish the temptation of the devil.

III. The third remedy is to frequent the sacraments of Penance and Eucharist. It is very useful to disclose unchaste temptations to your confessor. St. Philip Neri says that a temptation disclosed is half conquered. And should a person have the misfortune to fall into sin against purity, let him go to confession immediately. It was so that St. Philip Neri delivered a young man from the chains of sin—he ordered him to go to confession immediately whenever he fell into it. The Holy Communion has great efficacy in giving strength to conquer temptations against chastity. The most holy sacrament is called Wine springing forth virgins.[13971] That is, the wine that is converted into the blood of Jesus Christ by the words of consecration. Earthly wine is injurious to chastity; but the celestial wine preserves it.

IV. The fourth remedy is devotion to Mary the Mother of God, who is called the Virgin of virgins.[13972] How many young men have, by devotion to the Blessed Virgin, preserved themselves pure and chaste as angels! Father Segneri[13973] relates that a young man, so polluted with the vice of impurity that his confessor could not absolve him, went one day to confession to a Father of the Society of Jesus. The Father dismissed him, and told him to say every morning three "Hail Marys" in honor of the purity of the Blessed Virgin, in order to obtain through her intercession the grace to be delivered from the bad habit. After several years the young man returned to the same Father, but had scarcely a venial sin to confess; when he had finished his confession he said to the confessor: "Father, do you know me? I am the person whom you could not absolve some years ago, on account of my sins against purity; but by saying the three "Hail Marys" every morning I have, by the grace of God, got rid of the bad habit." He gave leave to the confessor to state the fact in general terms from the pulpit. A soldier who was on terms of criminal intimacy with a woman heard the story told in a sermon. He began to say the three "Hail Marys," and was freed from the habit of sin. One day the devil tempted him to go to the house of the woman in order to convert her. But what happened? When he was on the point of entering he was driven back by some invisible but powerful hand, and carried to a considerable distance. He thus became more and more convinced of the protection of the Blessed Virgin; for had he entered the house, he would probably have relapsed in consequence of being exposed to the proximate occasion of sin. Let each one practise this little devotion of saying every day three "Hail Marys," in honor of the Blessed Virgin, adding after each "Hail Mary," "Through thy pure and immaculate conception, O Mary, obtain for me purity and sanctity of body and soul."

V. The fifth remedy, which is the most necessary for avoiding sins against chastity, is to fly from dangerous occasions. Generally speaking, the first of all the means of preserving yourself always chaste is to avoid the occasions of sin. There are many means, such as to frequent the sacraments, to have recourse to God in temptations, to be devoted to the Blessed Virgin; but the first of all is to avoid the occasions of sin. The Scripture says, Your strength shall be as the ashes of tow,. . . . and there shall be none to quench it.[13974] Our strength is like the strength of tow thrown into the fire: it is instantly burned and consumed. Would it not be a miracle if tow cast into fire did not burn? It would also be a miracle if we exposed ourselves to the occasion, and did not fall. According to St. Bernardine of Siena,[13975] it is a greater miracle not to fall in the occasion of sin, than to raise a dead man to life. St. Philip Neri used to say that in the warfare of the flesh, cowards—that is, they who fly from occasions—are always victorious. You say: I hope that God will assist me. But God says: He that loveth the danger shall perish in it.[13976] God does not assist those who, without necessity, expose themselves voluntarily to the occasion of sin. It is necessary to know that he who puts himself in the proximate occasion[13977] of sin is in the state of sin, though he should have n0 intention of committing the principal sin to which he exposes himself.

By proximate occasions even saints have fallen, and persons on the point of expiring have been lost. Father Segneri relates[13978] that a woman who had lived in the habit of sin with a young man called for a confessor at the hour of death, and with tears confessed all the wickedness of her life. She afterwards sent for her friend, with the intention of bringing him to God by her example. But what happened? Listen to the consequences of the occasion of sin: when the young man arrived, she fixed her eyes upon him for some time, and at last, with a gush of carnal affection, said to him: "Dearest friend, I always loved you, and I love you now more than ever. I know that on your account I shall go to hell; but n0 matter: I am willing to be damned for love of you." With these words on her lips she expired.

We must, then, avoid the occasions of sin if we wish to be saved.

1. We must carefully abstain from looking at persons, the sight of whom may tempt us to bad thoughts. St. Bernard says: "Through the eyes the arrows of impure love enter, and kill the soul."[13979] And the Holy Ghost says: Turn away thy face from a woman dressed up.[13980] Is it, then, a sin to look at a woman? Yes, it is at least a venial sin to look at young women; and when the looks are repeated, there is also danger of mortal sin. St. Francis de Sales says that to look at dangerous objects is bad, but to look a second time is still more injurious. One of the ancient philosophers blinded himself voluntarily in order to be freed from unchaste suggestions. It is not lawful for us Christians to destroy our sight physically, but we should destroy it morally by turning the eyes away from objects which may excite temptations. St. Aloysius Gonzaga never looked at women; even speaking to his mother he kept his eyes cast down upon the ground. It is equally dangerous for women to look at young men.

2. It is necessary to avoid all bad company, and all assemblies where light bantering and flirting go on between men and women. With the holy thou wilt be holy . . . and with the perverse thou wilt be perverted.[13981] If you keep company with the virtuous, you shall be virtuous; if you associate with the unchaste, you too will indulge in impurity. St. Thomas says that a man will be like the companions with whom he converses.[13982] And should you ever find yourself in dangerous society from which you cannot withdraw, follow the advice of the Holy Ghost. Hedge in thy ears with thorns.[13983] Place a hedge of thorns about your ears that you may not hear the obscene words which others utter. When very young, St. Bernardine of Siena used to blush as often as he heard an immodest word; hence his companions were careful never to use improper language in his presence. Such was the horror which St. Stanislaus Kostka felt for obscene conversation that on hearing an immodest word he swooned away, and lost the use of his senses. Young girls, whenever you hear any one speak immodestly, turn your back and go away. It was thus St. Edmund acted, as we read in his life;[13984] and one day, after having left his companions because their language was obscene, he met on his way a most beautiful boy who said to him: "God save you, my beloved." The saint asked who he was. The young boy answered: "Look at my forehead: there you may read my name." The saint raised his eyes, and read the words, "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." Jesus Christ immediately disappeared, but left the saint consolation and joy. Whenever you find yourself in the society of young persons who speak improperly, and cannot leave them, be careful at least not to listen to them: turn away your face, and show that such language is displeasing to you.

3. I will here mention the chastisement inflicted on two persons for obscene language. Turlot[13985] relates that St. Valerius, returning on a winter's day to his monastery, and not being able to reach it before night, took shelter in a private house. On entering, he found the master engaged with another man in obscene conversation; he reproved them, but they persevered in their sin. St. Valerius, though the evening was very cold, fled from the house. As soon as he departed, the owner of the house was struck blind, and his companion was attacked with a loathsome disease. They ran after the saint, and entreated him to return, but he refused. One remained blind, and the other died after being consumed by the disease. Oh! how great is the evil caused by immodest language! An obscene word may be the cause of the perdition of all who hear it. Some excuse themselves, saying that they only use such words in jest. Yet in uttering them you feel complacency! and then the scandal which you give to others! Miserable man, these jests shall make you weep for all eternity in hell.

4. But let us return to the necessity of avoiding the occasions of sin. It is necessary, also, to abstain from looking at immodest pictures. St. Charles Borromeo forbids all fathers of families to keep such pictures in their houses.

It is necessary, also, to abstain from reading bad books, and not only from those that are positively obscene, but also from those that treat of profane love, such as Ariosto's poems, the "Pastor Fido," and all such works. Fathers should not allow their children to read romances. These sometimes do more harm than even obscene books; they put fantastical notions and affections into young persons' heads, which destroy all devotion, and afterwards impel them to give themselves up to sin. "Vain reading," says St. Bonaventure, "begets vain thoughts and extinguishes devotion."[13986] Make your children read spiritual books, ecclesiastical histories, and the lives of the saints. And here I repeat: Do not allow your daughters to be taught their lessons by a man, though he be a St. Paul or a St. Francis of Assisi. The saints are in heaven.

1. Be careful, also, not to permit your sons to act plays, nor even to be present at an immodest comedy. St. Cyprian says: "Who went chaste to the play, returned unchaste."[13987] A young man or woman goes to the play full of modesty and in the grace of God, and returns home without modesty and at enmity with God. Do not allow your children to go to those feasts of the devil where there is dancing, courting, immodest singing, and sinful amusements. "Where there is dancing," says St. Ephrem, "there a feast of the devil is celebrated."[13988] "But you will say: "What harm is there in a little relaxation and amusement?" St. Peter Chrysologus says: "They are not amusements, but grievous offences against God."[13989] A certain companion of the servant of God, Father John Baptist Vitelli, wished, against the will of the father, to go to a festivity of this kind which was celebrated at Norcia; the consequence was, first, he lost the grace of God, then he abandoned himself to a wicked life, and in the end was killed by the hand of his own brother.

2. Finally, some one may ask whether it is a morta sin to make love. What can I say? Ordinarily speaking, I say that persons who give themselves up to love-making are scarcely free from the proximate occasion of sinning mortally. Experience shows that few of them are exempt from grievous sins. If they do not commit mortal sin in the beginning of their courtship, they will in the course of time very easily fall into it: for at first they speak together through a predilection for each other's conversation; this predilection afterwards grows into a passion; when the passion has taken root, it blinds the mind, and precipitates the soul into a thousand sins of bad thoughts, of immodest words, and, in the end of sinful acts. Cardinal Pico de la Mirandola, bishop of Albano, forbade the confessors of his diocese to absolve those lovers who, after being duly admonished, continued to hold long conversations together, particularly if they should be alone, or if the conversations should be of great length, or clandestine, or by night. "But, Father," some of them will say, "I have no bad intention. I have not even bad thoughts." Young men and young twirls, avoid these amatory conversations with persons of a different sex. In the beginning the devil does not suggest bad thoughts, but when the affection has taken root it will not allow you to see the evil you do; and almost without knowing how, you will find that you have lost your soul, your God, and your honor. Oh! how many innocent young persons does the devil gain in this way!

Chapter VII

THE SEVENTH COMMANDMENT

"Thou shalt not steal."[13990]

I. ON THEFT

1. WHAT IS THEFT?

It consists in taking the property of another, without a just cause, and against his will.

I have said without a just cause; for if a person were in extreme necessity, or had no other means of recovering a debt due to him, he can then take the property of another, even against his will. With regard to necessity, this can hold good when the necessity is extreme; that is, when a person would be in proximate danger of death, or of a most grievous evil, if he did not take what belonged to another; and then he can take only so much as is necessary to rescue him from the proximate danger to which he is exposed. But a person who is only in great and not extreme necessity cannot take the property of another without his consent, as appears from the condemnation of the 36th proposition by Innocent XI. And next, with regard to compensation, you may not take your neighbor's property to recover a debt due from him to you, unless the debt is certain, and you have no other means of obtaining satisfaction for it. Hence, as has been already said in the instruction On the fourth commandment,[13991] a servant cannot make to himself occult compensation for services which he judges to be deserving of more wages than he has received. To assert that he can make such compensation has been condemned by Innocent XI. I also said against the will of the owner; for it is not theft to take the property of another with his consent, or when his consent is presumed to be certain.

2. IS THEFT A GREAT SIN?

Theft, when committed in a matter of great moment with regard to the person whose property is taken away, is certainly a mortal sin, and the person who is guilty of it is condemned to hell Nor thieves, nor covetous, . . . nor extortioners, shall possess the kingdom of God.[13992] This is a sin which is punished by human justice even with death, for security of property is necessary for the peace of all states, and thefts destroy this security.

Every theft of anything of value, then, is a mortal sin, even though the whole amount should be taken away on several occasions in small quantities; so many small sums make up a large amount. If the theft be committed, not secretly, but by force, it is a double sin, because it is a double injustice. If the thing stolen belong to the church, or if the theft be committed in the church, it is a sacrilege.

3. WHO ARE THOSE THAT SIN AGAINST THE SEVENTH COMMANDMENT?

1. Not only they who take away the property of another are guilty of theft, but also all who neglect (when they are able) to pay to servants their wages, or what is due to artisans, or other persons. These are called honorable thefts—the thefts of nobles, who have no great scruple about them; but how many go to hell for this sin! The bread of the needy is the life of the poor; he that defraudeth them thereof is a man of blood.[13993] They who defraud or neglect to pay the poor man, take away his life; for he lives by the labor of his hands. St. James says that the wages due to the laborer, and not paid, cry to God for vengeance against him who withholds them. Behold the hire of the laborers . . . which by fraud has been kept back by you, crieth; and the cry of them hath entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.[13994] The Holy Ghost exhorts us to pay before night (that is, as soon as we can) what we owe to the poor. But thou shalt pay him the price of his labor on the same day, before the going down of the sun, because he is poor.[13995] You say, I will pay him tomorrow; and in the mean time he is dying of hunger. Joseramnus, the son of Lideric, Count of Flanders, in a time of scarcity, deferred to pay for a basket of fruit which he had purchased from a poor woman; in consequence of the delay three of her sons died of hunger. In punishment of this crime the count commanded the head of his son to be cut off. This fact is related by Verme.[13996] We should be ashamed to defraud the poor, whom we are bound to relieve.

2. They also are condemned to hell who do not pay pious legacies left by their ancestors. The poor souls remain in the fire of purgatory, and cannot speak. The rectors or administrators of churches are afraid to say a word, and so the Masses remain unsaid and the alms are not given away. Oh! what calamities fall On many families because they will not pay the money left by their ancestors for pious purposes!

3. They also are guilty of sin who do not pay dues to their pastors. The obligation of paying dues to pastors is imposed by a human and divine law: for they are given to the pastors for their maintenance. The pastor is bound to preach, to administer the sacraments, to assist the dying, and correct sinners, even at the risk of his life. The servant who assists you in your bodily wants has a right to support; and will you refuse to give him who serves your soul the means of living, that he may be able to assist you?

4. What shall we say of lay administrators? To them we may apply the text of David: They eat the sacrifices of the dead . . . and destruction was multiplied among them.[13997] They eat the sacrifices of the dead; they spend in banquets and drunken feasts the revenues left by the dead for Masses, for the marriage portion of poor women, and for other pious works; and what are the consequences? "Destruction is multiplied among them." Destruction follows destruction; fathers, sons, grandsons, great-grandsons, entire families, are damned.

5. "But, Father, I have a family, a wife and children; I am in great want; what can I do?" And will you go to hell for your family and children? Listen to what happened to a father of a family, who had defiled his conscience by taking the property of others in order to assist his children. At death he called for a notary in order to make his will. As soon as the notary arrived, the dying man said: "Write the following bequests: I leave my soul to the devil." The family began to exclaim: "O Jesus, Jesus, the poor man is delirious!" He replied. I am not delirious, I am not delirious; notary, write. I leave my soul to the devils, that they may carry it to hell, in punishment of the thefts I have committed. I also leave to the devils the soul of my wife, who encouraged me to steal, that she might indulge her vanity. I also leave to the devils my children, who have been the cause of my thefts." The confessor who heard his confession during life, and who was then assisting him, exhorted him not to despair, but to have confidence in God. But the dying man concluded his will, saying: "I also leave to the devils my confessor, because during life he always absolved me, and did not oblige me to make restitution."

6. Usury also is a theft. The man who lends money on the condition of (usurious) interest being paid to him annually, or even every month, commits a true theft. "But he pays the interest willingly." He pays willingly, but he must pay. What do you lose by lending that sum to your neighbor? If you do lose anything, if you could be sure of gaining something by using the money yourself, then you can make the borrower make up for your loss; this is fair interest, but then you must explain all this to him if you do exact interest. But if you lose nothing by it, what right have you to charge anything? I his is a real theft. "Lend, hoping for nothing thereby," says the Gospel. Hoping for nothing thereby; that is, you ought to lend for kindness and charity, not for gain. I will say no more, for I cannot now discuss the many questions connected with usury; for I am giving an instruction, not a lecture on moral theology. I only admonish each of you, whenever doubts arise, not to resolve them by yourself,—for passion will make you see things with a jaundiced eye, but to consult a confessor or other learned man, and to act according to the advice received.[13998] Let public usurers remember that by a decree of the Council of Lateran[13999] they are excommunicated, forbidden to receive the body of Christ, and after death are to be deprived of Christian burial. Let it also be remembered that sometimes usury is not open, but is palliated by being taken under some other pretext; all gain received must be restored. Alas! how many poor souls go to hell on account of this accursed usury! If any one feel a scruple on this point, let him confess it immediately, and apply a remedy, now that he has time; otherwise he will go to hell, where he will be no longer able to repair the evil. A virtuous young man became a monk; while in the monastery he saw his father and brother damned for the usury which they had practised, and heard one of them cursing the other. The afflicted monk asked if he could give them any relief. They answered: "No; for in hell there is no redemption."

7. They also are guilty of sin who unjustly injure the property of another, and are as much bound to make restitution as if they had committed theft, as soon as they are aware of the injury they have done. He also is guilty of sin, and bound to restitution, who hinders another to obtain what is due to him in justice; or who, by fraudulent means, by force, or by calumnies, hinders a person from getting a present or legacy, which he would probably have obtained, though it could not be said to be due to him in justice.

8. They, too, are all guilty of sin, and obliged to restitution who co-operate in theft, or in an injury to a neighbor, by command, by counsel, or by not preventing the injury when they are able to do so. Thus a servant charged with the care of any part of his master's property is bound to make restitution, if when able he does not prevent it from being injured. Servants who do not prevent an injury being done to their master, not by one of their fellow-servants, but by a stranger, are also obliged to make restitution; but others who can, with a trifling inconvenience to themselves, prevent an injury to a neighbor, are not bound to restitution; because, though they sin grievously against charity, they do not violate justice.

9. They also are guilty of theft who accidentally find the property of another and neglect to return it to the owner, when they know him, or who, when they do not know the owner, neglect to make a diligent search in order to find him. Goods accidentally found should be preserved as long as there remains a hope of finding the owner; and I add, that when the thing found is of great value, such as a costly ornament, a valuable ring, a purse containing a large sum of money, there is always reason to hope that the owner will be found, if not immediately, at least in the course of time; for he will take care to publish the loss in everyplace through which he has passed; and thus in the course of time the owner of the article lost will be ascertained.

10. They who purchase stolen goods are also guilty of sin. It is useless to say: "If I had not purchased them, another would have bought them. It is related by Verme, that a soldier stole a calf from a poor woman. With tears in her eyes, she said to the soldier: "Why will you take this calf?" The soldier replied: "If I do not take it, another will steal it." So he carried off the calf. After a time the soldier was killed, and a person saw him tormented in hell, with a devil at his side who was scourging him cruelly. The miserable man was crying out: "Why do you scourge me?" The devil answered: "If you are not scourged by me, you will be scourged by another." Do not, then, allow yourself to be deceived by the devil; do not say: "If I do not take this article, it will be taken by another." If another take it, he will be damned; if you take it, you will be damned. But you will say: "I have paid for it." But do you not know that it is stolen property? How, then, can you keep it? You have done wrong in buying it; you must now restore it.

11. They also are guilty of theft who commit fraud or injustice in buying or selling, or who do not stand to their bargains or contracts. (The catechist may here go through the different trades, and show what frauds are usually committed in each; but he should be careful not to talk of things that do not occur, or are not known in the place where he is giving instruction.) It is a theft when tailors cut more cloth than is wanted, or make people purchase an unnecessary quantity, and afterwards keep what is left, or who retain the remnants of cloth, or who charge more than they pay for the cloth that they purchase for others. Or when shoemakers glue together two pieces of leather for the sole, to make it look thicker, or make the undersoles of felt or brown paper; or use rotten old leather which they bring into shape with their pincers and hammer. Carpenters who varnish over an unsound place in the wood, or stop it up with putty, or make the person buy more nails than they use. Shopkeepers, who use light weights or scanty measures. Neither shall there be in thy house, says the Lord, a greater bushel and a less; . . . for the Lord thy God abhorreth him that doth these things. [14000] They who use light weights and scanty measures are an abomination to the Lord. Some one may inquire, if a shopkeeper who has for a long time given less than the just weight or measure to others is bound to make restitution, how is he to do so, after having defrauded so many different persons? The best way to make restitution, without injury to his reputation, is to give a little more than the just weight or measure to all who come from the quarter in which the persons whom he defrauded live. Let us proceed. Cloth carders are bound to adhere literally to their bargain. It is a theft for publicans to mix water with wine, and then demand the price of pure wine, or to make others pay for more wine or spirits than they get. Persons who mix water or earth with the coals which they sell, or who deceive the purchaser in weighing the coals. Persons who spin flax or silk, and damp it to make it weigh heavier, or mix soap or sand with it. Persons who sell goods for others, and keep a part of the price received; the entire price belongs to the owner of the goods; the sellers can retain only the wages of their labor. Then, are all these condemned to hell? Who doubts this? He who has received the property of another, and does not restore it, is damned. Oh! do you who are engaged in business or trade wish to make great profit? Always tell the truth. Cesarius[14001] relates that two merchants who had always to accuse themselves in confession of having told lies in their dealings with others, were always in poverty. The confessor said to them: "Do not tell any more lies, and I promise you that you shall realize great profit. They obeyed; and his words were verified. Having the truth always in their mouth, they obtained the character of honest men; thus they gained more in one year by the truth than they had gained in ten years by lies. Let us now proceed to speak of restitution.

II. RESTITUTION

I. WHAT OBLIGATION IS THERE OF MAKING RESTITUTION?

Some, who have taken away the property of another, regard restitution, when imposed by a confessor, as a very severe penance. But it is not a penance: it is an obligation from which neither the confessor, nor the bishop, nor the Pope can dispense. Render, therefore, says St. Paul, to all men their dues.[14002] The goods of others must be restored, or, if they be consumed, their value must be given to the owner; and if he is dead, the restitution must be made to his heirs. If the owner cannot be found, or if he have no heir, the value must be given to the poor, or must be employed in procuring Masses for the soul of the owner.

2. CAN ONE DEFER MAKING RESTITUTION?

It is also necessary to make restitution immediately. Some keep the property of others, and wish to make restitution, but say: "When I am dying, then I will restore it." So you would make restitution when you have no longer any use for the property—when you cannot take it with you! When a person is able to make restitution, and defers it for a notable time, he is guilty of mortal sin, though he should have the intention of making the restitution. He is excused from mortal sin if he defers the restitution for a short time—for ten or fifteen days, but not longer. And should his creditor suffer a loss on account of this short delay, he is bound to repair the loss; for it is certain that a thief is obliged to compensate the owner for all the damage done him by the theft. He who is able to make restitution, and will not make it immediately, cannot be absolved. For most persons find it very difficult to make restitution; and therefore he who, though able, does not make it immediately, is in danger of not making it at all.

A gentleman stole and kept a hundred pieces of gold. He went to confession, and was required by his confessor to make restitution, and perhaps under pain of being refused absolution. "Father," said he to the confessor, "I will make restitution as soon as I return home." But he did not fulfil his promise; he frequently made similar promises, but afterwards violated them. In the end the confessor said to him: "If you wish to receive absolution, go home and bring me the stolen property; otherwise I will not absolve you." He went home and brought back the money. The confessor said to him: "Give it to me." He replied: "Father, you must take it yourself; I will not give it you." Thus he made restitution. From this fact, brethren, you may learn how improbable it is that a person who has been absolved before he has made restitution will afterwards restore what belongs to others. It is certain that, unless he make restitution, he can never obtain pardon. "The sin," says St. Augustine, "is not remitted unless the property taken away is restored."[14003] Hence, St. Antonine[14004] has justly said that n0 sin is more dangerous to the soul than the sin of theft. The reason is that in other sins it is enough for the sinner to repent; but in theft the sinner cannot be pardoned without making restitution, if he is able to make it, although he should perform all possible penances.

Miserable the man who keeps in his hands the property of others! The following fact is vouched for by several authors: A usurer was obliged, in his last illness, to restore all that he was possessed of. The sick man con-signed to four persons all the money and goods that he had unjustly acquired that they might restore them to the lawful owners. After having retired to his convent, the confessor, while at prayer, saw a devil weeping because he had lost the soul of the usurer, and afterwards heard another devil saying to the devil that was weeping: "What a fool you are to weep! Do you not see that though you have lost one soul you have gained four? Attend to these four; they will easily become yours."

I repeat, miserable the man who keeps the property of another! for he will scarcely make restitution, and will probably be damned. And will he ever, even in this life, have comfort in the enjoyment of the goods of others? No; he will be continually tortured by remorse of conscience. A robber stole an ox from St. Medard; the ox had a bell suspended from its neck. The robber brought the ox to his house; and, though the ox remained motionless, the bell never ceased to ring. The night came; fearing that he should be discovered, the robber stuffed the bell with hay; but it still continued to ring. What did he then do? He took the bell off the ox, and shut it up in a box; but the bell did not cease to ring; then he buried it, but all to no purpose. At last he was thoroughly frightened, and took the ox and restored it to St. Medard, and the ringing ceased. Let us now make the application to ourselves. He who keeps the goods of another has within himself a bell which rings unceasingly, and says to him: "Unless you make restitution, you shall be damned." How can you expect peace with your conscience continually troubling you?

3. WHAT MUST HE DO THAT HAS NOT THE MEANS TO MAKE RESTITUTION?

"But, Father, I cannot make restitution." He who is really unable to make any restitution because he has a bare subsistence from day to day for himself and his family is excused from sin. For him it will be enough to have the intention of restoring the ill-gotten goods as soon as he shall be able, and of restoring as much as it shall be in his power to restore. If a person is unable to restore all that belongs to his neighbor, he is bound to restore at least as much as he is able, by saving, for example, a few pence every week. But you say: "I shall never be able to restore all I owe." No matter; it is enough for you to restore as much as you can.[14005]

What shall we say of the man who is able to make restitution, and says: "If I make restitution, what will become of my children?" And if you go to hell, what will become of you? In the life of the Venerable Father Louis la Nuza, a celebrated missionary in Sicily, who died in 1656, we read that he once heard the confession of a gentleman laboring under a serious malady, who possessed the property of others to a large amount. He exhorted him to make restitution. But the rich man answered: "If I make restitution my son will not be able to live like his equals." Father Louis entreated and conjured him not to expose his soul to certain damnation; but the gentleman remained obstinate; so he went away. On the following morning, as he was walking on a solitary road, he met four negroes conducting a man bound 0n a beast of burden. He asked where they were carrying the miserable man. They answered. "To the fire." The Father looked at the man, and discovered that he was the person who obstinately refused to make restitution. He afterwards went into the city, and was informed that the unhappy gentleman was dead. This is the end of those who refuse to make restitution, in order to leave their children in affluence.

What an excess of folly, to go to hell for the sake of leaving your children comfortable! If you go to hell, will your children release you? Listen to a story related by Peter de Paludo. A certain father of a family, through fe ar of leaving his children in poverty, refused to make restitution. To bring him to a sense of his folly, his confessor had recourse to the following ingenious artifice. If, said he to the sick man, you wish to recover from your infirmity, call one of your children, and make him anoint your body with a little fat extracted from his own flesh by fire. The sick man had three sons; but none of them would submit to suffer such a torment for the recovery of his father. Then the father became sensible of his folly, and said: "So you will not bear a little fire, to save me from death; and must I go to hell, to burn for eternity, in order that you may live in greater comfort? I should be a madman if I did so." He then restored all that he owed.

4. CAN ONE MAKE RESTITUTION BY HAVING MASSES SAID?

"And if I have Masses said for the sum which I owe, will not that be sufficient?" No; to employ the sum which is due in procuring Masses, the obligation of restitution to the owner will forever remain. But you may say: "I have given the money for Masses." But the owner wants his property, which you have taken. The only case in which it is lawful to expend the money in procuring Masses, or in alms for the soul of the owner, is when he is unknown, and when it is impossible to find him.

But there are few who make restitution. This we see experience. How many thefts are committed every day, but how few restitutions! According to the common saying: "Dressed meat does not return to the market." Verme tells us that a hermit once had a vision of Lucifer on a throne, and a devil who had just come from the earth standing before him: "Where have you been all this time?" asked Satan. "I have been waiting to tempt a thief not to make restitution," answered the devil. "Oh," said Satan, "give this fool a flogging. Don't you know, fool, that the man who has taken another's property never makes restitution? And you have been losing all this time in tempting him not to make restitution! Quick, the flogging!" Lucifer was right: "Cooked meat does not come back to market."

5. CONCLUSION

Let us conclude the instruction on this precept.

He who is aware of having in his possession the property of another, must examine whether he has got it in bad faith or in good faith. If he has received it in good faith,—that is, through inculpable ignorance that it was the property of another,—and has it still in his possession, he is certainly bound to restore it. If, during his good faith, he consumed it, he is obliged to restore as much as he is made richer by the consumption of it; that is, what has been spared and still remains of his own property, which would have been spent, had he not used what belonged to another.

If, during his good faith, or sincere belief that the goods of another in his possession were his own, he consumed them all, and is not made richer by the use of them, he is not bound to any restitution. But if he has, in bad faith, or culpably, got possession of the property of another, he is bound to restore what he has taken, and to indemnify the owner for all the losses caused, even accidentally, by his injustice. To this he is bound, if he wishes to be saved. If he is unwilling to make restitution, and wishes to be damned, he has his choice; but let him remember that he will have to repent, not only in the next life in hell, but also in this life.

The prophet Zachary says, that a malediction falls on the house into which a neighbor's property enters. This is the curse that goeth over the face of the earth, . . . it shall come to the house of the thief, . . . and shall consume it.[14006] Hence, St. Gregory Nazianzen says: He who possesses wealth unjustly, shall lose even his own riches.[14007] The goods of others are a fire that consumes themselves and the goods of the possessor. Such are the effects of the divine malediction. Let us, then, says St. Gregory,[14008] possess the goods that the Lord sends us; but let us not allow ourselves to be possessed by the goods of this earth. Some become the slaves of earthly goods to such a degree that for them they voluntarily condemn themselves to hell. O misery! how many poor souls go to hell on account of other men's property!

How differently does the wise man act who loves his soul better than other people's goods! Henry, King of Castile, left his son the heir to his kingdom; but because the son was only a child, he entrusted the government to his brother. The brother governed the kingdom with so much rectitude, that the people wished him to assume the absolute dominion of the kingdom. What did he do? He one day appeared before the people with his infant nephew in his arms, and said that the kingdom belonged to the child, and that he would spend his blood and his life in order to secure it for him. What a noble act, to renounce a kingdom rather than offend God! But God amply rewarded his fidelity; for he brought him to the throne of Aragon, where he reigned in peace, and his family was replenished with abundance of blessings.

St. Augustine relates an act of similar generosity. In the city of Milan a poor man found a purse containing two hundred pounds. He was told that since the owner was not known he might keep the money. But he feared God, and put up along the public road many notices, stating that he had found the purse. The owner appeared, and having accurately described the lost property, received the purse from the poor man He offered the poor man twenty pounds as a reward, but he refused to accept them. The owner then entreated him to take ten or at least five pounds. But the poor man refused, saying that they all belonged to the owner. The owner, as if angry, threw the purse at the feet of the poor man, saying: "Since you will take nothing from me, I will take nothing from you." The poor man was thus forced to accept the offer; but he did not retain the money. He went instantly and distributed it among the other poor of the city.

Chapter VIII

THE EIGHTH COMMANDMENT

"Thou shall not bear false witness."[14009]

1. WHAT DOES THIS COMMANDMENT FORBID IN THE FIRST PLACE?

THE chief thing forbidden in this commandment is to give false testimony in a court of justice. When you are interrogated by a legitimate judge, you are bound to tell the truth; and if you do not disclose it, and say that you know nothing about it, you are guilty of sin. But some one may say: "I have concealed the truth that my neighbor might not be injured." This excuse is not sufficient, as I have already said,[14010] in treating of the second commandment. When asked by lawful authority, you are bound to tell what you know, though it should be the cause of a loss to your neighbor. This is a just loss; for the public good requires that malefactors should be punished. But they cannot be punished if witnesses do not depose to what they know.

He, however, commits a more grievous sin who in a court of justice attests a falsehood detrimental to his neighbor. A lie is always sinful, though it should be told in jest, or even for a useful purpose; even though it be in order to escape death. The author of the "Parish Priests Companion" relates that the Emperor Maximian sent his officers to take St Anthimus, Bishop of Nicomedia, and put him in prison. The soldiers who were in search of him went by chance to the saint's own house to get something to eat. St. Anthimus gave them what they required, and treated them kindly. Afterwards they asked him where they could find Anthimus the bishop. The saint answered: "I am the very person; I am Anthimus." The soldiers, through gratitude, said: "We will not take you to the emperor; we will say that we have not been able to find you." The saint replied: "No, my children, I do not wish you to be guilty of a lie; I would rather die than cause you to tell a lie." He then went with them to the emperor.

A lie, then, is always a sin. To tell a lie which is not injurious to a neighbor is only a venial sin; but when it does a grievous injury to another, it is a mortal sin. It is of such lies that we are to understand the text of Scripture, The mouth that belieth, killeth the soul.[14011] A lie told before a judge is a double mortal sin; and when accompanied with an oath, as is always the case in courts of justice, it contains the additional guilt of sacrilege, on account of the false oath, which is a most grievous sin, and a reserved sin. Tenesius, the legislator, ordained that an executioner should stand at the right hand of the judge, with an axe in his hand, to put to death any one that perjured himself in judgment. Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment, . . . and all the people shall say, Amen.[14012] Eusebius[14013] relates that three witnesses made false accusations before a judge against Narcissus the bishop. The first said: "If the charge is not true, I am willing to be burnt alive. The second said: "I am satisfied to die of the jaundice." The third said: "I am willing to be deprived of sight." In a little time the three imprecations were verified. One became blind, another died of jaundice, and the third was reduced to ashes by lightning.

2. WHAT DOES THIS COMMANDMENT FORBID IN THE SECOND PLACE?

This commandment forbids detraction. This, too, is a very common sin. You will, says St. Jerome, find few persons who do not willingly censure the conduct of others.[14014] Find me a man, says St. James, who does not sin with the tongue, and I will admit that he is a saint. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man.[14015] When the tongue of a sick man is black, we may infer that he is in danger. The tongue is often a better index than the pulse of the malignity of disease: sometimes the pulse does not show symptoms of high fever; but when the tongue is black and foul, it is (as Hippocrates says) a sign of the approach of death. Many come to the church, frequently hear Mass, and say the Rosary; but their tongue, black with the sin of detraction, gives a token of eternal death. St. Bernard says that detraction is a three-edged sword, which, with a single stroke, inflicts three wounds: it wounds the detractor with sin, the person detracted by the loss of his character, and it wounds those who listen to it; for he who listens to detraction, and shows that it is pleasing to him, is also guilty of sin.

3. WHAT IS DETRACTION?

Let us now explain what this sin is. Detraction is twofold: calumny and defamation.

1. Calumny consists in telling a falsehood injurious to a neighbor, or in aggravating his guilt. When grievously injurious to another, it is a mortal sin, and the author of it is bound to restore the character of his neighbor.

2. Defamation consists in telling a secret sin of another to those who are ignorant of it; this, too, when grievous, is a mortal sin, because the person defamed, as long as his sin is occult, retains his good name; you rob him of it by revealing his sin, and when he has lost his reputation, he can no longer show himself in the world.

4. WHAT ARE THE DIFFERENT WAYS OF SINNING BY DETRACTION?

There are various ways of taking away the reputation of another.

1. By open defamation—by saying: Such a person has been guilty of such a sin, etc.

2. By indirect defamation; by saying, for example: Such a man goes frequently to confession; but, I . . . had better not say. It is sometimes less injurious to tell the sin openly, for the insinuation conveyed by that little but will make persons think that the evil is greater than it is in reality.

3. By censuring the motive of a person's actions. Some cannot find fault with their neighbor's conduct, because it is blameless. What, then, do they do? They censure his motive or intention. They say: He has acted thus in order to deceive others.

4. By signs. He who is guilty of this kind of detraction is called in Scripture a man full of tongue.[14016] A man full of tongue; that is, a man who makes all his limbs into tongues, who detracts his neighbor not only with the tongue, but also with the hands, with the feet, and with the eyes. A young man of this character, who could not speak without calumniating his neighbor, was punished in a terrible way for his sin. He became mad, and bit off his tongue, the smell of his breath became intolerable, and so he died. Would to God that there were not many addicted to this vice! The poison of asps is under their lips.[14017] Their mouth appears to be full of poison, so that they cannot speak without destroying the reputation, now of this man, now of that one.

5. Some are in the habit of listening and of afterwards relating what they have heard. They hear a person speak ill of another, and instantly go to the other and tell what they have heard. These are called backbiters, and are accursed by God, because they perform the office of the devil: they disturb the peace of families, of entire towns, and are the cause of so much hatred and of so many quarrels. Of this vice I have already spoken in the instruction on the precept of charity.[14018]

Take heed, my dear Christians, how you speak; . . . be careful not to allow your tongue to send you to hell. In The Mirror of Examples it is related that one of the damned was seen, in a vision, biting and gnawing his ulcerated and scorched tongue, and saying: "This accursed tongue has sent me to hell."

When a person's sin is public, to tell it, without a just cause, to one who is ignorant of it, is not a mortal sin, but it is a venial sin against charity; but remember that it is a mortal sin to reveal a fact that was once notorious but is now occult; because the person who had lost his reputation has now regained it.

5. HOW ARE WE TO REPAIR THE EVIL CAUSED BY DETRACTION?

Let us now come to the remedies. He who has injured the character of another must not only confess the sin, but must also restore the good name that he has taken away. In this there is great difficulty: it is easy to take away, but most difficult to restore, a good name.

When the defamation is effected by falsehood, the author of it is obliged to retract his calumny in the presence of all those before whom it was uttered; but this is the difficulty. Menochius relates that a nobleman had defamed a married lady, and confessed his sin to a Dominican friar, who told him: "You must retract what you have said." The nobleman replied. "I cannot do that; for I cannot destroy my own reputation." The confessor replied, he could not give him absolution on any other condition; but the obstinate man again declared that he could not do so. The friar at last, seeing that he was only wasting his time, said to him: "Go away: you are damned," and turned his back upon him.

If the sin were true, but hidden, there is also, as I have already said,[14019] an obligation of restoring the injured character; and in this there is still greater difficulty; for, if the person really committed the sin, it cannot be said that he was innocent of it, for that would be a lie, and it is never lawful to tell a lie. What, then, is to be done? The detractor must use some other and more convenient means, some equivocation, for instance, such as: "It was only a joke what I said of that man—it was all out of my own head." Sometimes it is better to speak well of the person whom you have calumniated without making any allusion to the sin you have told of him, particularly when you have reason to presume that this would be more pleasing to him than to revive the remembrance of his fault.

It is, however, necessary to know that it is not detraction, nor a sin, to tell a fault of another to his Superiors, parents, guardians, or masters, that they may prevent evil to the public, or to an innocent person, or to the delinquent himself. For example, if a girl is familiar with a young man, or if a young man goes to a house of bad character, and you make it known to the father that he may apply a remedy, you are not guilty of sin.

On the contrary, you are obliged to do this when it can be done without danger of any great harm to yourself. Nor is this, as I have said, detraction. St. Thomas[14020] says that to speak ill of another is sinful when it is done to blacken his character, but not when it is done to prevent his sin or injury.

6. IS IT ALSO A SIN TO LISTEN TO DETRACTION?

I said that detraction is sinful. But is it a sin to listen to detraction? A very great sin if you encourage the detraction, or if you take pleasure in it and show you are pleased with it. But if a person does not show himself pleased with the detraction, but through a certain fear neglects to reprove the detractor, he is not, according to St. Thomas,[14021] guilty of a mortal sin, because he is not sure that his correction will have the effect of preventing the detraction. But this is to be understood only of those who are not Superiors; for the Superior of a person who is guilty of detraction is always obliged to correct him and to stop the detraction. When a person hears detraction going on, and perceives that the matter is important and secret, he should either correct the detraction, or endeavor to change the subject of conversation, or go away, 0r at least show by his countenance that he is displeased with the detraction.

7. WHAT DOES THIS COMMANDMENT FORBID IN THE THIRD PLACE?

*T*his commandment forbids contumely. Contumely is an insult offered to a person in his presence. Detraction destroys the character of a neighbor; contumely takes away his honor. When contumely contains defamatory matter, it is a double sin, because it injures the honor as well as the good name of the neighbor.

Hence, as there is an obligation of restoring a neighbor's reputation, so there is also an obligation of repairing the injury done to his honor by asking pardon, or by some other act of humility towards him.

When contumely is offered (and it may be offered either by acts or by words) in the presence of others, the reparation must be made before the same persons.

To open another's letter is a species of contumely, and therefore it is always a sin, unless there is a presumption that the person who sends the letter or the person to whom it is sent is not unwilling that it be read.

It is also a sin to disclose, without a just cause, a secret which is entrusted to you or which you promise to keep. With regard to the just causes of revealing a secret, ask your confessor and follow his advice.

Is it a sin to entertain rash judgment? Yes; to judge rashly—a very great sin when the judgment is on an important matter, and really rash, that is, made without any reason, without certain grounds. But when there is any foundation for judging so, it is not a sin. To suspect evil of another without grounds is a venial sin; it scarcely amounts to a mortal sin unless when a person voluntarily and without any grounds suspects a neighbor of a most grievous sin. I have said without any reason; for when there is some foundation for the suspicion there is no sin. However, the virtuous always think well and the wicked think badly of their neighbors. The fool . . . whereas he himself is a fool, esteemeth all men fools.[14022]

We have treated of the eighth commandment; the ninth and the tenth which forbid Christians to covet the goods and the wife of another, remain to be explained. But in the sixth commandment we have spoken of the sin of impurity, and in the seventh of the sin of theft. By the ninth and the tenth are forbidden only the desires of these sins.[14023] Hence it is sufficient to say that what it is a sin to do it is also a sin to desire.

I also omit the commandments of the Church, because, in treating the Ten Commandments, I have explained what is most necessary to be known regarding the commandments of the Church.

The six principal commandments of the Church are expressed in the following verses:

1. Sundays and holy days observe
As feasts of obligation;
Attend at holy Mass, and keep

From servile occupation.
1. Lent, Ember-days, and Vigils, fast,
With one meal and collation.
1. On Friday, meat thou must not eat,
For sake of Christ's dear Passion.
1. Once in the year at least confess
With due examination.
At Easter-time receive thy Lord
With thanks and adoration.
1. In Lent or Advent marry not
With pomp and ostentation;
Wed before witnesses, and seek
The Church's approbation.
1. The worship of the Church maintain

Instructions on the Holy Sacraments

Chapter I

THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL

JESUS CHRIST himself instituted the sacraments, as means to make us partakers of his merits. The sacraments, therefore, are so many sacred channels, through which Jesus Christ communicates his graces, which are the fruits of his Passion.

It is necessary to know that every sacrament confers two kinds of grace, namely, sanctifying grace and sacramental grace. Sanctifying or habitual grace is that which sanctifies the soul that receives the sacrament, provided it be received with the requisite dispositions. Sacramental grace is that which gives the soul a special aid to obtain the end for which each sacrament was instituted. Thus, Baptism confers a special grace to wash the soul and cleanse it from sin. Confirmation gives strength to confess the faith of Jesus Christ. The Eucharist preserves and augments in us the divine grace, which is the spiritual life of the soul. Penance enables us to recover the grace that we have lost. Extreme Unction gives strength to resist at death the assaults of hell. Orders enable the ministers of the Church to fulfil their obligations. Finally, Matrimony confers on husband and wife help to bear the burdens of the married state, and to bring up their children in virtue.

Three of these sacraments, namely, Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, have the special effect of impressing on the soul a certain character or spiritual mark which can never be effaced. Hence these three sacraments can be received only once; but the others maybe received several times.[14024]

My principal object is to speak of the sacrament of penance that each one may be well acquainted with the manner of confessing his sins; however, I will say a few words on the other sacraments, that each person may know their essence, their effects, and the dispositions necessary for receiving them.

Chapter II

SACRAMENT OF BAPTISM

LET us briefly touch on four points regarding Baptism: its necessity, its effects, its minister, and what is required for it.

1. With regard to its necessity, it should be known that Baptism is not only the first but also the most necessary of all the sacraments. Without Baptism n0 one can enter heaven. Unless a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.[14025] It is also the most necessary, inasmuch as n0 one is capable of receiving any other sacrament if he has not previously received Baptism. Hence, Baptism is called the gate of all the sacraments. Is it impossible for a person who does not actually receive Baptism to be saved? I answer: He can be saved, if he receives it in desire; that is, by desiring to be baptized, and by believing in Jesus Christ; as has happened to many who, when unable to receive Baptism actually, have received it in desire. Faith is requisite as a preparation for receiving the grace of Baptism—but not charity; for attrition is sufficient, without contrition.

2. The effect of Baptism is to wash the soul and to cleanse it from all sins, as well from original as from actual sins, and to deliver it from all the punishment due to these sins.

3. The minister of Baptism is the parish priest, by whom, or by another priest, with his permission, it should be ordinarily administered; however, in case of necessity, when an infant is in danger of death, any man or woman, even an infidel or heretic, can confer Baptism.

4. Let us now come to what is necessary for Baptism.

With regard to the person to be baptized, if he has attained the use of reason he should have the intention of receiving Baptism, and sorrow for his sins. Some require that this sorrow should amount to contrition; but others more commonly hold that attrition is sufficient; and this is the opinion of St. Thomas: "For a man to prepare himself to receive the graces of baptism, faith is required, but not charity; because attrition preceding it is sufficient; it need not be contrition."[14026] We shall explain the nature of contrition and attrition in speaking of confession.[14027] The intention, then, of receiving Baptism is necessary for adults; but the intention of the Church supplies for those who have not attained the use of reason. All infants who, like the Holy Innocents, are put to death from hatred to the faith, are saved through the merits of Jesus Christ.

For Baptism are also required the matter and form, and the intention of the minister. The matter is natural water. The form consists in the words pronounced by the minister during the triple infusion of water on the head of the person to be baptized; but if the water cannot be poured 0n the head of the infant, it is sufficient to pour it on the breast or shoulders, or any other part, when it is impossible to pour it on some principal part of the body. The words of the form are, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Persons, particularly midwives, must be very careful to remember not to leave out the conjunction and; hence it would not then be sufficient to say, "In the name of the Father, of the Son, of the Holy Ghost." You must say, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The minister must have the intention to confer Baptism, or at least to do what the Church does, as the Council of Trent has defined: "If any one says that it is not requisite for ministers while consecrating or administering the sacraments to have an intention at least of doing what the Church does, let him be anathema."[14028]

Sponsors, that is, a godfather and godmother, are required in Baptism. It is enough to have one; but there cannot be more than two—one male and one female. Sponsors are obliged to attend to the instruction of the child in what regards faith and morals, when there is no one to instruct him; but they are not bound by this obligation in Catholic countries, where parish priests are diligent in the discharge of their duty. It is also necessary to know that the sponsors contract a spiritual relationship with the person baptized, and with his father and mother, so that they cannot be married to any of them.

Baptism should be administered in the Church; to administer it in private houses, without urgent necessity, would be a great sin; such necessity is either the imminent death of the infant, or infamy and scandal that would attach to the mother if the child were taken to the public church. But the children of kings and princes have the privilege of being baptized at home.[14029]

Remember that to defer the baptism of infants for more than ten or eleven days is, according to the more common opinion of theologians, a mortal sin, except there is some extraordinary reason for it.

Chapter III

THE SACRAMENT OF CONFIRMATION

CONFIRMATION is one of the seven sacraments, as has been declared by the Council of Trent,[14030] and after it the Council of Florence.[14031] It increases the grace received in Baptism.

The matter of the sacrament of confirmation is the sacred chrism composed of the oil of olives and balsam, consecrated by the bishop as the Roman Catechism[14032] teaches, and as Benedict XIV,[14033] has declared. The oil signifies the abundance of the grace of the Holy Ghost which is poured on the person confirmed; and the balsam signifies the odor of virtues, which a Christian strengthened by so great a sacrament ought to send forth.

The form of confirmation consists in the words pronounced by the bishop when he anoints the forehead of the person with the sacred chrism, and with the sign of the cross. The words are: N. (naming the person to be confirmed) I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and confirm thee with the chrism of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.[14034] A person present answers, Amen. Afterwards the bishop strikes the person confirmed lightly 0n the cheek, to remind him that he should be prepared to suffer every pain and every injury for the sake of Jesus Christ. He then dismisses him, saying: Pax tecum—Peace be with thee. At the words, "I sign thee with the sign of the cross," the person confirmed is sealed or inscribed with the sign of the cross, as a soldier of Jesus Christ; and by the words, "I confirm thee with the chrism of salvation," he receives the grace of strength to resist the enemies of the faith and the assaults of hell.

He who receives this sacrament should know the mysteries of the holy faith, and should be in the state of grace; otherwise he is guilty of sacrilege. Hence the person who is to be confirmed would do well to go to confession and Communion before he receives confirmation. In ancient times confirmation was given to infants; but Benedict XIV. in his Constitution 129, Eo quamvis, of the year 1745, has declared that at present it should be given only to those that have attained the use of reason, at any rate not before the age of seven years, as the Roman Catechism[14035] teaches. However, the same Pontiff[14036] in another place admits, with other theologians, that it may be given infants when there is an urgent cause; as, for example, when the child is in danger of death, or when the bishop is about to be absent for a considerable time from the diocese.

There was once a question raised, whether all Christians were bound under grievous sin to receive the sacrament of confirmation, or whether the obligation extended only to those that were destined for holy Orders. But it is now decided that all are bound, as appears from the following words of Benedict XIV.: "The faithful are to be admonished by the Ordinaries of the different places, that they are guilty of grievous sin, if, when they have the opportunity, they refuse or neglect to come to be confirmed."[14037]

In receiving this sacrament, it is commanded, under pain of grievous sin, that there be a sponsor;[14038] but there can be only one, who must, under penalty of mortal sin, have received confirmation, and must be of the same sex as the person confirmed. While the sacrament is conferred, the sponsor should keep his right hand on the right shoulder of the person who receives the sacrament. This sponsor also contracts a spiritual relationship in the same manner as sponsors for Baptism. It should be known that monks and nuns are forbidden to act as sponsors.

To understand the great efficacy of this sacrament in imparting spiritual strength to the faithful, it is enough to relate one fact, vouched for by St. Gregory Nazianzen and Prudentius. Julian the Apostate wished one day to offer sacrifice to his false gods, and had everything prepared; but at the moment they wished to offer the sacrifice, the knives would not pierce the victims, the fire was instantly extinguished, and the ministers became immovable as a rock. The sacrificing priest said, "There must be some one present who has been baptized or confirmed." The emperor asked if there were any such person present in the assembly, and then a young man, who had received confirmation a little before, came forward and said boldly: "Yes, sir, I have been confirmed, and therefore I have besought my God to prevent the impiety of the sacrifice, and he has heard my prayer." Julian was struck with astonishment, and, covered with confusion by the prodigy, he gave up the sacrifice, and withdrew from the temple.

Chapter IV

THE SACRAMENT OF THE HOLY EUCHARIST

IN this sacrament Jesus Christ gives us his body and blood under the species or appearances of bread and wine, that by the holy Communion his grace and holy love may be preserved and increased in our souls. We must then believe that in consequence of the words of consecration pronounced by the priest in the Mass, the bread and wine lose their proper substance, and are converted into the body and blood of Jesus Christ; and that nothing remains of the bread and wine but the species or appearances, the color, the taste, and figure; so that it is a dogma of the faith, that the Most Holy Sacrament of the altar contains Jesus Christ, really and entirely, his body, his soul, and divinity.

We must, consequently, believe that Jesus Christ, at the same time that he is in heaven, is also really and entirely in all places upon earth where the consecrated Host is reserved; and that when the most holy Host is divided Jesus Christ is not divided, but remains entire in every separate particle of the Host, as has been declared by the Council of Trent,[14039] by the Council of Nice,[14040] and by the Council of Lateran under Innocent III.[14041]

The principal effect of this sacrament is to preserve and perfect in us the spiritual life of the soul. As earthly bread nourishes the body, so this heavenly bread nourishes the soul, and makes it advance in divine love. It also serves, says the Council of Trent,[14042] as an antidote to cleanse us from venial and to preserve us from mortal sins. Another effect of this sacrament is resurrection and glorification of our bodies, which we expect at the last judgment; for Jesus Christ says: He that eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, hath life ever—lasting, and I will raise him up at the last day.[14043] But the most desirable of all the effects of the holy Communion is, that it unites and makes us one with Jesus Christ. He that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood, abideth in Me, and I in him.[14044] In order to receive these holy effects, it is necessary to be in the state of grace; he who receives the holy Communion with a conscience laden with mortal sin, receives Jesus Christ, but not his grace; on the contrary, he merits the malediction of Jesus Christ, and, according to the Apostle, he receives the sentence of his own condemnation; because he is guilty of a most enormous sacrilege. He eateth and drinketh judgment to himself.[14045]

It is related that a person in the state of mortal sin went to Communion, but what was the consequence? The consecrated particle became like a sword and pierced his throat, and the person fell instantly dead at the foot of the altar.

There is a more terrible example related in the "Teresian Chronicles." A girl fell into a sin, which she was ashamed to conless, and afterwards made three sacrilegious Communions. After the third Communion she was suddenly struck dead before the altar. Her countenance appeared, not black, but full of splendor. All cried out; "A saint! a saint!" and her body was carried in procession through the whole neighborhood. But mark what happened, and tremble at the thought of receiving Communion in mortal sin. An angel appeared to a Teresian Carmelite friar, who was in his cell, during the night on which the body of the unhappy girl lay unburied in the church. The angel conducted the Father to the church, and commanded him to open the mouth of the deceased. He opened her mouth, and found the three Hosts that she had received in the state of sin, and placed them in a ciborium. After the removal of the Hosts her countenance appeared no longer bright and resplendent, but black and horrible.

Let us return to our subject. For a person in the state of mortal sin, if he wishes to receive the body of Christ, it is not enough to make an act of contrition, though this is sufficient for the reception of other sacraments. It is necessary for such a person to go to confession, and to receive absolution, before he approaches the holy Communion. The only case in which a person can communicate after committing mortal sin, without confession and absolution, is, when he forgot the sin until he had come to the altar; in such a case, in order to avoid the scandal that should arise from rising up to go back to confession, it is enough to make an act of contrition; after making an act of contrition, he may receive the holy Communion.

This is the disposition necessary for Communion on the part of the soul. With regard to the disposition of the body, which is necessary for Communion, a person must be fasting from midnight; that is, he must not have taken into the stomach any digestible substance, whether liquid 0r solid. The sick, when in danger of death, are excepted; for they can receive the most holy viaticum after having broken their fast.

These are dispositions absolutely necessary for Communion. But to communicate with greater fruit, it is necessary to purify the soul from venial sins —at least, from venial sins which are fully deliberate. Hence, tepid souls that habitually commit venial sins have not the dispositions necessary for frequent Communion. At most, they can be permitted to go to Communion once a week, that from the sacrament they may receive strength to avoid mortal sin. But persons who do not commit deliberate venial sins, and have a desire of advancing in divine love, may communicate more frequently, according as their confessor may advise. St. Francis de Sales says that Jesus Christ gives himself to us only through love, and therefore we should receive him only through love. The best disposition, then, for holy Communion is, to receive the holy Eucharist in order to advance in the love of Jesus Christ.

All know that every Christian is bound, under pain of grievous sin, to communicate at least once a year, and so to fulfil his Easter duties: this ought to be done within the time prescribed for the fulfilment of the Paschal precept; and to this all are obliged, under the penalty of being interdicted from entering the Church, and of being deprived of Christian burial after death. Every Christian is also obliged to communicate, and to receive the holy viaticum, whenever he is in danger of death. I say, in danger, without waiting till there is no hope of recovery. By waiting so long, the sick man runs the risk of dying without receiving the viaticum, as has happened to many.

The Church, then, has declared that every Christian is bound, under pain of grievous sin, to communicate on two occasions, namely, at Easter, and in danger of death. But it is also necessary to know that a person will scarcely preserve himself in the grace of God, if, like some who are negligent about their eternal salvation he communicates only once a year. This we know by experience; and reason teaches us, that when the soul is a long time without this divine food, it scarcely has strength to resist temptations, and therefore easily falls into sin. The Most Holy Sacrament is called celestial bread; because, as earthly bread supports the life of the body, so this heavenly bread preserves the life of the soul. Therefore, let every Christian communicate at least every eight days, as has been already said; but persons who lead a spiritual life, make mental prayer, and abstain from deliberate venial sins, ought, with the consent of their confessor, to communicate several times in the week. For the rest, who live without much devotion, that they may at least preserve themselves in God's grace, it is advisable to go to Communion every Sunday, or at least every fortnight.

Children, as St. Thomas[14046] says, should be obliged to go to Communion as soon as they are capable of understanding the difference between this divine food and earthly bread. Some children are capable of understanding this difference sooner than others. But, ordinarily speaking, the obligation of going to Communion does not begin until after the ninth or tenth year; but their first Communion cannot be deferred beyond the age of twelve, or, at the most, beyond the age of fourteen years. We know that St. Charles Borromeo commanded his parish priests to endeavor to make the children go to Communion as soon as they had attained the age of ten years. And for children, in danger of death, theologians, along with Benedict XIV.[14047] commonly teach that so great an age is not necessary; it is sufficient if they are capable of making their confession.

It is necessary to communicate; but, as has been said, it is necessary to communicate in a state of grace; otherwise the Communion will become a poison, or rather a halter to strangle the unworthy communicant. St. Cyprian[14048] relates that a Christian woman who, in order to conceal herself, had through fear of the persecution done an action contrary to faith, came to the church, and went to Communion without confessing her sin. But what was the consequence? The sacred Host remained in her throat; the throat instantly swelled in such a manner that she began to tremble from head to foot, and so expired.

Chapter V

THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE

Penance is a sacrament in which, by the absolution of a confessor, sins committed after Baptism are remitted. For priests have received from Jesus Christ the power of remitting sins, as appears from the words: Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained.[14049] Therefore, the Council of Trent excommunicates all that say that this sacrament has not the power to remit sin. By this sacrament the sinner recovers not only the divine grace, but also the merits of the good works performed in the state of grace, which he had lost by sin. The soul also receives additional strength to resist temptations; for the same Council says that by justification we are renewed in the spirit of our mind.[14050] All these graces we receive through the merits of the Passion of Jesus Christ.

To receive this sacrament, three things are particularly necessary on the part of the penitent: First, sorrow for sins committed, together with a purpose or resolution to commit them no more. Secondly, an entire confession of all the sins committed. Thirdly, the performance of the penance enjoined by the confessor. But, in order to be able to confess all his sins, and to conceive a true sorrow for them, the sinner must first make a diligent examination of his conscience.

I. EXAMINATION OF CONSCIENCE

This examination consists in making a diligent search, in order to call to mind the sins committed since the last confession, which was made with the requisite conditions.

In this search many fail by too minute an examination, and many others by not examining enough. The former are the scrupulous; they are always examining their conscience, and are never satisfied; thus they fail in exciting a true sorrow for their sins and a firm purpose of amendment. Moreover, their scruples render the sacrament so odious, that going to confession appears to them like going to be martyred. This examination for confession need not be made with extreme diligence; it is enough for the penitent to apply himself with attention, in order to discover all the sins committed since his last confession. This diligence must be proportioned to the conscience of the penitent. If he has been a long time absent from confession, and has fallen into many mortal sins, greater diligence is necessary; less is required if he has been lately at confession, and has committed but few sins. If, after making a diligent search, a person forgets a certain sin, but has a general sorrow for all his sins, the one that he has forgotten in confession is pardoned, and he is only bound to confess it at his next confession. When a confessor tells a scrupulous penitent to make no further examination, and never again to confess what he has now told, the penitent should be silent, and obey the confessor. St. Philip Neri used to say: "Let all who desire to advance in the way of God obey their confessor, who is in the place of God; he who acts thus may be certain that he shall not have to render to God an account of the actions which he performed through obedience."[14051] And St. John of the Cross said, that "not to trust in what a confessor says, is pride and a want of faith." The great reason of this is because our Lord said to his ministers: He that heareth you heareth Me.[14052]

But would to God that all were scrupulous! Generally, such souls have a tender conscience: let them be obedient, and they are safe. The misfortune is, that the majority of Christians have not many scruples: they commit numberless mortal sins, which they forget; and afterwards they barely confess the sins that occur to them at the moment of confession. Thus it sometimes happens that they do not accuse themselves of half their sins. Confessions made in this manner are fruitless; it would be even better to omit them. A historian, Nicius Erithroeus or Victor Rossi, relates that a young man, who had usually made his confession in this way, sent for a confessor at the hour of death; but before the confessor arrived, a devil came, and showed the young man a long list of sins omitted in his past confessions, through want of diligence in examining his conscience. The poor young man despaired of salvation, and died without making his confession.

Good Christians make an examination of conscience and an act of contrition every evening. There was a devout monk lying at the point of death; when his Superior came and told him to make his confession, he answered: "Blessed be God! I have for thirty years made an examination of conscience every evening, and have made my confession every day as if I were at the point of death." (bottom of book's page (526) is dog-eared; complete text and footnotes are not available for editing) children, when you are preparing for confession, etired part of the church; first of all, thank aving waited for you till that moment, and then beg of him to make known to you the number and the grievousness of your sins. Then begin to pass over in your mind the places you have frequented, the persons with whom you have kept company, and the dangerous occasions in which you have been since your last confession. Examine in this manner all the sins committed during that time by thoughts, by words, and by deeds: above all, examine yourself on the sins of omission, particularly if you are the head of a family, a magistrate, or in any similar situation in which persons do not generally accuse themselves of sins of omission. But to make the examination in a more orderly manner, it is better for those who have committed different kinds of sin to examine themselves 0n the Ten Commandments, and see what commandment they have violated, and whether the violation has been grievous or venial.

He who has had the misfortune of having committed a mortal sin must go to confession immediately; for he may die any moment, and be damned. You may say: "I will go to confession at Easter 0r Christmas." And how do you know that you will not die suddenly in the mean time? "I hope in God that I shall not!" But should it happen, what must become of you? How many have kept saying, Hereafter, hereafter, and are now in hell: because death came upon them, and they were not able to make their confession.

St. Bonaventure[14053] relates, in the life of St. Francis, that while the saint was going about and preaching, a gentleman gave him lodging in his house. Moved with gratitude, St. Francis recommended him to God, and the Lord revealed to the saint that the gentleman was in a state of sin, and that his death was at hand. The saint instantly called him, and made him go to confession to a priest, the companion of the saint. Soon afterwards the gentleman sat down to dinner, but before he could swallow the first mouthful, he was struck down with sudden death.

A similar misfortune befell a sinner who was damned on account of having deferred his confession. Venerable Bede[14054] relates that this man, who had been fervent, fell into tepidity and mortal sin, and deferred confession from day to day. He was seized with a dangerous illness; and even then put off his confession saying that he would afterwards go to confession with better dispositions. But the hour of vengeance had arrived: he fell into a deadly swoon in which he thought that he saw hell open under his feet. After he had come to his senses again, the persons who stood round his bed begged him to make his confession, but he answered: "There is no more time; I am damned." They continued to encourage him. " You are losing time," said he; " I am damned, I see hell opened; I there see Judas, Caiphas, and the murderers of Jesus Christ; and near them I see my place, because, like them, I have despised the blood of Jesus Christ by deferring confession for so long a time." Thus the unhappy man died in despair without confession, and was buried like a dog outside the church without having a prayer offered for his soul.

With regard to venial sins, it is useful to confess them; because the absolution of a confessor remits them. But there is no obligation of confessing them; for, according to the Council of Trent, the pardon of them may be obtained by other means without confession—such as by acts of contrition and of charity, or by saying the "Our Father" with devotion.

Are venial sins also remitted by the use of holy water? Yes; not directly, but indirectly by way of impetration; for the Church, by the blessing of the water, obtains for the faithful who use it acts of repentance and love, by which sins are cancelled. Hence, after taking holy water, it will be useful instantly to make an act of sorrow or of the love of God, that the Lord may, in consequence of those acts, remit all venial sins that remain in the soul. Holy water helps also to dispose us to devotion, and to banish the temptations of the devil, particularly at the hour of death. Surius tells us of a dying monk who asked his prior to send away a blackbird from the window. The prior sprinkled the window with holy water, and the bird, which was really the devil, flew away. It is also mentioned by Father Ferrerio that a monk of Cluni at the hour of death saw his chamber full of devils, but on sprinkling the cell with holy water they immediately disappeared.

Let us now proceed. We have spoken of the examination regarding mortal and venial sins. But were a person to do an action with a doubt whether it was a mortal or a venial sin, what kind of sin would he commit? He would be guilty of mortal sin, because he exposes himself to the danger of grievously offending God. Hence, before he acts he must lay aside the doubt; and if he has not hitherto done so, he must confess it, at least, as it is before God. But the scrupulous, who have doubts about everything, must follow another rule: they must obey their confessor. When he tells them to conquer their doubts, and to act against scruples, they should obey with exactness; otherwise they will render themselves unable and unfit to perform any spiritual exercise.

Before I proceed farther I exhort every one of you to make a general confession, if you have not as yet made one. And I now speak not only of those whose confessions have been sacrilegious on account of having concealed sins, or invalid for want of sufficient examination of conscience, or of sufficient sorrow; but I speak of all who wish to be permanently converted to God. A general confession is a great means of bringing about a true change of life. After her conversion to God, St. Margaret of Cortona told all her sins to her confessor, and thereby made herself so pleasing and dear to God, that our Lord himself spoke to her and called her, "My sinful one; my poor little one." She one day said to Jesus Christ: "Lord, when wilt Thou call me Thy daughter?" Jesus Christ answered: "When thou hast made a general confession of thy whole life then I will call you my daughter." She made a general confession, and from that time Jesus Christ always called her his child.

II. SORROW

Sorrow for sin is so necessary, in order to obtain forgiveness, that without it even God himself (at least in his ordinary Providence) cannot pardon sin. Unless you shall do penance, you shall all likewise perish.[14055] A person who dies without making an examination of conscience, or a confession of his sins, may be saved by making an act of sincere contrition when he has not time to confess his sins, nor a priest to whom he can confess them; but without sorrow it is impossible to be saved.

And here is the mistake of those people who, in preparing for confession, endeavor only to call to mind their sins, but make no effort to excite a true sorrow for them. This sorrow we must earnestly ask of God; and before we go to the confessional let us say a "Hail Mary" in honor of the sorrows of the Blessed Virgin, that she may obtain for us a true sorrow for our sins.

To obtain the remission of our sins in the sacrament of penance, our sorrow for them must have five conditions. It must be sincere, supernatural, sovereign, universal, and accompanied with a hope of pardon.

1. Our sorrow must be sincere; it must be not in the mouth only, but also in the heart. This is the kind of sorrow required by the Council of Trent: "A sorrow of the soul, and detestation of sin committed, with a purpose of sinning no more."[14056] The soul, then, must conceive a true sorrow, a true displeasure, or regret, and true bitterness of heart, for the sins that have been committed; it must detest and abhor them, saying, with the penitent king Ezechias: I will recount to thee all my years in the bitterness of my soul.[14057]

2. The sorrow must be supernatural; that is, it must arise not from a natural but from a supernatural motive. It would not be sufficient to repent of your sin because it has been injurious to your health, your property, or your reputation. This would be a natural motive, and sorrow proceeding from such a motive is of no use. The motive, then, of our sorrow must be supernatural; we must repent of sin either 0n account of its deformity and brutality, or because it has offended the infinite goodness of God, or because by it we have deserved hell, or lost heaven; and thus our sorrow will be either perfect, that is, contrition, or imperfect, that is, attrition, as shall be hereafter explained.

3. Our sorrow must be sovereign. Not that it need be accompanied with tears and positive sensibility, it is enough if it be a deliberate calculation of the will, that it would rather wish to have suffered any positive evil than to have offended God. Let timid souls who are always troubled at not feeling sensible sorrow for their sins attend to this; it is enough for them to repent with the will—that is, to be sorry for their sins, desiring to have lost all things rather than to have offended God. St. Teresa has given an excellent method for knowing whether a soul has true sorrow for her sins: if she has a sincere purpose to sin no more, and would be content to lose all things rather than the grace of God, let her have confidence; for then there is no doubt that she has true sorrow for her sins.

4. Our sorrow must be universal—extending to all grievous offences offered to God, so that there is no mortal sin that the soul does not detest above all other evils.

I have said, mortal sin; for to obtain the pardon of one venial sin it is not necessary to have sorrow for all our venial sins; one venial sin may be remitted without the remission of another; to obtain forgiveness of any venial sin it is enough to have sorrow for it.

But whether the sin is mortal or venial, God cannot pardon it unless the soul sincerely repents of it. Let those who confess only venial sins, for which they have not sorrow, remember that their confessions are null. So, when they wish to receive absolution, they must have sorrow for at least some of the venial faults that they confess, or must accuse themselves of some sin of their past life for which they are sincerely sorry.

But, with regard to mortal sins, it is necessary to have true sorrow for all, and a sincere purpose not to commit them again; otherwise none of them will be remitted; for no mortal sin is pardoned without the infusion of grace into the soul; but this grace cannot exist in the soul along with mortal sin. Therefore, no one can obtain the pardon of one mortal sin without receiving pardon of them all. It is related of St. Sebastian the Martyr, that he used to heal diseases by the sign of the cross. One day the saint went to see Cromatius, who was sick, and promised him health, provided he would burn his idols. Cromatius burned them, but reserved one of them, for which he had a special affection; he, therefore did not recover his health, and began to complain to the saint; but the saint told him that it was useless to have burned the other idols as long as he retained one of them. Thus, it is not enough for the soul to detest some mortal sins; it must detest them all. For a person who has committed several mortal sins, it is not necessary to detest them one by one; it is enough to detest them all with a general sorrow, as grievous offences against God. If all be thus detested, though some sin may have been forgotten, it is forgiven.

4. Our sorrow must be accompanied with the hope of pardon, otherwise it will be like the sorrow of the damned, who are sorry for their sins, not because they are offences against God, but because they are the cause of their sufferings; but their sorrow is without hope of pardon. Even Judas repented of his treason. I have, said he, sinned in betraying innocent blood.[14058] But because he did not hope for pardon, he hanged himself on a tree, and died in despair. Cain also acknowledged that he had sinned in killing his brother Abel; but he despaired of pardon, and said: My iniquity is greater than that I may deserve pardon;[14059] and therefore he died in a state of damnation. St. Francis de Sales says that the sorrow of true penitents is a sorrow full of peace and consolation; for the more a true penitent grieves for having offended God, the greater his confidence of obtaining pardon, and the greater his consolation. Hence St. Bernard used to say: "O Lord! if it is so sweet to weep for Thee, what will it be to rejoice in Thee?"[14060]

In order, then, to dispose a soul for the divine pardon in the sacrament of penance, its sorrow must have these five conditions. It is necessary also to know that sorrow for sin is of two kinds: perfect and imperfect. The former is called contrition, the latter attrition.[14061]

Contrition is a sorrow for sin, because it is an offence against the divine goodness. Theologians say that contrition is a formal act of perfect love of God; for he who has contrition, is moved by the love which he bears to the goodness of God to repent of having offended him. Hence, to make an act of the love of God, saying: "My God, because Thou art infinite goodness, I love Thee above all things; and because I love Thee I am sorry above all things for having offended Thee," will greatly assist the soul to make an act of contrition.

The sorrow of attrition is a sorrow for having offended God, which the soul conceives from a less perfect motive, such as from the consideration of the deformity of sin, of having deserved hell, or of having lost heaven, in punishment of its sin.

Thus contrition is a sorrow for sin on account of the injury offered to God; attrition is a sorrow for an offence offered to God on account of the injury it does to us.

By contrition the soul immediately obtains the grace of God, before the penitent receives sacramental absolution from a confessor, provided he has at least the implied intention of going to confession and receiving the sacrament of penance. This we know from the Council of Trent. "The Holy Synod teaches that, although it may sometimes happen that this contrition is perfected by charity, and reconciles man to God, before the actual reception of this sacrament,"[14062] etc.

But by attrition the penitent obtains sanctifying grace only when he actually receives absolution, as we learn from the same Council. "Although (attrition) without the sacrament of penance cannot by itself bring the sinner to justification, still it disposes him to obtain the grace of God in the sacrament of penance."[14063] The word disposes is understood by Gonet, and most commonly by other theologians, of the proximate disposition for receiving grace in the sacrament of penance; nor can it be understood of the remote disposition; for, even unconnected with the sacrament, attrition is a good act, and disposes to grace. But the Council speaks of attrition as a disposition in the sacrament, and therefore it is necessarily to be understood of the proximate disposition.

Here it may be asked whether, in order to obtain absolution from sins, it is necessary that attrition be united with inchoate charity—that is, with the first beginning, the first spark, of charity. There is no doubt that this inchoate love is necessary for justification; for the Council itself teaches that one of the dispositions that the sinner must have in order to be justified is that he begin to love God. "They begin to love God, as the fountain of all justice."[14064] But a question may be raised as to what is meant by the beginning of love.

Some say that it means an act of predominant love, or that the sinner should love God above all things; but for this they have no just grounds; for he who loves God above all things, loves him with perfect love, and perfect love remits and destroys sin. Gregory XIII. condemned a proposition of Michael Baius, which asserted that "the love of God can exist in the soul along with sin; that charity, which is the fulfilment of the law, is not always united with the remission of sins."[14065] Baius spoke of charity which, according to St. Paul, is the fulfilment of the law.[14066] Now what is the charity by which the law is fulfilled? It is precisely the predominant love by which God is loved above all things. St. Thomas teaches, that by loving God above all things we fulfil the precept of Jesus Christ: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart.[14067] These are the words of the holy Doctor: "When we are commanded to love God with our whole heart we are given to understand that we ought to love God above all things."[14068] He, then, who loves God above all things, cannot be in the state of sin. St. Thomas confirms this doctrine in another place, where he says: "An act of mortal sin is destructive of charity, which consists in loving God above all things."[14069] Hence he teaches that "Charity cannot exist with mortal sin."[14070] Besides, we have several passages of Scripture, which assure us that they who love God are loved by him: I love them that love Me.[14071] He that loveth Me shall be loved by My Father, and I will love him.[14072] He that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him.[14073] Charity covereth a multitude of sins.[14074]

Hence it follows, that any act of contrition (which is also, as we have said, an act of charity), though not intense, provided it amounts to contrition, remits all mortal sins. Hence the angelic Doctor has written: "How small soever sorrow may be, provided it is sufficient for the nature of contrition, it cancels every sin."[14075]

Hence, by inchoate love, united with attrition, we cannot understand predominant love; for such love, though it be remiss, and not intense, is perfect charity; and therefore sorrow united with such love would be, not attrition, but contrition. Hence, were such attrition necessary, every sinner would be already absolved before he went to confession; the sacrament of penance would be, not a sacrament of the dead, but of the living; and the absolution would be, not a true absolution, but, as Luther taught, rather a simple declaration of the absolution already granted. But this is contrary to the definition of the Council of Trent.[14076]

Therefore, the beginning of charity, which must accompany attrition, need not be predominant love; it is sufficient if it be a simple beginning of love, such as is the fear of eternal chastisements. The fear of God is the beginning of His love.[14077] Thus the will to offend God no more is also the beginning of his love. So also the hope of pardon and of the eternal goods which God promises to penitents. St. Thomas says that from the moment that we expect to gain good things from a person, we begin to love him.[14078] Hence, in preparing for confession, it is useful to unite with the act of sorrow an act of hope of pardon through the merits of Jesus Christ. The Council of Trent says that by this hope the penitent ought to prepare himself to receive from God the remission of his sins. Trusting that God will pardon them for Christ's sake.[14079]

Let it, however, be remembered, that:

1. For attrition, the fear of the temporal punishments with which God chastises sinners in this life is not sufficient; for theologians say, that as the punishment of mortal sin is eternal, so the motive of sorrow for it ought to be the chastisement of eternal torments.

2. Let it be also observed, that in the act of attrition it is not enough for the sinner to repent, merely because he has deserved hell; he must also repent of having offended God, by deserving hell.

3. Let it also be remembered that the Council of Trent requires that the act of attrition should be accompanied not only with the hope of pardon, but also with the will of sinning no more—with a hope of pardon,[14080] to the exclusion of all will of sinning again. Hence, were a person sorry for his sins, because by them he had deserved hell, but so disposed that, if there were no hell he would not give up sin, his sorrow would not only be insufficient, but it would be sinful on account of the bad disposition of his will.

It follows, then, that an act of attrition should be made in this way: "My God, because by my sins I have lost heaven, and have merited hell for all eternity, I am sorry above all things for having offended Thee." An act of contrition may be made in this manner: "My God, because Thou art infinite goodness, I love Thee above all things, and because I love Thee, I am sorry above all things for all the offences I have offered to Thee, O Sovereign Good! My God, I purpose never more to offend Thee. I would rather die than ever offend Thee more."

And let me here remark that, though attrition alone is, as has been said, sufficient in order to obtain the grace of God in the sacrament of penance, still every person, in preparing for confession, should endeavor to add to the act of attrition an act of contrition, as well for greater security as for his own greater profit.

III. PURPOSE OF SINNING NO MORE

Sorrow and a purpose of amendment necessarily go together. "A sorrow of the soul and a detestation of sin," says the Council of Trent, "along with the purpose of sinning no more."[14081] The soul cannot have a true sorrow for sin without a sincere purpose never more to offend God. Now, in order to be a true purpose, it must have three conditions: it must be firm, universal, and efficacious.

1. It must be firm, so that the penitent resolutely purposes to suffer every evil rather than offend God.

Some say: "Father, I do not wish ever more to offend God; but the occasions of sin and my own weakness will make me relapse: I wish, but shall scarcely be able, to persevere." My son, you have not a true purpose, and therefore you say: I wish, I wish. Know that hell is full of such wishes. It is a mere empty wish, not a true resolute will or purpose; a true purpose is a firm and resolute will to suffer every evil rather than to relapse into sin. It is true that there are occasions of sin, that we are weak, particularly if we have contracted a habit of any sin; and that the devil is strong: but God is stronger than the devil, and with his aid we can conquer all the temptations of hell. I can do all things, says St. Paul, in Him who strengthened me.[14082] It is true that we ought to tremble at our weakness, and distrust our own strength; but we ought to have confidence in God that by his grace we shall overcome all the assaults of our tempters. Praising, I will call upon the Lord, said David, and I shall be saved from my enemies.[14083] I will invoke the Lord, and he will save me from my enemies. He who recommends himself to God in temptations shall never fall.

"But, Father, I have recommended myself to God, and the temptation continues." Do you, then, also continue to ask help from God as long as the temptation lasts, and you will never fall. God is faithful; he will not permit us to be tempted above our strength. God, says the Apostle, is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able.[14084] He has promised to give aid to all who pray for it. For every one that asketh receiveth.[14085] And this promise is made to all—to sinners, as well as to the just: "For every one that asketh receiveth." So there is no excuse for those who consent to sin; for if they recommend themselves to God, he will stretch out his hand, and support them, and they will not fall. He, then, who falls into sin falls through his own fault, either because he will not ask aid from God, or because he will not avail himself of the aid which the Lord offers to him.

The purpose must be universal; that is, it must be a purpose of avoiding every mortal sin. Saul was commanded by God to put to death all the Amalecites, and all their cattle, and to burn all their goods. What did he do? He slew a great multitude of men and of cattle, and burnt a large quantity of their goods; but he saved the life of the king, and preserved what was most valuable of the property; and on account of this contempt of God's commandment he merited his malediction. Many penitents imitate Saul; they purpose to avoid some sins, but they cannot give up some dangerous familiarity, or some goods that they have a scruple about retaining, or some cherished feelings of anger and ill-will against a neighbor, or some hankering after revenge. Such persons wish to divide their heart, giving one half to God, and the other to the devil. The devil is content with his portion, but God is not satisfied with a part of their heart. Every one knows the history of Solomon—how two women came to him, each claiming to be the mother of the child who was still left alive. He ordered the infant to be divided, and one half to be given to each of them. Divide the living child in two.[14086] The woman who was not the mother of the child remained silent and was satisfied with the order of the king; but the true mother said: I beseech thee, my lord, give her the child alive, and do not kill it.[14087] "No, my lord, if my child must die, I prefer that she should have it entire." Solomon concluded that she was the true mother of the child, and gave it to her. Thus, the devil because he is our enemy, and not our father, is content to have a part of our heart; but God, who is our true Father, is not satisfied unless he has the whole of it. No man, says Jesus Christ, can serve two masters.[14088] God does not accept for his servants those who wish to serve two masters; he wishes to be our only Lord, and he justly refuses to be the companion of the devil in the possession of our hearts.

Our purpose, then, must be universal: it must be a purpose of avoiding all mortal sins. I say mortal sins; for, with regard to venial sins, a person may have a purpose of avoiding one and not another, and such a purpose is sufficient for a good confession. However, souls that fear God purpose to abstain from all fully deliberate venial sins; and with regard to indeliberate venial sins, or sins committed without a full consent of the will, they purpose to commit as few of them as possible; to avoid all such sins is impossible on account of the weakness of our nature. Most Holy Mary only (as we have said in the beginning of this work)[14089] was free from all, even indeliberate venial sins, as the Council of Trent has declared, saying that it is impossible for a man "to avoid during his whole life all sins, venial as well as mortal, unless by a special privilege of God, as the Church holds with regard to the Blessed Virgin."[14090] And this is one of the strongest proofs that the divine Mother was exempt from original sin; for, had she been stained with it, she could not, in the course of nature, have been free from all, even indeliberate venial sins. Let us proceed.

3. The purpose must be efficacious—that is, it must make us practise all the means necessary to avoid sin; and one of the most necessary of these means, is to avoid the occasions of relapsing into sin. This is a most important point; for were men careful to fly from evil occasions, from how many sins would they abstain, and thus how many souls would escape damnation! The devil does not gain much without an occasion. But when a person voluntarily exposes himself to the occasion of sin, particularly of sins against chastity, it is morally impossible for him not to fall.

It is necessary to distinguish proximate from remote occasions. The remote occasion is that to which all are exposed, or in which men seldom fall into sin. The proximate occasion is that which by itself ordinarily induces to sin, such as unnecessary familiarity of young men with women of bad reputation. An occasion in which a person has frequently fallen is also called a proximate occasion. But occasions which are not proximate for others may be proximate for a particular person, who on account of his bad disposition or on account of a bad habit has frequently fallen into sin. They are in the proximate occasion of sin: 1. Who keep in their house a woman with whom they have committed sin. 2. They who go to taverns, or to any particular house in which they have frequently fallen into sin by quarrelling, or drunkenness, or immodest words or actions. 3. They who in gaming have been frequently guilty of fraud, or quarrels, or of blasphemies. Now, no one can receive absolution unless he purpose firmly to avoid the occasion of sin; because to expose himself to such occasions, though sometimes he should not fall into sin, is for him a grievous sin. And when the occasion is voluntary and is actually existing at the present time, the penitent cannot be absolved until he has actually removed the occasion of sin. For penitents find it very difficult to remove the occasion; and if they do not take it away before they receive absolution they will scarcely remove it after they have been absolved.

Much less is he fit for absolution who refuses to remove the occasions, and only promises that in them he will not commit sin for the future. Tell me, my brother, do you expect that tow thrown into the fire will not burn? And how can you expect that if you expose yourself to the occasion of sin you will not fall? And your strength, says the prophet, shall be as the ashes of tow, . . . and both shall burn together, and there shall be none to quench it.[14091] Our strength is like the strength of tow to resist fire. A devil was once compelled to tell what sermon was most annoying to him. He answered: "The sermon on the occasions of sin." As long as we do not remove the occasions of sin, the devil is satisfied: he cares not about our purposes, promises, or oaths; for as long as the occasion is not removed the sin will not cease. The occasion (particularly of sins against chastity) is like a veil placed before the eyes, and does not allow us to see God, or hell, or heaven. In a word, the occasion blinds the sinner; and how can the blind keep himself in the straight way to heaven? He will wander into the road to hell without knowing where he is going; and why? Because he does not see. For all, then, who are in the occasion of sin, it is necessary to do violence to themselves in order to remove the occasion: otherwise they will remain always in sin.

Here it is necessary to remark that for some who are more strongly inclined to evil, and who have contracted a habit of any vice, particularly the vice of impurity, certain occasions are proximate or nearly proximate which for others would be remote. Hence, if they do not avoid them they will be always relapsing into the same crimes like a dog returning to his vomit.

"But, Father," some one may say, "I cannot separate from such a person; I cannot leave such a house without sustaining great loss." Do you then mean that the occasion to which you are exposed is not voluntary, but necessary? If it be necessary, you must, if you cannot remove it, at least adopt the means of making it remote. What are these means? There are three means: the frequentation of the sacraments, prayer, and avoiding familiarity with the person with whom you have sinned.

The frequentation of the sacraments of penance and Eucharist would be in one respect the best means; but it ought to be known that in necessary proximate occasions of incontinence it is a great remedy to withhold absolution in order to make the penitent more diligent in adopting the other two means, namely, to recommend himself frequently to God, and to avoid familiarity. When you rise in the morning, you must renew the resolution of not yielding to sin all that day; and you must pray for help, not only in the morning, but also several times during the day before the Most Holy Sacrament, or before the Crucifix; and must beg of the Most Holy Mary to obtain for you grace not to relapse. The other means to which it is absolutely necessary to attend is to avoid all familiarity with the accomplice by not remaining with her alone, by not looking at her face, not conversing with her, and by speaking to her (when strictly necessary) in such a manner as to show a dislike for her society. This is the most important means of making proximate occasions become remote, but he who has already received absolution will scarcely practise this means; and, therefore, in such cases, it is expedient to defer absolution until the proximate occasion becomes remote. But to render such occasions remote, eight or ten days are not sufficient; a long time is necessary.

But should the penitent after adopting all these means always relapse, what is the last remedy? It is that which the Gospel recommends: If thy right eye scandalize thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee.[14092] Although it were your right eye, you must pull it out, and cast it to a distance from you. "It is better," says our Lord, "to lose thy eye than having it to be cast into hell." In such a case, then, you must remove the occasion, or you must certainly go to hell.

IV. CONFESSION

Confession, in order to be good, must be entire, humble, and sincere.

1. THE CONFESSION MUST BE ENTIRE

He who has offended God by mortal sin has no other remedy to prevent his damnation but the confession of his sin. "But, if I am sorry for sin from my heart? If I do penance for it during my whole life? If I go into the desert and live on wild herbs, and sleep on the ground?" You may do as much as you please; but if you do not confess every mortal sin that you remember, you cannot obtain pardon. I said, a sin that you remember; for should you have involuntarily forgotten a sin, it has been pardoned indirectly if you had a general sorrow for all your offences against God. It is sufficient for you to confess it whenever you remember it. But if you have concealed it voluntarily, you must then confess not only the sin that has been concealed, but also the others that have been confessed; for the confession was null and sacrilegious.

Accursed shame: how many poor souls does it send to hell! St. Teresa used to say over and over again to preachers: "Preach, O my priests, preach against bad confessions; for it is on account of bad confessions that the greater part of Christians are damned."

A disciple of Socrates went one day into the house of a woman of bad repute. As he was leaving the house he perceived that his master was passing, and to avoid being seen by him he went back into the house. But Socrates, who had seen him at the door, put his head in at the door, and said to him: "It is a shame to enter, but it is no shame to depart from this house." In the same way I say to those who have committed sin, and are afterwards ashamed to confess it, "My child, it is a shame to commit sin, but it is no shame to free yourself from sin by telling it in confession." The Holy Ghost says, There is a shame that bringeth sin, and there is a shame that bringeth glory and grace.[14093] We ought to avoid the shame that makes us the enemies of God, but not the shame that arises from the confession of sin, and that enables us to recover the grace of God and the glory of paradise.

What shame! What shame! Was it a shame in so many holy penitents—in St. Mary Magdalene, in St. Mary of Egypt, in St. Margaret of Cortona—to confess their sins? Their confessions have enabled them to attain paradise, where, as queens of that great kingdom, they enjoy God, and shall enjoy him for all eternity. St. Augustine, after his conversion to God, not only confessed the wickedness of his life, but also wrote a book, in which he published his sins, that the whole world might know them.

St. Antonine relates that a prelate once saw a devil beside a woman at confession. The prelate asked him what he was doing. The devil answered: "I am fulfilling the precept of restitution: when I tempted this woman to sin, I took away her shame; I am now restoring it, that she may not confess her sin." This, as St. John Chrysostom says, is one of the artifices of the devil. "God joined shame to sin, confidence to confession. The devil inverts the whole thing. He joins confidence to sin, shame to confession."[14094] The wolf seizes the sheep by the throat, that it may not be able to cry out; thus he carries it off and devours it. This the devil does with certain miserable souls; he catches them by the throat, that they may not confess their sins, and thus he drags them to hell.

In the life of Father John Ramirez, of the Society of Jesus, it is related that, while preaching in a certain city, he was called to hear the confession of a girl who was dying. She was of noble birth, and had apparently led a holy life; she went frequently to Communion, fasted, and performed other mortifications. At death she confessed her sins to Father Ramirez with many tears, so that he was greatly consoled. But, after returning to the college, his companion said that while the young lady was making her confession he saw a black hand squeezing her throat. The Father immediately returned to the house of the sick lady, but before entering he heard that she was dead. He then returned to his college, and while he was at prayer the deceased appeared to him in a horrible form, surrounded by flames, and bound in chains, and said that she was damned on account of a sin committed with a young man, which she voluntarily concealed in confession through shame, and that at death she wished to confess it, but the devil induced her, through the same shame, to conceal it. After these words she disappeared, amid the most frightful howling and terrific clanking of chains.

My daughter, have you committed sin? Why are you now unwilling to confess it? You may say, I am ashamed. "Unhappy soul," says St. Augustine, "you think only of the shame, but do not reflect that unless you confess the sin you will be damned! You are ashamed, but," adds the saint, "you are not ashamed to inflict a wound on your soul, and are you now ashamed to apply a healing band?" "O madness," adds the saint, "you do not blush for the wound; all your blushes are for the bandage of the wound!"[14095] The Council of Trent says, the physician cannot heal a wound unless he sees and understands it.[14096]

Oh! what destruction falls on the soul that conceals a mortal sin in confession through shame! "The remedy," says St. Ambrose, "becomes a triumph to the devil."[14097] After a victory soldiers make a pompous display of the arms taken from the enemy. The devil makes the same triumphal display of the sacrilegious confessions, boasting of having taken from the souls the arms with which they might conquer him! Miserable the soul that thus converts a remedy into poison! That unhappy woman had but one sin on her conscience; but because she concealed it in confession, she committed sacrilege, and so the devil triumphed.

Tell me, my sister, if, in punishment of not confessing a certain sin, you were to be burnt alive in a caldron of boiling pitch, and if, after that, your sin were to be revealed to all your relatives and neighbors, would you conceal it? No, indeed, if you knew that by confessing it your sin would remain secret, and that you would escape being burnt alive. Now, it is more than certain that, unless you confess that sin, you will have to burn in hell for all eternity, and that on the day of judgment it will be made known to the whole human race. We must all, says the Apostle, be manifested before the judgment-seat of Christ.[14098] If, says the Lord, you do not confess the evil you have done, I will proclaim your ignominy to all nations; I will discover thy shame to thy face, and will show . . . thy shame to kingdoms.[14099]

Have you committed sin? If you do not confess it you shall be damned. Therefore, if you wish to be saved, you must confess it some time or other. And if at some time or other, why not now? as St. Augustine says.[14100] What do you wait for? Is it for death, after which you will not be able to make a confession? And know that the longer you conceal your sin and multiply sacrileges, the greater your shame and obstinacy in concealing it will become. "Obstinacy proceeds from the keeping back of sin," says St. Peter de Blois.[14101] How many miserable souls, who have formed a habit of concealing their sins, saying, "When death is near, then I will confess it," have not confessed it even at the hour of death!

I would have you also to know that, unless you confess the sin you have committed, you will never have peace during your whole life. O God! what a hell will that miserable woman have within herself who departs from the confessional without having confessed her sin. She always carries within her a viper that unceasingly rends her heart. The miserable being shall suffer a hell in this life and a hell in the next.

Come, then, my children, if any of you has unfortunately fallen into this abyss of misery, if there is any one among you who has concealed a sin through shame, come and confess it at once. It is enough for you to say to the confessor, "Father, I feel ashamed to tell a certain sin? or t o say, "Father, I have a scruple regarding my past life." This is sufficient; for the confessor will take care to pluck out the thorn that tortures you, and thus give peace to your conscience. And oh, what joy shall you feel after having expelled the viper from your heart!

To how many persons must you disclose the sin? You need only tell it once to one confessor; the evil is then repaired. And that the devil may not deceive you, know that we are bound to confess only mortal sins. Hence, if the sin that you are ashamed to confess were not mortal, or if, when you were committing it, you thought it was not mortal, you are not obliged to confess it. There are persons who committed some act of indecency in their childhood, but they then had no idea nor scruple that it was a mortal sin, and so are not bound to confess it.

But, Father, it may happen that my confessor will make known my sin to another. What do you say? Know that the confessor is bound to suffer himself to be burnt alive sooner than disclose a single venial sin confessed by a penitent. The confessor cannot speak of what he has heard in confession even to the penitent himself. [That is, without the permission of the penitent.]

But I am afraid that the confessor will speak harshly to me when he has heard the sins I have committed. What is it you say? Why should he speak harshly to you? All these are false suspicions that the devil puts into your head. Confessors sit in the confessionals not to hear ecstasies and revelations, but to hear the sins of those who come to confession; and they cannot experience greater consolation than when a penitent comes to make known to them his miseries. Were it in your power to rescue from death, w ithout inconvenience to yourself, a queen wounded by her enemies, what consolation would you feel in saving her life! This the confessor does in the confessional when penitents come to him to disclose the sins they have committed. By giving them absolution he delivers the souls of his penitents that had been wounded by sin, and he delivers them from the eternal death of hell.

St. Bonaventure[14102] relates in the life of St. Francis that a certain lady, after she was seen to breathe her last and before she was buried, suddenly rose up in the bed, and trembling, and full of terror, said that her soul, having departed from her body, was on the point of being plunged into hell for having concealed a sin in confession, but that she was brought into this life again by the prayers of St. Francis. She then called for a confessor, made her confession with many tears, and afterwards told the bystanders to beware of concealing sins in confession, because God will not show to all the mercy with which he had treated her. After these words she again gave up the ghost.

Should the devil tempt you to conceal a sin in confession, give him the answer that he received from a woman called Adelaide. She had been in the habit of sin with a young man who, through despair, had put an end to his life with his own hands, and was damned. She then entered into a monastery to do penance; and as she was going one day to confession the devil said to her: "Adelaide, where are you going?" She answered: "I am going to confound myself and you by confessing my sins."[14103] When the devil tempts you to conceal your sins in confession, let your answer be: "I am going to confound myself and you."

I have, at the end of this little book, written down some instances of persons who have been damned for concealing their sins in confession through a false shame.

2. THE CONFESSION MUST BE HUMBLE

A penitent at confession should imagine himself to be a criminal condemned to death, bound by as many chains as he has sins to confess; he presents himself before the confessor, who holds the place of God and who alone can loose his bonds and deliver him from hell. Therefore he must speak to the confessor with great humility. The Emperor Ferd inand, wishing to go to confession in his chamber, handed a chair to the confessor. When those who were in the room appeared surprised at so great an act of humility, the emperor said: "Father, I am now a subject, and you are my Superior."

Some argue with the confessor, and speak to him with as much haughtiness as if they were his Superiors; what fruit can they derive from such confessions? It is necessary then, to treat your confessor with respect. Speak to him always with humility, and with humility obey all his commands. When he reproves you, be silent, and receive his admonitions with humility; accept with humility the remedy that he prescribes for your amendment.

Do not get into a passion with him nor think him unjust and uncharitable. What would you say if you saw a sick man, who, while the surgeon opens the imposthume, treats him as a cruel and uncharitable man? Would you not say that he was mad? "But he tortures me." Yes; but it is by this torture that you are cured: without it you would die.

If the confessor tells you that he cannot absolve you until you have restored certain goods belonging to another, obey him, and do not be importunate for absolution: do you not know that he who has received absolution does not afterwards make restitution?

Does the confessor order you to return for absolution in a week or a fortnight, and in the mean time to remove the occasion of sin, to pray to God, to be firm in resisting all temptations to relapse into sin, and to practise all the other means that he recommends to you? Obey, and you shall thus free yourself from sin; do you not see that hitherto, when you were absolved immediately, you have, after the lapse of a few days, fallen again into the same crimes? "But if in the mean time death comes upon me?" But God has not hitherto taken away your life, when you continued so long a time in sin, and never thought of returning to him; will he, now that you desire to amend your life, send you a sudden death? "But it maybe that death will come upon me during the time for which absolution is deferred." And if this may happen during that time, make acts of contrition continually. I have already said[14104] that he who has the intention of going to confession and makes an act of contrition instantly receives pardon from God.

Of what use is it to receive absolution as often as you go to confession when you do not renounce sin? All these absolutions shall add to the fire that will torment you in hell. Listen to this fact. A gentleman contracted a habit of sin; he found a confessor who always absolved him, though he always relapsed. Me died, and was seen in hell carried on the shoulders of another person who was also damned. Being asked who it was that carried him, he answered: "He is my confessor, who, by absolving me as often as I went to confession, has brought me to hell. I am damned, and he who brought me to hell is also damned."

Do not then, O my brother, be angry when the confessor defers absolution, and wishes to see how you conduct your self in the mean time. If you always relapse into the same sin, although you have confessed it, the confessor cannot absolve you unless you give some extraordinary and manifest sign that you have the necessary dispositions. And, if he gives you absolution, you and he are condemned to hell. Be obedient, then; do what he bids you; for, when you return, after having done what he prescribed, he will certainly absolve you, and thus you shall be delivered from the sin that you have been in the habit of committing.

3. THE CONFESSION MUST BE SINCERE

The confession must be sincere, that is, without lies or excuses.

1. Without lies: lies told in confession, when they are in matters of small moment, are not mortal sins; but they are more grievous than other lies. But when the matter is grievous, such lies are mortal sins. For example, it would be a mortal sin for a pentitent to accuse himself of a mortal sin that he has not committed or to deny a mortal sin that he has committed and has never confessed, or to deny that he had a habit of a certain sin; for in all these he would be guilty of grievously deceiving the minister of God.

2. Without lies, and without excuses. In the tribunal of penance the criminal must be his own accuser; he must be an accuser, not an advocate to excuse his guilt. The more sincerely a man accuses himself, without extenuating his fault, the more readily shall he obtain absolution and mercy from God. It is related that the Duke of Ossuna, being one day in a galley, went about among the slaves, asking for what crime they had been condemned. All answered that they were innocent, only one acknowledged that he deserved severer punishment. The viceroy said: "Then it is not right to have you here among so many innocents;" and therefore ordered him to be released. Now, how much more will God pardon him who confesses his sins, without excuses, in the tribunal of penance.

How many are there who make their confession badly! Some tell their confessor the few good actions that they perform, but do not speak of their sins. "Father," they say, "I hear Mass every day; I say the beads; I do not blaspheme; I do not swear; I do not take my neighbor's property." Well, what then? Do you want to be praised by the confessor? Confess your sins; examine your conscience, and you will find a thousand things to be corrected: detractions, unclean expressions, lies, imprecations, unclean thoughts, hatred.

Others, instead of accusing themselves, begin to defend their sins, and to dispute with the confessor. "Father," they say, "I blaspheme because I have a master that cannot be borne; I have indulged myself in hatred to a neighbor, because she has spoken ill of me; I have committed sin with men, because I had nothing to eat." What benefit do you expect from such confessions? What is your object? Is it that the confessor may approve of your sins? Listen to what St. Gregory says: "If you excuse yourself, God will accuse you; if you accuse yourself, God will excuse you."[14105] Our Lord complained bitterly to St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi of those who excuse their sins in confession, and throw the blame of their own faults upon others, saying: "Such a person has been the occasion of my sin: such another has tempted me." Thus they come to confession to commit new sins; for, in order to excuse their own sins, they injure a neighbor's reputation without necessity. Such persons should be treated as a confessor treated a woman who, in order to excuse her own sins, told all the bad actions of her husband. "For your own sins," said the confessor, "you will say the 'Hail Holy Queen!' once; and for the sins of your husband, you will fast every day for an entire month." But must I do penance for the sins of my husband? Yes, if you confess all the sins of your husband in order to excuse your own sins. Thus, my sisters, confess henceforth your own sins, and not the sins of others, and say: "Father, it was not my companion, nor the occasion of sin, nor the devil, but my own malice, that made me voluntarily offend God."

It is, indeed true, that you must sometimes make known to the confessor the sin of another, either in order to explain the species of some sin, or to make the confessor understand the danger to which you were exposed, that he may be able to give you useful advice for the regulation of your conduct. But when you can go to another confessor, to whom the person is unknown, go to him. If, in changing your confessor, you should suffer a notable inconvenience; or if you think that your ordinary confessor, because he is better acquainted with the state of your conscience, can give you more useful counsel,—you are not obliged to go to another confessor. However, you should endeavor to conceal the accomplice as well as you can; for example, it is sufficient to tell the state of the person, if she is a young girl, if she is married, or if she has made a vow of chastity, without mentioning her name.

St. Francis de Sales warns penitents not to make useless accusations in confession, nor to mention circumstances through habit. "I have not loved God with all my strength; I have not received the sacraments as I ought; I have had but little sorrow for my sins. All these are useless words; they are a loss of time. "I accuse myself of the seven deadly sins, of the five senses of the body, and of the ten commandments of God." Give up these useless accusations; it is better to tell the confessor some defect into which you are for a long time accustomed to fall, without any amendment. Confess, then, the faults that you wish to correct. Of what use is it to say: "I accuse myself of all the lies I have told, of all my detractions, of all the imprecations I have uttered? When you do not give up these vices, and when you say that you cannot avoid them, of what use is it to confess them? It is only a mockery of Jesus Christ, and of the confessor. When, then, my children, you accuse yourselves of such faults, even though they should be only venial sins, confess them with a purpose of not relapsing into them.

V. THE PENANCE IMPOSED BY THE CONFESSOR

Satisfaction, which we call the penance, is a necessary part of the sacrament of penance. It is not precisely essential, because without it the confession may be valid, as would be the case if a penitent were dying and unable to perform suitable penance. But it is an integral part; so that, should a person at confession not have the intention of performing the penance enjoined the confession is null; for the penitent is obliged, in confessing his sins, to have the intention of complying with the penance imposed by the confessor. But if he has the intention of performing the penance, and afterwards neglects to fulfil it, the confession is valid; but he is guilty of a mortal sin if the penance be great.

It is necessary to know that, when a person commits a sin, he contracts the guilt, and renders himself liable to the punishment due to the guilt of sin. By the absolution of the confessor the guilt and the eternal punishment are remitted, and when the penitent has intense contrition, all the temporal punishment is also remitted. But when the contrition is not so great the temporal penalties remain to be suffered either in this life or in purgatory, as the Council of Trent teaches[14106] where it says, that the sacramental penance is not only a payment of the penalty that we have deserved, but also a means of cure for the base affections left in us by sin—our passions, bad habits, and hardness of heart; and that, moreover, it strengthens us against a relapse into the same sin. Therefore, my children, go to confession every week, or at least every fortnight, but never allow a month to pass without approaching the tribunal of penance.

What sort of sin is it not to perform the penance imposed by a confessor? If the penance is light, the omission of it is a venial sin: if great, it is a mortal sin. If the fulfilment of the penance enjoined should become very difficult, it may be changed by the same or by another confessor.

How soon after confession must the penance be performed? It must be performed within the time fixed by the confessor; and should he not fix a time, it ought to be performed within a short time; for when the penance is great, and particularly when it is medicinal, to defer the performance of it for a long time would be a mortal sin.

Should a penitent have the misfortune of falling into mortal sin after confession, is he still bound to fulfil the penance? Yes; he is obliged to fulfil it. And does he satisfy his obligation by performing the penance in the state of sin? Yes: he also complies with his obligation.

But, alas! many go to confession, accept the penance enjoined, but afterwards do not comply with it. "But, Father, I am not able to do all that my confessor has imposed upon me." And why did you accept a penance that you knew you could not perform? I recommend you to speak plainly, and to say to the confessor: "Father I am afraid that I shall not do all that you have imposed on me; give me a lighter penance." Of what use is it to say: Father, I will do it; Father, will do it; and afterwards to do nothing?

But know that, if you omit your penance in this life, you will have to perform far greater penance in purgatory. Turlot[14107] relates that a sick man, who was confined to bed, and afflicted with many pains for a year, prayed to God to release him from life. God sent an angel to tell him to choose either to go to purgatory for three days, or to submit to his pains for another year. The sick man chose the three days in purgatory, where after his death, he was visited by the angel. He complained that the angel had deceived him, and that he was suffering there, not for three days, but for several years. The angel said to him, "What! a day has scarcely passed; your body is not yet buried; and you say that you are suffering here for several years!" The deceased then besought the angel to bring him back again to life, that he might suffer his former infirmities for another year. His prayer was heard; and after having returned to life, he encouraged all that came to visit him, to suffer with cheerfulness all the pains of the present rather than wait for the pains of the next life.

Would to God the penitents performed all the penance due to their sins! Ordinarily speaking, almost all have to suffer some of the temporal punishment that awaits them. Of several persons who led a holy life, we read that they have been for some time in purgatory. Let us, then, endeavor, in addition to our sacramental penance, to perform other good works, alms, deeds, prayers, fasts, and mortifications. Let us also endeavor to gain as many indulgences as we can. Holy indulgences diminish the pains that we must suffer in purgatory. I will here mention some of the many indulgences which you can obtain.[14108]

1. He who hears Mass gains an indulgence of 3800 years.

1. He who wears the scapular of Mount Carmel, observes chastity, according to his state, abstains from meat on Wednesdays, and recites every day the "Our Father," "Hail Mary!" and "Glory be to the Father," etc., seven times, will soon be delivered from purgatory, as we read in the Office of the Blessed Virgin of Mount Carmel. There are also many indulgences gained by wearing the scapulars of the Blessed Virgin in Sorrow, of the Conception, and of Mercy.

2. He who says the "Angelus Domini," when the bell rings for it, gains many indulgences.

3. They who say: "Blessed be the holy, immaculate and most pure Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary," gain an indulgence of a hundred years.

4. To those who say the "Hail Holy Queen!" is granted an indulgence of forty days.

5. For saying the "Litany of the Blessed Virgin" there is an indulgence of two hundred days.

6. For pronouncing the names of Jesus and Mary, twenty-five days, and for bowing the head at these names, twenty days more.

7. They who say the "Our Father" and the "Hail Mary" five times in honor of the Passion of Jesus Christ and the Dolors of the Virgin Mary, gain an indulgence of ten thousand years.

8. An indulgence of seven years is granted to those who make the Christian Acts of Faith, Hope, and Charity, with the purpose of receiving the sacraments during life and at death; and they who make these Acts every day during a month gain a plenary indulgence.

9. An indulgence of many days is granted for every time that these Acts are made even when they are repeated on the same day.

10. An indulgence of many days is granted to those who make half an hour's meditation; and a plenary indulgence to those who make it every day for a month, provided they go to confession and Communion in the same month.

11. An indulgence of five years is granted to those who accompany the viaticum, and of six years to those who accompany it with light; and an indulgence of a hundred days to those who, when unable to accompany it, recite a Pater and Ave for the intention of the Pope.

12. An indulgence of a hundred days is granted to those who genuflect before the Most Holy Sacrament; to those who kiss the cross, an indulgence of a year and four days; to those who bow at the "Gloria Patri," thirty days; to those who kiss the religious habit, five years; to priests who recite before Mass, Ego volo celebrare missam, etc., fifty days.

I beseech you to apply to the souls in purgatory as many indulgences as you can. Fear not that, in consequence of applying them to these holy souls, you shall have to suffer the temporal pains due to your sins. Father Rossignoli[14109] states that at the hour of death St. Gertrude was afflicted at having done nothing for her own soul; for she applied all the good that she had done to the souls in purgatory. Jesus Christ appeared to her, and said: "Gertrude, be comforted; for your charity to the souls in purgatory has been so pleasing to me, that at death you shall escape purgatory, and shall be accompanied to heaven by all my beloved spouses, whom your suffrages have delivered from purgatory."

Chapter VI

EXTREME UNCTION, HOLY ORDERS, AND MATRIMONY

I HAVE still to speak of these last three sacraments; but there is little to be said on them for the instruction of seculars.

I. THE SACRAMENT OF EXTREME UNCTION

Extreme Unction is a sacrament in which the sick, in consequence of being anointed by the priest, receive grace to resist the temptations of the devil, to bear patiently the pains of sickness, and also to recover their health, if it should be conducive to the good of their souls.

The prayer of faith, says St. James, shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.[14110]

1. "Shall save the sick man;" this sacrament principally saves and heals the soul; but it also, as the Council of Trent[14111] teaches, sometimes heals the body, when the restoration of health is profitable to the soul. Hence we can infer how useful it may be to the health of the body to receive Extreme Unction as soon as possible; that is, as soon as the physician declares the disease to he grievous and dangerous to life, without waiting till there is no hope of recovery; because it is then impossible, in the natural course of things, for the sick man to recover, and for the restoration of his health it would be necessary that God should work a miracle. But when the sick man is in a state capable of being cured by natural means, the virtue of this sacrament will, as has been said, obtain for him bodily health, if his recovery be conducive to his spiritual welfare. Thus, in order to give this sacrament to the sick, it is sufficient that their infirmity be grievous, as Benedict XIV.[14112] has declared; and the Roman Catechism tells us that "Parish priests commit a most grievous sin if they wait for the disease to become desperate, when life and sensation are beginning to fail, before they will administer the unction."[14113]

2. But this sacrament principally regards the health of the soul. "And the Lord shall raise him up." The Council of Trent explains these words as follows: "It raises up the soul of the sick man, by exciting in him a trust in God's mercy, by which he is so lightened, that it enables him to bear more lightly the pains of his disease, and to resist more easily the temptation of the devil."[14114] I agree, therefore, with the theologians who say, that a person who refuses at death to receive Extreme Unction can scarcely be excused from grievous sin, because he voluntarily deprives himself of a great help to resist the great temptations by which the devil assails dying persons. After having recovered from a deadly disease, St. Eleazar said, for the instruction of all, that "we cannot comprehend how terrible are the assaults that the devil makes upon us at death, in order to effect our perdition."

3. "And if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him." This sacrament, as the Council declares, takes away sins, if any still remain to be expiated, and also the relics of sin.[14115] That is, the Extreme Unction delivers us from the temporal punishments that remain due to our sins and it also frees us from the relics of sins already pardoned,—that is, from the darkness of the understanding, the hardness of heart, from affections to sensible things, from diffidences, and the like. All these are the relics and effects of past sins, and these the Extreme Unction takes away.

But to receive all the fruits of this sacrament it is necessary to be in the state of grace; the sick should, therefore, first of all confess their sins, and then receive the most holy viaticum, and afterwards Extreme Unction; for, as the Roman Catechism says,[14116] this is the perpetual practice of the Church.

That you may be careful, when attacked by grievous illness, to receive this sacrament as soon as possible, in order to recover bodily health, if it be expedient for the soul (as has been already said), listen to an extraordinary fact, related by St. Bernard, in his life of St. Malachy, Archbishop of Armagh. The saint relates that St. Malachy having gone to visit a devout lady, who was near her end, found her somewhat better, and therefore deferred till the following day the administration of the sacrament of Extreme Unction. But scarcely had he left the house when he heard that the lady was dead. He was greatly afflicted because she had in consequence of his deferring the sacrament died without Extreme Unction. What did he do? He began to pray with great fervor that God would restore the deceased to life and continued to pray till she returned to life. The holy prelate instantly gave her the sacrament, and by its efficacy she perfectly recovered her health, and lived many years after.

II. THE SACRAMENT OF HOLY ORDERS

The sacrament of Order comes next. In this sacrament is given the power of consecrating the body of Jesus Christ, and of absolving from sin, and of performing other functions to the honor of God; he who receives this sacrament receives by it also grace to perform worthily these sacred duties.

On this point seculars should mind two things.

The first is, that to become a good ecclesiastic a divine vocation is necessary. There are three marks by which a person may know whether he has a divine vocation: 1. a virtuous life; 2. the intention of serving God in the ecclesiastical state; 3. the advice and approbation of his confessor. He who takes orders without these three necessary conditions is guilty of sin, and exposes his eternal salvation to great danger. And if he commits a sin, fathers and mothers are guilty of a far greater sin when they force their children to become priests in order to assist the family. God has instituted the office of priesthood, not for the advancement of families, but for the honor of his divine Majesty, and for the salvation of the souls which Jesus Christ has redeemed. Oh! how many fathers and mothers shall we see condemned on the day of judgment for having compelled their sons to become priests without a divine vocation!

2. The second thing that seculars should mind is the respect that they ought to pay to priests, because they are the ministers of Jesus Christ, and because through them we must be saved; for men are not saved without the sacraments, and the sacraments are administered only by the hands of priests. Hence it is necessary to respect their person as well as their reputation. Touch not My anointed.[14117] And in another place our Lord says to the priesthood: He that heareth you heareth Me.[14118] Be afraid, then, to despise or calumniate the priest, for God chastises this sin with great rigor. Theodoret,[14119] Bishop of Cirus, relates that St. James, Bishop of Nisibis, before he was consecrated bishop, went into Persia to visit the Christians of that country. As he passed by a fountain, some girls who were washing clothes treated him with derision. The saint raised his eyes to heaven to recommend himself to God, and by a divine inspiration cursed the fountain, and it instantly became dry. He then cursed the insolence of the girls, and their hair immediately became white as if they were in the decrepitude of old age, and remained white during their whole life as a sign of the respect that is due to priests.

III. THE SACRAMENT OF MATRIMONY

Matrimony is a sacrament by which man and woman, giving their consent before the parish priest and two witnesses, to take each other for husband and wife, remain bound together for life, and receive the grace to bring up their children in virtue, and to bear the burdens of the married state. But in order to receive this grace they must be in the state of grace when they are married. Hence before marriage they must make a good confession, and they ought also to receive the Holy Communion on the morning of their marriage.

They should also know well the articles of faith. For how can they teach them to their children if they themselves are ignorant of them? For this reason Bendedict XIV. ordained that all who wish to be married should be first examined by the parish priest whether they know the points of their faith; and that if they be found ignorant of them, they should be required to learn them before they are married.

Matrimony is free; but let children remember that it rarely happens that they can be excused from mortal sin if they contract marriage against the will of their father and mother, particularly if they marry without the knowledge of their parents. From marriages contracted against the consent of parents arise a thousand evils—disputes, hatred, and quarrels. Fathers cannot without a just cause hinder their children from marrying. On the other hand, children should, when they wish to marry, always endeavor to procure the consent of their parents, except when it is certain that the parents will unjustly and unreasonably refuse their consent.

Of the obligations of husbands and wives I have already spoken in explaining the fourth commandment.[14120]

But before we conclude, let us observe in the example of the son of Tobias[14121] the manner in which young persons should contract marriage. In the city of Rages, in Media, there was a holy girl called Sara, the daughter of Raguel, who was greatly afflicted, because seven young men on the night of their nuptials with her were, one after the other, strangled by the devil Asmodeus. The son of Tobias was afterwards destined to be the spouse of Sara. Having heard of the unhappy death of her former husbands, he was afraid to contract marriage with her. But to remove his fear, the angel Raphael, who accompanied him, said: "Know that the persons over whom the devil has power are those who engage in matrimony, not to please God, but for sensual gratification. Do not imitate such persons; take Sara for your wife, not to indulge your concupiscence, but rather to bring up children who shall serve and bless God, and thus you shall have nothing to fear from the devil." Thus the holy youth acted, and blessings were showered down on his marriage. Attend to the four admonitions which her parents gave to Sara when she took leave of them.[14122] First, said they, show respect to your father-in-law and mother-in-law. Secondly, love your husband. Thirdly, attend to the government of the family. Fourthly, conduct yourself in such a manner that none of your actions may deserve censure. All women who engage in the married state should attend to these admonitions.

APPENDIX

MELANCHOLY EXAMPLES OF PERSONS WHO HAVE MADE SACRILEGIOUS CONFESSIONS.[14123]

I

IN the chronicles of St. Benedict it is related that a solitary named Pelagius, who kept sheep for his poor parents, led a life so exemplary that all called him a saint. He lived in this manner many years. After the death of his parents he sold the little property that they had left him and retired into a hermitage. He, unfortunately, consented once to an unchaste thought. After this sin he fell into a state of great melancholy because he would not confess it, lest he should lose the good opinion of his confessor. While he was in this state of melancholy a pilgrim who passed by said to him: "Pelagius, confess your sin: God will pardon you, and your peace shall be restored." The pilgrim then disappeared. After this Pelagius resolved to do penance for his sin, but not to confess it, flattering himself that God would perhaps pardon him without confession. He entered into a monastery, in which he was immediately received on account of his reputation for sanctity, and there led an austere life, crucifying himself with fasts and penances. At last the hour of death came: he made his last confession; as he had always through shame concealed the sin during life, so he also concealed it at death; he received the viaticum, died, and was buried, with the reputation of a saint. On the following night the sacristan found the body of Pelagius out of its grave. He buried it again; but on the second and third nights he found the body out of the grave. He called the abbot, who, in the presence of the other monks, said: "Pelagius, you were always obedient during life; be obedient now also in death. Tell me, on the part of God, if it be the divine will that your body be kept in a particular place?" The deceased, howling, said: "Alas! I am damned for having concealed one sin in confession. O Abbot, look at my body!" And behold! his body appeared like red-hot iron sending forth sparks of fire. All fled away; but Pelagius called back the abbot, that he might remove the consecrated particle that still remained in his mouth. The abbot removed the sacred host. Pelagius then told them to take his body out of the church and to throw it on a dunghill like a dog. It was done as he desired.

II

In the annals of the Capuchins we read of one who was esteemed a saint, but made bad confessions. Being seized with a grievous illness, he was told to go to confession. He sent for a certain Father, to whom he said, "My Father, you tell me to go to confession; but I will not make any confession." "And why?" said the Father. "Because," replied the sick man, "I am damned; for I have never confessed all my sins; and now God deprives me of the power of making a good confession." After this he began to howl, and to tear his tongue, saying, "Accursed tongue, that would not confess sins when you were able." And thus, gnawing his tongue to pieces, and howling, he breathed forth his soul into the hands of the devil. After death he became black as a cinder, a terrible noise was heard, and the room filled with an intolerable stench.

III

Father Seraphine Razzi relates that in a city in Italy there was a married lady of noble rank who was reputed a saint. On her deathbed she received all the sacraments, and died with a high reputation for sanctity. After death her daughter, who always recommended to God the soul of her mother, heard one day, while she was at prayer, a great noise at the door. She turned round, and saw a horrible figure all on fire, and exhaling a great stench. At this sight she was so much terrified, that she was on the point of throwing herself out of the window; but she heard a voice saying: "Stop, stop, my daughter: I am your unhappy mother, who was considered a saint; but for some sins committed with your father, which I was ashamed ever to confess, God has condemned me to hell. Do not pray to God for me any more; for you only increase my pains." She then began to howl, and disappeared.

IV

The celebrated Doctor John Ragusino relates that a certain very spiritual woman practised meditation and frequented the sacraments, so that she was considered by her Bishop to be a saint. The unhappy woman looked one day at a servant, and consented to an unchaste thought; but because the sin was only one of thought, she flattered herself that she was not bound to confess it. However, she was always tortured with remorse of conscience, and particularly in her last illness. But even at death she concealed the sin through shame, and died without confessing it. The bishop who was her confessor, and believed her to be a saint, caused her body to be carried in procession through the whole city, and through devotion got her buried in his own chapel. But on the following morning on entering the chapel he saw a body above the grave, laid on a great fire. He commanded it in the name of God to tell what it was. A voice answered that it was his penitent, and that she was damned for a bad thought. She then began to howl and to curse her shame, which had been the cause of her eternal ruin.

V

Father Martin del Rio relates that in the province of Peru there was a young Indian called Catharine, who was a servant to a respectable lady. Her mistress induced her to receive baptism, and to frequent the sacraments. She often went to confession, but concealed some of her sins. Just before her death she made nine confessions; but they were all sacrilegious. After her confession she said to her fellow-servants that she concealed her sins. They told her mistress, who, on questioning her, found out that these sins were certain acts of impurity. She therefore told the confessor, who returned, and exhorted his penitent to confess all her sins. But Catharine obstinately refused, and got into such a state of desperation, that she turned and said to her confessor, "Father, leave me; take no more trouble: you are only losing your time;" and then she turned her face to him and began to sing some profane songs. When she was near her end her companions exhorted her to take the crucifix. She answered: "What crucifix? I know not Christ crucified, and I do not wish to know him." And thus she died. So great were the noise and stench during the night, that the mistress was obliged to leave the house. The deceased afterwards appeared to one of her companions, and said that she was damned on account of her bad confessions.

VI

Father Francis Rodriguez relates that in England, when the Catholic religion flourished in that country, King Augubert had a daughter, who, on account of her rare beauty, was sought by many princes. Being asked by her father whether she wished to marry, she answered that she had made a vow of perpetual chastity. The father obtained a dispensation from the Holy See, but she resolutely refused to accept it, saying that she wished for no other spouse than Jesus Christ. She only asked of her father permission to live a solitary life in his house. The father, because he loved her, complied with her request, and assigned to her a suitable maintenance. In her retirement she began to lead a saintly life in meditation, fasting, and works of penance, frequenting the sacraments, and frequently going to the hospitals to attend the sick. While she lived in this manner she fell sick in her youth and died. A certain lady who had been in her governess, while at prayer one night, heard a great noise, and saw a soul in the form of a woman in a strong fire, and bound in chains, in the midst of a multitude of devils. The soul said, "Know that I am the unhappy daughter of Augubert. "What!" replied the governess; "are you damned after a life so holy?" "Yes," replied the soul; "I am justly damned through my own fault. "And why? You must know that in my youth I took pleasure in listening to one of my pages, for whom I had an affection, reading a certain book. Once, after reading the book for me, the page kissed me; the devil began to tempt me, till in the end I committed sin with the page. I went to confession, and began to tell my sin; my indiscreet confessor instantly reproved me, saying, "What! has a queen been guilty of such a sin?" I then, through shame, said it was a dream. I afterwards began to perform penitential works and give alms, that God might pardon me without confessing the sin. At death I said to the confessor that I was a great sinner; he told me to banish the thought as a temptation. After this I expired, and am now damned for all eternity." She then disappeared amid such noise, that the whole world appeared to be falling in pieces, and left in the chamber an intolerable stench, which lasted for many days.

VII

Father John Baptist Manni, of the Society of Jesus relates that a certain lady had for several years concealed in confession a sin of impurity. Two religious of the Order of St. Dominic passed by the place. The lady, who was always waiting for a strange confessor, entreated one of them to hear her confession. When the Fathers departed, his companion said to the confessor of the lady that while she was confessing her sins he saw many serpents coming from her mouth, but that there was a large, horrible-looking serpent, whose head only came out, but afterwards went back entirely into the lady's mouth. He then saw all the serpents that came out return again. The confessor went back to the house of the lady, and on entering heard that she had died suddenly. Afterwards, when he was at prayer, the unhappy woman appeared and said to him, "I am the unfortunate person that made my confession to you; I committed one sin, which I voluntarily concealed from the confessors of the place. God sent you to me; but even then I could not conquer the shame of telling it. He therefore struck me suddenly dead when you entered the house, and has justly condemned me to hell." After these words the earth opened, and she fell into the chasm and instantly disappeared.

VIII

Saint Antony relates that there was a widow who began to lead a holy life, but afterwards, by familiarity with a young man, was led into sin with him. After her fall she performed penitential works, gave alms, and even entered into a monastery, but never confessed her sin. She became abbess. She died, and died with the reputation of a saint. But one night a nun who was in the choir heard a great noise, and saw a spectre encompassed with flames. She asked what it was. The spectre answered, "I am the soul of the abbess, and am in hell." "And why?" "Because in this world I committed a sin, and have never confessed it. Go, and tell this to the other nuns, and pray no more for me." She then disappeared amid great noise.

IX

In the annals of the Capuchins it is related that a certain mother, on account of having made sacrilegious confessions, began at death to cry out that she was damned for her grievous sins and for her bad confessions. Among other things, she said that she was bound to make restitution to certain persons, and that she had always neglected to do so. Her daughter then said to her, "My mother, let what you owe be restored; I am satisfied to sell all, provided your soul be saved." The mother answered: "Ah, accursed child! I am damned also on your account; for I have scandalized you by my bad example." Thus she continued to howl like one in despair. They sent for one of the Capuchin Fathers. When he arrived he exhorted her to trust in the mercy of God; but the unhappy woman said "What mercy! I am damned: sentence is already passed upon me, and I have already begun to feel the pains of hell." While she spoke thus, her body was raised to the ceiling of the chamber, and dashed with violence against the floor, and she instantly expired.

OBJECT OF THE WORK

THE present Work is entitled, ABRIDGED SERMONS FOR ALL THE SUNDAYS IN THE YEAR . They are called Abridged Sermons, because, although each contains abundant matter for a sermon, the sentiments are briefly expressed—not, however, so briefly as to render the sense obscure. Hence the work may be used for spiritual lectures. Diffuseness has been purposely avoided, that the preacher may extend the subject treated in the way which may appear best to him. A preacher will scarce ever deliver, with zeal and warmth, sentiments which he has not made in some manner his own. Hence the matter of each sermon has been condensed into a small compass, that the preacher may extend it according to his pleasure, and thus make it his own.

In each sermon there are many passages from the Scriptures and Holy Fathers, and a variety of reflections—perhaps too many for a single discourse—that the reader may select what will be most pleasing to him. The style is easy and simple, and therefore calculated to render the preaching of the Divine Word conducive to the salvation of souls.

PROTEStation

IN obedience to the decrees of Urban VIII., I protest that, of the miraculous works and gifts ascribed in this work to certain servants of God, and not already approved by the Holy See, I claim no other belief than that which is ordinarily given to history resting on mere human authority; and that in bestowing the title of Saint or Blessed, on any person not canonized or beatified by the Church, I only intend to do it according to the usage and opinion of men.

INSTRUCTIONS TO PREACHERS

1. IN the first place, the preacher, if he wishes that his preaching shall produce abundant fruit, should propose to himself the proper end—that is, to preach, not with a view to obtain honour, or applause, or any temporal advantage, but solely to gain souls to God; and hence it is necessary, that when he enters upon his exalted office of divine ambassador, he should pray to God fervently to inflame his heart with his holy love; because it is by this means that his preaching will be productive of much fruit. The venerable Father John D'Avila being once asked, what was most conducive towards preaching well, replied in those short but expressive words—"To love Jesus Christ well." It has been therefore found by experience, that preachers who love Jesus Christ have often effected more by a single discourse, than others by several.

2. St. Thomas of Villanova said, that the words of a sermon should be like so many darts of fire, which would wound and inflame the hearers with divine love. "But how," he subjoined, "can the heart be set on fire by those sermons which, though long and elaborate, issue, notwithstanding, from a frozen heart?" St. Francis de Sales observes, that the tongue speaks to the ear, but the heart speaks to the heart. He proceeds to say, that when the sentiments do not spring from the heart of the preacher, it is with difficulty they draw the hearts of others to divine love; he must himself be first inflamed with it. "Lampades ejus lampades ignis, atque flammarum." (Cant. 8:6.) He must be first a fire to burn, and afterwards a flame to set others on fire. St. Bernard explained this in other terms, when he said, that he must be first a cistern, and then a canal; first a cistern—that is, full of the fervour and zeal which are collected in mental prayer; and then a canal, to communicate it to others.

3. With regard to the subject matter of sermons. Those subjects should be selected which move most powerfully to detest sin and to love God; whence the preacher should often speak of the last things—of death, of judgment, of Hell, of Heaven, and of eternity. According to the advice of the Holy Spirit, "Memorare novissima tua, et in æternum non peccabis," (Eccl. 7:40,) it is particularly useful often to mae mention of death, by delivering several discourses on that subject during the year, speaking at one time on the uncertainty of death, which terminates all the pleasures as well as all the afflictions of this life; at another, on the uncertainty of the time at which death may arrive; now, on the unhappy death of the sinner; and again, on the happy death of the just.

4. The preacher should often speak of the love which Jesus Christ bears towards us, of the love which we should bear to Jesus Christ, and of the confidence we should have in his mercy whenever we are resolved to amend our lives. It would appear that some preachers do not know how to speak of anything but the justice of God, terrors, threats, and chastisements. There is no doubt but that terrifying discourses are of use to arouse sinners from the sleep of sin; but we should be persuaded at the same time, that those who abstain from sin solely through the fear of punishment, will with difficulty persevere for a long time. Love is that golden link which binds the soul to God, and makes it faithful in repelling temptation and practising virtue. St. Augustine said: "Ama et fac quod vis." He who truly loves God, flies from everything displeasing to Him, and seeks to please Him to the utmost of his power. And here let us cite that remarkable saying of St. Francis de Sales: "The love that does not spring from the passion of Christ is weak." By this the saint gives us to understand that the passion of Christ moves us most effectually to love him.

5. Thus it is very useful, and most conducive to inspire the love of God, to speak to sinners of the confidence which we should have in Jesus Christ if we abandon sin. "Viam mandatorum, tuorum cucurri, cum dilatasti cor meum" (Ps. 118:32.) When the heart is dilated with confidence it easily runs in the way of the Lord. In like manner the preacher should often speak of the confidence which we should have in the intercession of the Mother of God. Besides the discourses delivered during the course of the year, on the principal festivals of the Blessed Virgin Mary—as the Annunciation, the Assumption, her Patronage, and her Dolours—let him oftentimes, in his addresses to the people, inculcate upon the minds of his auditors devotion to the Mother of God. Some preachers have a very laudable custom of introducing into every sermon something regarding the Blessed Virgin, either by relating some example of graces bestowed on her clients, or of some act of homage performed by her votaries, or some prayer which we should offer to her.

6. Moreover, the preacher should often speak of the means by which we are preserved in the grace of God: such as, flying dangerous occasions and wicked companions, frequenting the sacraments, and especially recommending ourselves often to God and the Virgin Mother, in order to obtain the graces necessary for salvation, and principally the graces of perseverance and of the love of Jesus Christ, without which we cannot be saved.

7. The preacher should likewise often speak against bad confessions, in which sins are concealed through shame. This is an evil not of rare occurrence, but frequent, especially in small country districts, which consigns innumerable souls to hell. Hence it is very useful to mention, from time to time, some example of souls that were damned by wilfully concealing sins in confession.

8. We shall now speak briefly of the parts of a discourse, which are nine:—the exordium, the proposition, the division, the introduction, the proof, the confutation, the amplification, the peroration or conclusion, the epilogue, and the appeal to the passions. These are again reduced to three principal divisions: 1—the exordium; 2—the proof, which comprises the introduction that precedes, and the confutation of the opposite arguments, that follows it; 3—the peroration or conclusion, which comprises the epilogue, the moral exhortation, and the appeal to the passions. To the exordium rhetoricians assign seven parts:—the introduction, general proposition, confirmation, repetition of the proposition, connection, particular proposition, and division. But, commonly speaking, the substantial parts of the exordium are three: 1—the general proposition; 2—the connection or the link by which it is connected with the particular proposition; 3—the particular proposition, or the principal one of the discourse, which includes the division of the points. For example: 1—"We must work out our salvation, because there is no alternative: whosoever is not saved is damned:" that is the general proposition. 2—"But, to be saved, we must die a happy death:" that is the connection or application. 3—"But it is exceedingly difficult to die a happy death after a wicked life:" and that is the particular proposition, or principal one of the discourse, which ought to be clear, concise, and simple, and, at the same time, one; otherwise, if unity be not observed in the proposition, it would not be one sermon, but several; and, therefore, the points into which the discourse is divided ought all tend to prove one single proposition. For example: "The person who is addicted to a bad habit is with difficulty saved, because the bad habit (1) darkens the understanding, (2) hardens the heart:" and these will be the two points of the discourse. Let the points be short and few, not exceeding two, or, at most, three; and sometimes a single point will be sufficient. For example: "Mortal sin is a great evil, because it is an injury done to God;" or, "He who abuses too much the mercy of God will be abandoned by Him."

9. With regard to the body of the discourse, and, in the first place, the proof, it ought to be a perfect syllogism, but without appearing to be so. The major proposition should be proved before we pass to the minor; and the minor before we pass to the conclusion. This, however, is to be understood when the major or minor proposition requires proof: otherwise, when they express truths already known and certain, it is sufficient to amplify, without proving them.

10. As far as regards the order of the proofs, generally speaking, the authority of the Scriptures and of the Holy Fathers should be first adduced; then the arguments from reason; and afterwards the illustrations and examples. The texts of Scripture should be cited in an impressive and emphatic manner.

It is better than to dwell on the exposition of one or two texts of Scripture than to cite many at once, without considering well their import. The citations from the Fathers should be few and brief, and containing some sentiment that is strong and animated, and not trivial. After the citations, the arguments from reason should be adduced; concerning which, some assert that the weaker reasons should be adduced in the first place, and then the stronger; but I am disposed to adopt the opinion of others, who think it better that the strong arguments should be advanced; and that the weaker ones should occupy the middle place; because, were a weak argument adduced in the commencement, it might make a bad impression on the minds of the auditors. After the arguments from reason come the examples and illustrations. I have said that this arrangement should be observed ordinarily; but, occasionally, it will be of use to give some one of the forementioned proofs precedence of the others: this must be left to the discretion of the preacher.

11. Care should be taken that the transition from one point to the other be made naturally, without passing from one thing to another that has no relation to it. The most ordinary and easiest modes are these: "Let us proceed to the other point," etc.; or "Thus, after having seen," etc. And passing from one argument to another, you may say: "Besides, we should consider," etc., taking care, as far as it is possible, that the last part of the preceding argument has some connection with the following point or argument.

12. We have spoken of proofs. As far as regards the amplification of proofs, one is verbal, which consists in words; another is real, which may consist either in climax; for example: "It is a virtue to suffer tribulations with patience—a greater virtue to desire them; it is a greater still to take delight in them;" or it may be borrowed from the circumstances of the subject, or from comparison with another subject of equal or lesser consideration. The morals have their proper place, as we shall remark in the peroration. It is, however, occasionally allowed, after a satisfactory proof has been adduced, to address a short exhortation; and this is particularly the case in the sermons of the Mission, in which the audience is generally composed of rude, uneducated persons, on whom moral exhortation makes more impression; but these moral exhortations that are incidentally introduced should not be too long or too frequent, so as to render the discourse tedious or languid.

13. The peroration contains three parts—the epilogue, the moral exhortation, and the appeal to the passions. The epilogue is a recapitulation of the discourse, in which the most convincing arguments that have been already advanced are repeated, but which must be handled with a view to the movement of the passions which is to follow; whence the preacher, in his recapitulation, should commence to move the passions.

14. As to the moral exhortation, it may be observed, that oftentimes the principal fruit of the sermon consists, especially in discourses addressed to the people, in explaining the moral truths suitable to the subject of the discourse, with propriety and earnestness. The preacher, therefore, should take care to speak against the most prevalent vices, viz.: hatred, impurity, blasphemy; against evil occasions, wicked companions; against parents who allow their children to hold intercourse with persons of different sex; and especially against mothers who invite young men into their houses to converse with their daughters. Let him also exhort the heads of families to remove from their houses bad books, and particularly novels, which insinuate a secret poison that corrupts youth. Let him speak against games of hazard, which are the ruin of families and of souls.

15. In a word, let the preacher endeavour, in his sermons, always to insinuate whatever he can that is practical—that is, the remedies of the different vices; the means of persevering in a virtuous life; such as, to fly dangerous occasions and bad company; to offer violence to one's self in motions of anger, so as not to break out into injurious actions or words; by suggesting to the hearers some form of expression, to avoid blasphemies or imprecations; for example, "Lord, give me patience!" "Virgin Mary, assist me!" and the like. Let him recommend the people to hear Mass every morning: to read every day some spiritual book; every morning to renew the resolutions of not offending God, and to ask the Divine assistance in order to persevere; to make each day a visit to the most holy sacrament and the Blessed Virgin, in some representation of her; each evening to make the examination of conscience, with an act of sorrow; after having committed a sin, immediately to make an act of contrition, and to confess it as soon as possible: above all, let him recommend his hearers to have recourse to God and to the Blessed Virgin in the time of temptation, by repeating oftentimes the name of Jesus and Mary, and continuing to invoke their aid until the temptation ceases. Those means and remedies should be often repeated by the preacher, and recommended frequently in the course of his sermons; and he must not be deterred by the apprehension of being criticised by some learned person, who may remark that the preacher repeated the same things. In preaching we must not seek the applause of the learned, but the divine approbation and the advantages of souls, and particularly of poor ignorant persons, who do not profit so much by thoughts and arguments, as by those easy practices which are suggested and repeated to them. I say repeated, since those rude and unlettered persons will easily forget what they hear, unless it is oftentimes repeated to them.

16. Let young preachers also take care to develop, and to commit to memory, their sermons, before they deliver them from the pulpit. To preach extempore is useful, inasmuch as the discourse becomes thus more natural and familiar; this, however, is not the case with young men, but only with those who have been in the habit of preaching for many years; otherwise, young men would contract a habit of speaking without preparation, and of preaching at random, saying whatever occurred to them, without any order or arrangement. However, young preachers should take care to develop their sermons, not in the florid style of elaborate expression, lofty thoughts, and sounding periods. Read the golden treatise on popular eloquence by the celebrated scholar, Louis Muratori; in which he proves that all sermons addressed to an audience composed of learned and unlearned, ought to be not only familiar, but also popular; composed in an easy and simple style, such as the people are in the habit of using; avoiding, however, all low and vulgar expressions, which are not suited to the dignity of the pulpit. "The people," says Muratori, "are composed for the most part of the ignorant; if you address to them abstruse doctrines and reflections, and use words and phrases that are not adapted to ordinary comprehensions, what fruit do you hope for from persons who do not understand you? Wherefore, the practice of those preachers will never be conformable to the rules of the art, or the principles of genuine eloquence, who, instead of accommodating themselves to the limited capacity of so many of their hearers, appear to study to make themselves intelligible to the learned only; as if they were ashamed to make themselves understood by the poor, who have as good a right to the word of God as the learned. Nay more, a Christian preacher is bound to each one of his auditory in particular, as if there were no other who heard him. He who employs lofty reasoning, and is not careful to make himself understood by all, betrays the cause of God and his own duty, and disregards the spiritual necessities of a great portion of his audience." Hence the Council of Trent prescribes to all parish priests, to compose their discourses in a manner adapted to the capacity of their audience: "Archipresbyteri et parochi per se vel alios idoneos, plebes sibi commissas pro earum capacitate pascant salutaribus verbis." (Sess. v. cap. i. de Reform.)

17. St. Francis de Sales said, that select language and sounding periods are the bane of sacred eloquence; and the principal reason of this is, that sermons composed in this style have not the divine sanction and concurrence. They may be of use to the learned, but not to the illiterate, who generally constitute the principal part of every audience. On the other hand, sermons composed in a familiar style are useful to the illiterate as well as to the learned. Muratori adds, that when the preacher addresses the humbler classes alone, or country people, he ought to make use of the most popular and familiar style possible, in order to accommodate himself to the gross understanding of such ignorant persons. He says, that the preacher, when speaking to those rude people, should imagine himself to be one of them, who was desirous to persuade a companion of something; that, on this account also, the periods of sermons addressed to the common people should be concise and broken, so that whoever has not caught the meaning of the first sentence, may be able to comprehend the second; which cannot be done when the sentences are long and connected; for then, whoever does not understand the first period will not understand the second nor the third.

18. Muratori also observes, that, in preaching to the people, it is very useful to make frequent use of the figure called antiphora; by which a question is asked, and replied to by the speaker. For example: "Tell me why so many sinners relapse, after confession, into the same sins? I will tell you: because they do not remove the dangerous occasions of sin." It is also useful oftentimes to call on the auditory to attend to what is said, and especially to certain things that are more important. For example: "O good God! you come to us in order to save us, and we fly from you to destroy ourselves." It is useful likewise to repeat with emphasis some striking maxim of religion; as, for example: "There is no alternative: sooner or later we must die—sooner or later we must die;" or, "My brethren, it is certain that, after this life, we must be eternally happy, or eternally miserable."

19. I do not enlarge more on this subject, which I deem most important, as I have found it necessary to write more at length on it in a letter of apology which I published in reply to a religious who censured me for approving of sermons composed in a simple and popular style. I there premised in a sufficient manner whatever Muratori has observed on this subject, and subjoined what the Holy Fathers have written on it, as far as I was able to discover. I pray the reader not to omit to read this letter: it is an uncommon little treatise, which contains matter not treated by any preceding writer.

20. I do not, however, deem it right to omit to say something on the modulation of the voice, and on the gesture which should be used in preaching. As far as regards the voice, the preacher should avoid speaking in an inflated tone, or in a monotonous and invariably loud tone of voice. What moves and engages the attention of the hearers is, to speak at one time in a strong, at another time in a middle voice, and at another in a low voice, according as it suits the sentiment that is expressed, but without any sudden or violent fall or elevation; now to exclaim; now to pause; and now to resume with a sigh. This variety of tone and manner keeps the audience always attentive.

21. The preacher should avoid gesture that is affected, or oftentimes repeated in the same form, or too vehement, with much agitation of the body. The arms should be moved with moderation: ordinarily the right hand should be used; the left but seldom. The hands should not be raised above the head, nor too much extended sideways, nor held too confined. In delivering the exordium the preacher should remain stationery, and should not move from a middle position in the pulpit: in delivering the first sentence he should not use gesture; in the second, he should only commence to move the right hand, keeping the left resting on the pulpit or the breast. Let him take care not to keep the arms attached close to the sides, or to raise them both at the same time in form of a cross, or throw them behind the shoulders. He must rarely strike them against each other or against the pulpit: to stamp the feet is very unbecoming. The motion of the head should correspond with that of the hand, accompanying it in the direction in which it moves. It is a fault to twist the head, or move it too often or too violently, or to hold it always raised, or always inclined upon the breast. The eyes ought to accompany the motion of the head; whence it is a fault to keep them always closed or cast downwards, or fixed immoveably in one direction. It may be permitted sometimes to sit down, but it should be seldom. The same may be said of moving back and forward: but the preacher should never run from one side of the pulpit to the other. He should, for the most part, speak from a middle position, so as to be seen equally from either side; but it is useful to incline occasionally to the right or left, without, however, turning the back to the opposite direction. Finally, as far as regards the length of the sermon. The Lent sermons should not exceed an hour; and the Sunday discourses should not occupy more than three quarters of an hour; but the parochial instructions should not be longer than a half-hour, including the act of contrition, to which, ordinarily, it is advisable to accustom the common people; making them, at the close of the sermon, have recourse to the mother of God, to ask of her some particular grace—as, holy perseverance, a happy death, the love of Jesus Christ, and the like. Nor does it signify, that in order to make room for the act of contrition, the time of the sermon must be shortened; for these acts are the most precious fruit to be derived from it.

It were well that the preacher should sometimes exhort the audience to relate to others what they have heard in the sermon; as by this means it may be made useful even to those who have not heard it.

Sermon I

FIRST SUNDAY OF ADVENT

ON THE GENERAL JUDGMENT

"And they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of Heaven with much power and majesty."—MATT. 24:30.

AT present God is not known, and, therefore, he is as much despised by sinners, as if he could not avenge, whenever he pleases, the injuries offered to him. The wicked "looketh upon the Almighty as if he could do nothing." (Job 22:17.) But the Lord has fixed a day, called in the Scriptures "the day of the Lord," on which the Eternal Judge will make known his power and majesty. "The Lord," says the Psalmist, "shall be known when he executeth judgment." (Ps. 9:17.) On this text St. Bernard writes: "The Lord, who is now unknown while he seeks mercy, shall be known when he executes justice." (Lib. de xii. Rad.) The prophet Sophonias calls the day of the Lord "a day of wrath—a day of tribulation and distress—a day of calamity and misery." (1:15.)

Let us now consider, in the first point, the different appearance of the just and the unjust; in the second, the scrutiny of consciences; and in the third, the sentence pronounced on the elect and on the reprobate.

FIRST POINT. ON THE DIFFERENT APPEARANCE OF THE JUST AND OF SINNERS IN THE VALLEY OF JOSAPHAT.

1. This day shall commence with fire from Heaven, which will burn the earth, all men then living, and all things upon the earth. "And the earth and the works which are in it shall be burnt up." (2 Pet. 3:10.) All shall become one heap of ashes.

2. After the death of all men, "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall rise again." (1 Cor. 15:52.) St. Jerome used to say: "As often as I consider the day of judgment, I tremble. Whether I eat or drink, or whatever else I do, that terrible trumpet appears to sound in my ears, 'arise ye dead, and come to judgment,' " (in Matt., c. v.); and St. Augustine declared, that nothing banished from him earthly thoughts so effectually as the fear of judgment.

3. At the sound of that trumpet the souls of the blessed shall descend from Heaven to be united to the bodies with which they served God on Earth; and the unhappy souls of the damned shall come up from Hell to take possession again of those bodies with which they have offended God. Oh! how different the appearance of the former, compared with that of the latter! The damned shall appear deformed and black, like so many firebrands of Hell; but "the just shall shine as the sun." (Matt. 13:43.) Oh! how great shall then be the happiness of those who have mortified their bodies by works of penance! We may estimate their felicity from the words addressed by St. Peter of Alcantara, after death, to St. Teresa: "O happy penance! which merited for me such glory."

4. After their resurrection, they shall be summoned by the angels to appear in the valley of Josaphat. "Nations, nations, in the valley of destruction, for the day of the Lord is near." (Joel 3:14.) Then the angels shall come and separate the reprobate from the elect, placing the latter on the right, and the former on the left. "The angels shall go out, and shall separate the wicked from among the just." (Matt. 13:49.) Oh! how great will then be the confusion which the unhappy damned shall suffer! "What think you," says the author of the Imperfect Work, "must be the confusion of the impious, when, being separated from the just, they shall be abandoned?" (Hom. liv.) This punishment alone, says St. Chrysostom, would be sufficient to constitute a hell for the wicked. "Et si nihil ulterius paterentur, ista sola verecundia sufficerit eis ad pœnam," (in Matt., c. xxiv.) The brother shall be separated from the brother, the husband from his wife, the son from the father, etc.

5. But, behold! the heavens are opened—the angels come to assist at the general judgment, carrying, as St. Thomas says, the sign of the cross and of the other instruments of the passion of the Redeemer. "Veniente Domino ad judicium signum crucis, et alia passionis indicia demonstrabunt." (Opusc. ii. 244.) The same may be inferred from the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew: "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in Heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn." (24:30.) Sinners shall weep at the sign of the cross; for, as St. Chrysostom says, the nails will complain of them—the wounds and the cross of Jesus Christ will speak against them. "Clavi de te conquerentur, cicatrices contra et loquentur, crux Christi contra te perorabit." (Hom. xx., in Matt.)

6. Most holy Mary, the queen of saints and angels, shall come to assist at the last judgment; and lastly, the Eternal Judge shall appear in the clouds, full of splendour and majesty. "And they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of Heaven with much power and majesty." (Matt. 24:30.) Oh! how great shall be the agony of the reprobate at the sight of the Judge! "At their presence," says the Prophet Joel, "the people shall be in grievous pains." (Joel 2:6.) According to St. Jerome, the presence of Jesus Christ will give the reprobate more pain than Hell itself. "It would," he says, "be easier for the damned to bear the torments of Hell than the presence of the Lord." Hence, on that day, the wicked shall, according to St. John, call on the mountains to fall on them and to hide them from the sight of the judge. "And they shall say to the mountains and the rocks: Fall upon us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." (Apoc. 6:16.)

SECOND POINT. THE SCRUTINY OF CONSCIENCE.

7. "The judgment sat, and the books were opened." (Dan. 7:10.) The books of conscience are opened, and the judgment commences. The Apostle says, that the Lord "will bring to light the hidden things of darkness." (1 Cor. 4:5.) And, by the mouth of his prophet, Jesus Christ has said: "I will search Jerusalem with lamps." (Soph. 1:12.) The light of the lamp reveals all that is hidden.

8. "A judgment," says St. Chrysostom, "terrible to sinners, but desirable and sweet to the just." (Hom. iii. de Dav.) The last judgment shall fill sinners with terror, but will be a source of joy and sweetness to the elect; for God will then give praise to each one according to his works. (1 Cor. 4:5.) The Apostle tells us that on that day the just will be raised above the clouds to be united to the angels, and to increase the number of those who pay homage to the Lord. "We shall be taken up together with them in the clouds to meet Christ, into the air." (1 Thess. 4:16.)

9. Worldlings now regard as fools the saints who led mortified and humble lives; but then they shall confess their own folly, and say: "We fools esteemed their life madness, and their end without honour. Behold how they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the saints." (Wis. 5:4, 5.) In this world, the rich and the noble are called happy; but true happiness consists in a life of sanctity. Rejoice, ye souls who live in tribulation; "your sorrow shall be turned into joy." (John 16:20.) In the valley of Josaphat you shall be seated on thrones of glory.

10. But the reprobate, like goats destined for the slaughter, shall be placed on the left, to await their last condemnation. "Judicii tempus," says St.

Chrysostom, "misericordiam non recipit." On the day of judgment there is no hope of mercy for poor sinners. "Magna," says St. Augustine, "jam est pœna peccati, metum et memoriam divini perdidisse judicii." (Serm. xx. de Temp.) The greatest punishment of sin in those who live in enmity with God, is to lose the fear and remembrance of the divine judgment. Continue, continue, says the Apostle, to live obstinately in sin; but in proportion to your obstinacy, you shall have accumulated for the day of judgment a treasure of the wrath of God. "But according to thy hardness and impenitent heart, thou treasurest up to thyself wrath against the day of wrath." (Rom. 2:5.)

11. Then sinners will not be able to hide themselves; but, with insufferable pain, they shall be compelled to appear in judgment. "To lie hid," says St. Anselm, "will be impossible—to appear will be intolerable." The devils will perform their office of accusers, and, as St. Augustine says, will say to the Judge: "Most just God, declare him to be mine, who was unwilling to be yours." The witnesses against the wicked shall be, first, their own conscience—"Their conscience bearing witness to them," (Rom. 2:15.); secondly, the very walls of the house in which they sinned shall cry out against them—"The stone shall cry out of the wall," (Hab. 2:11.); thirdly, the Judge himself will say—"I am the judge and the witness, saith the Lord." (Jer. 29:23.) Hence, according to St. Augustine, "He who is now the witness of your life, shall be the judge of your cause." (Lib. x. de Chord., c. ii.) To Christians particularly he will say: "Woe to thee, Corozain, woe to thee, Bethsaida; for if in Tyre and Sidon had been wrought the miracles that have been wrought in you, they had long ago done penance in sackcloth and ashes." (Matt. 11:21.) Christians, he will say, if the graces which I have bestowed on you had been given to the Turks or to the Pagans, they would have done penance for their sins; but you have ceased to sin only with your death. He shall then manifest to all men their most hidden crimes. "I will discover thy shame to thy face." (Nahum 3:5.) He will expose to view all their secret impurities, injustices, and cruelties. "I will set all thy abominations against thee." (Ezech. 7:3.) Each of the damned shall carry his sins written on his forehead.

12. What excuses can save the wicked on that day? Ah! they can offer no excuses. "All iniquity shall stop her mouth." (Ps. 106:42.) Their very sins shall close the mouth of the reprobate, so that they will not have courage to excuse themselves. They shall pronounce their own condemnation.

THIRD POINT. SENTENCE OF THE ELECT, AND OF THE REPROBATE.

13. St. Bernard says, that the sentence of the elect, and their destiny to eternal glory, shall be first declared, that the pains of the reprobate may be increased by the sight of what they lost. "Prius pronunciabitur sententia electis ut acrius (reprobi) doleant videntes quid amiserunt." (Ser. viii., in Ps. xc.) Jesus Christ, then, shall first turn to the elect, and with a serene countenance shall say: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom preparad for you from the foundation of the world." (Matt. 25:34.) He will then bless all the tears shed through sorrow for their sins, and all their good works, their prayers, mortifications, and communions; above all, he will bless for them the pains of his passion and the blood shed for their salvation. And, after these benedictions, the elect, singing alleluias, shall enter Paradise to praise and love God for eternity.

14. The Judge shall then turn to the reprobate, and shall pronounce the sentence of their condemnation in these words. "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire." (Matt. 25:41.) They shall then be for ever accursed, separated from God, and sent to burn for ever in the fire of hell. And these shall go into everlasting punishment: but the just into life everlasting." (Matt. 25:46.)

15. After this sentence, the wicked shall, according to St. Ephrem, be compelled to take leave for ever of their relatives, of Paradise, of the saints, and of Mary the divine Mother. "Farewell, ye just! Farewell, O cross! Farewell, O Paradise! Farewell, fathers and brothers: we shall never see you again! Farewell, O Mary, mother of God!" (St. Eph. de variis serm. inf.) Then a great pit shall open in the middle of the valley: the unhappy damned shall be cast into it, and shall see those doors shut which shall never again be opened. O accursed sin! to what a miserable end will you one day conduct so many souls redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ. O unhappy souls! for whom is prepared such a melancholy end. But, brethren, have confidence. Jesus Christ is now a Father, and not a judge. He is ready to pardon all who repent. Let us then instantly ask pardon from him.

[Let the preacher here propose for the people an act of sorrow, a purpose of amendment, and a prayer to Jesus and to Mary for the gift of holy perseverance. Let him repeat the same at the end of every sermon.]

Sermon II

SECOND SUNDAY OF ADVENT

ON THE ADVANTAGES OF TRIBULATIONS

"Now when John had heard of the wonderful works of Christ," etc. MATT. 9:2.

IN tribulations God enriches his beloved souls with the greatest graces. Behold, St. John in his chains comes to the knowledge of the works of Jesus Christ: "When John had heard in prison the works of Christ." Great indeed are the advantages of tribulations. The Lord sends them to us, not because he wishes our misfortune, but because he desires our welfare. Hence, when they come upon us we must embrace them with thanksgiving, and must not only resign ourselves to the divine will, but must also rejoice that God treats us as he treated his Son Jesus Christ, whose life upon this earth was always full of tribulation. I shall now show, in the first point, the advantages we derive from tribulations; and in the second, I shall point out the manner in which we ought to bear them.

FIRST POINT. ON THE GREAT ADVANTAGES WE DERIVE FROM TRIBULATIONS.

1. "What doth he know that had not been tried? A man that hath much experience shall think of many things, and he that hath learned many things shall show forth understanding." (Eccl. 34:9.) They who live in prosperity, and have no experience of adversity, know nothing of the state of their souls. In the first place, tribulation opens the eyes which prosperity had kept shut. St. Paul remained blind after Jesus Christ appeared to him, and, during his blindness, he perceived the errors in which he lived. During his imprisonment in Babylon, King Manasses had recourse to God, was convinced of the malice of his sins, and did penance for them. "And after that he was in distress he prayed to the Lord his God, and did penance exceedingly before the God of his fathers." (2 Paral. 33:12.) The prodigal, when he found himself under the necessity of feeding swine, and afflicted with hunger, exclaimed: "I will arise and go to my father." (Luke 15:18.)

Secondly, tribulation takes from our hearts all affections to earthly things. When a mother wishes to wean her infant she puts gall on the paps, to excite his disgust, and induce him to take better food. God treats us in a similar manner: to detach us from temporal goods, he mingles them with gall, that by tasting its bitterness, we may conceive a dislike for them, and place our affections on the things of Heaven. "God," says St. Augustine, "mingles bitterness with earthly pleasures, that we may seek another felicity, whose sweetness does not deceive." (Ser. xxix., de Verb. Dom.)

Thirdly, they who live in prosperity are molested by many temptations of pride, of vain-glory; of desires of acquiring greater wealth, great honours, and greater pleasures. Tribulations free us from these temptations, and make us humble and content in the state in which the Lord has placed us. Hence the Apostle says: "We are chastised by the Lord that we may not be condemned with this world." (1 Cor. 11:32.)

2. Fourthly, by tribulation we atone for the sins we have committed much better than by voluntary works of penance. "Be assured," says St. Augustine, "that God is a physician, and that tribulation is a salutary medicine." Oh! how great is the efficacy of tribulation in healing the wounds caused by our sins! Hence, the same saint rebukes the sinner who complains of God for sending him tribulations. "Why," he says, "do you complain? What you suffer is a remedy, not a punishment." (In Ps. lv.) Job called those happy men whom God corrects by tribulation; because he heals them with the very hands with which he strikes and wounds them. "Blessed is the man whom God correcteth. . . . For he woundeth and cureth. He striketh, and his hand shall heal." (Job 5:17, 18.) Hence, St. Paul gloried in his tribulations: "Gloriamur in tribulationibus." (Rom. 5:3.)

3. Fifthly, by convincing us that God alone is able and willing to relieve us in our miseries, tribulations remind us of him, and compel us to have recourse to his mercy. "In their affliction they will rise early to me." (Osee 6:1.) Hence, addressing the afflicted, the Lord said: "Come to me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you." (Matt. 11:28.) Hence he is called "a helper in troubles." (Ps. 45:1.) "When," says David, "he slew them, then they sought him, and they returned." (Ps. 77:34.) When the Jews were afflicted, and were slain by their enemies, they remembered the Lord, and returned to him.

4. Sixthly, tribulations enable us to acquire great merits before God, by giving us opportunities of exercising the virtues of humility, of patience, and of resignation to the divine will. The venerable John d'Avila used to say, that a single blessed be God, in adversity, is worth more than a thousand acts in prosperity. "Take away," says St. Ambrose, "the contests of the martyrs, and you have taken away their crowns." (In Luc., c. iv.) Oh! what a treasure of merit is acquired by patiently bearing insults, poverty, and sickness! Insults from men were the great objects of the desires of the saints, who sought to be despised for the love of Jesus Christ, and thus to be made like unto him.

5. How great is the merit gained by bearing with the inconvenience of poverty. "My God and my all," says St. Francis of Assisium: in expressing this sentiment, he enjoyed more of true riches than all the princes of the Earth. How truly has St. Teresa said, that "the less we have here, the more we shall enjoy hereafter." Oh! how happy is the man who can say from his heart: My Jesus, thou alone art sufficient for me! If, says St. Chrysostom, you esteem yourself unhappy because you are poor, you are indeed miserable and deserving of tears; not because you are poor, but because, being poor, you do not embrace your poverty, and esteem yourself happy." "Sane dignus es lachrymis ob hoc, quod miserum te extimas, non ideo quod pauper es." (Serm. ii, Epis. ad Phil.)

6. By bearing patiently with the pains of sickness, a great, and perhaps the greater, part of the crown which is prepared for us in Heaven is completed. The sick sometimes complain that in sickness they can do nothing; but they err; for, in their infirmities they can do all things, by accepting their sufferings with peace and resignation. "The Cross of Christ," says St. Chrysostom, "is the key of Paradise." (Com. in Luc. de vir.)

7. St. Francis de Sales used to say. "To suffer constantly for Jesus is the science of the saints; we shall thus soon become saints." It is by sufferings that God proves his servants, and finds them worthy of himself. "Deus tentavit es, et invenit eos dignos se." (Wis. 3:5.) "Whom," says St. Paul, "the Lord loveth, he chastiseth; and he scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." (Heb. 12:6.) Hence, Jesus Christ once said to St. Teresa: "Be assured that the souls dearest to my Father are those who suffer the greatest afflictions." Hence Job said: "If we have received good things at the hand of God, why should we not receive evil?" (Job. 2:10.) If we have gladly received from God the goods of this Earth, why should we not receive more cheerfully tribulations, which are far more useful to us than worldly prosperity? St. Gregory informs us that, as flame fanned by the wind increases, so the soul is made perfect when she is oppressed by tribulations. "Ignis flatu premitur, ut crescat." (Ep. xxv.)

8. To holy souls the most severe afflictions are the temptations by which the Devil impels them to offend God: but they who bear these temptations with patience, and banish them by turning to God for help, shall acquire great merit. "And," says St. Paul, "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, but will also make issue with the temptation that you may be able to bear it." (1 Cor. 10:13.) God permits us to be molested by temptations, that, by banishing them, we may gain greater merit. "Blessed," says the Lord, "are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." (Matt. 5:5.) They are blessed, because, according to the Apostle, our tribulations are momentary and very light, compared with the greatness of the glory which they shall obtain for us for eternity in Heaven. "For that which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation, worketh for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory." (1 Cor. 4:17.)

9. It is necessary, then, says St. Chrysostom, to bear tribulations in peace; for, if you accept them with resignation, you shall gain great merit; but if you submit to them with reluctance, you shall increase, instead of diminishing, your misery "Si vero ægre feras, neque calamitatum minorem facies, et majorem reddes procellam." (Hom. lxiv., ad Pop.) If we wish to be saved, we must submit to trials. "Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God." (Acts 14:21.) A great servant of God used to say, that Paradise is the place of the poor, of the persecuted, of the humble and afflicted. Hence St. Paul says: "Patience is necessary for you, that, doing the will of God, you may receive the promise." (Heb. 10:36.) Speaking of the tribulations of the saints, St. Cyprian asks "What are they to the servants of God, whom Paradise invites?" (Ep, ad Demetr.) Is it much for those to whom the eternal goods of Heaven are promised, to embrace the short afflictions of this life?

10. In fine, the scourges of Heaven are sent not for our injury, but for our good. "Let us believe that these scourges of the Lord, with which, like servants, we are chastised, have happened for our amendment, and not for our destruction." (Judith 8:27.) "God," says St. Augustine, "is angry when he does not scourge the sinner." (In Ps. lxxxix.) When we see a sinner in tribulation in this life, we may infer that God wishes to have mercy on him in the next, and that he exchanges eternal for temporal chastisement. But miserable the sinner whom the Lord does not punish in this life! For those whom he does not chastise here, he treasures up his wrath, and for them he reserves eternal chastisement.

11. "Why," asks the Prophet Jeremy, "doth the way of the wicked prosper?" (12:1.) "Why, O Lord, do sinners prosper? To this the same prophet answers: "Gather them together as sheep for a sacrifice, and prepare them for the day of slaughter." (Ib. v. 3.) As on the day of sacrifice the sheep intended for slaughter are gathered together, so the impious, as victims of divine wrath, are destined to eternal death. "Destine them," says Du Hamel, in his commentary on this passage, "as victims of thy anger on the day of sacrifice."

12. When, then, God sends us tribulations, let us say with Job: "I have sinned, and indeed I have offended, and I have not received what I have deserved." (Job 33:27.) O Lord, my sins merit far greater chastisement than that which thou hast inflicted on me. We should even pray with St. Augustine, "Burn—cut—spare not in this life, that thou mayest spare for eternity." How frightful is the chastisement of the sinner of whom the Lord says: "Let us have pity on the wicked, but he will not learn justice." (Is. 26:10.) Let us abstain from chastising the impious: as long as they remain in this life they will continue to live in sin, and shall thus be punished with eternal torments. On this passage St. Bernard says: "Misericordiam hanc nolo, super omnem iram miseratio ista." (Serm. xlii., in Cant.) Lord, I do not wish for such mercy, which is a chastisement that surpasses all chastisements.

13. The man whom the Lord afflicts in this life has a certain proof that he is dear to God. "And," said the angel to Tobias, "because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptations should prove thee." (Tob. 12:13.) Hence, St. James pronounces blessed the man who is afflicted: because after he shall have been proved by tribulation, he will receive the crown of life." (Jam. 1:12.)

14. He who wishes to share in the glory of the saints, must suffer in this life as the saints have suffered. None of the saints has been esteemed or treated well by the world—all of them have been despised and persecuted. In them have been verified the words of the Apostle: "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution." (2 Tim. 3:12.) Hence St. Augustine said, that they who are unwilling to suffer persecutions, have not as yet begun to be Christians. "Si putas non habere persecutiones, nondum cæpisti esse Christianus." (In Ps. lv.) When we are in tribulation, let us be satisfied with the consolation of knowing that the Lord is then near us and in our company. "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a contrite heart." (Ps. 33:19.) "I am with him in tribulation." (Ps. 90:15.)

SECOND POINT. ON THE MANNER IN WHICH WE SHOULD BEAR TRIBULATIONS.

15. He who suffers tribulations in this world should, in the first place, abandon sin, and endeavour to recover the grace of God; for as long as he remains in sin, the merit of all his sufferings is lost. "If," says St. Paul, "I should deliver my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." (1 Cor. 13:3.) If you suffered all the torments of the martyrs, or bore to be burned alive, and were not in the state of grace, it would profit you nothing.

16. But, to those who can suffer with God, and with resignation for God's sake, all the tribulations shall be a source of comfort and gladness. "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy." (John 16:20.) Hence, after having been insulted and beaten by the Jews, the apostles departed from the council full of joy, because they had been maltreated for the love of Jesus Christ. "And they indeed went from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus." (Acts 5:41.) Hence, when God visits us with any tribulations, we must say with Jesus Christ: "The chalice which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18:11.) It is necessary to know that every tribulation, though it may come from men, is sent to us by God.

17. When we are surrounded on all sides with tribulations, and know not what to do, we must turn to God, who alone can console us. Thus King Josaphat, in his distress, said to the Lord: "As we know not what to do, we can only turn our eyes to thee." (2 Par. 20:12.) Thus David also in his tribulation had recourse to God, and God consoled him: "In my trouble I cried to the Lord, and he heard me." (Ps. 119:1.) We should turn to God, and pray to him, and never cease to pray till he hears us. "As the eyes of the handmaid are on the hands of her mistress, so are our eyes unto the Lord our God, until he have mercy on us." (Ps. 122:2.) We must keep our eyes continually raised to God, and must continue to implore his aid, until he is moved to compassion for our miseries. "We must have great confidence in the heart of Jesus Christ, and ought not to imitate certain persons, who instantly lose courage because they do not feel that they are heard as soon as they begin to pray. To them may be applied the words of the Saviour to St. Peter: "O thou of little faith! why didst thou doubt?" (Matt. 14:31.) When the favours which we ask are spiritual, or can be profitable to our souls, we should be certain of being heard, provided we persevere in prayer, and do not lose confidence. "All things whatsoever you ask when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you." (Mark 11:24.) In tribulations, then, we should never cease to hope with confidence that the divine mercy will console us; and if our afflictions continue, we must say with Job: "Although he should kill me, I will trust in him." (13:15.)

18. Souls of little faith, instead of turning to God in their tribulations, have recourse to human means, and thus provoke God's anger, and remain in their miseries. "Unless the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. Unless the Lord keep the city, he watcheth in vain that keepeth it." (Ps. 126:1.) On this passage St. Augustine writes: "Ipse ædificat, ipse intellectum aperit, ipse ad finem applicat sensum vestrum: et tamen laboramus et nos tanquam operarii, sed nisi Dominus custodierit civitatem," etc. All good—all help must come from the Lord. Without him creatures can give us no assistance.

19. Of this the Lord complains by the mouth of his prophet: "Is not," he says, "the Lord in Sion? . . . Why then have they provoked me to wrath with their idols . . . Is there no balm in Galaad? or is there no physician there? Why then is not the wound of the daughter of my people closed?" (Jer. 8:19, 22.) Am I not in Sion? Why then do men provoke me to anger by recurring to creatures, which they convert into idols by placing in them all their hopes? Do they seek a remedy for their miseries? Why do they not seek it in Galaad, a mountain full of balsamic ointments, which signify the divine mercy? There they can find the physician and the remedy of all their evils. Why then, says the Lord, do your wounds remain open? Why are they not healed? It is because you have recourse not to me, but to creatures, and because you confide in them, and not in me.

20. In another place the Lord says: "Am I become a wilderness to Israel, or a lateward springing land? Why then have my people said: We are revolted; we will come to thee no more? . . . But my people have forgotten me days without number." (Jer. 2:31, 32.) God complains, and says: "Why, my children, do you say that you will have recourse to me no more? Am I become to you a barren land, which gives no fruit, or gives it too late? Is it for this reason that you have so long forgotten me? By these words he manifests to us his desire that we pray to him, in order that he may be able to give us his graces; and he also gives us to understand that when we pray to him, he is not slow, but instantly begins to assist us.

21. The Lord, says David, is not asleep when we turn to his goodness, and ask the graces which are profitable to our souls: he hears us immediately, because he is anxious for our welfare. "Behold, he shall neither slumber nor sleep that keepeth Israel." (Ps. 120:4.) When we pray for temporal favours, St. Bernard says that God "will give what we ask, or something more useful." He will grant us the grace which we desire, whenever it is profitable to our souls; or he will give us a more useful grace, such as the grace to resign ourselves to the divine will, and to suffer with patience our tribulations, which shall merit a great increase of glory in Heaven.

Sermon III

THIRD SUNDAY OF ADVENT

ON THE MEANS NECESSARY FOR SALVATION

"I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness: Make straight the way of the Lord."—JOHN 1:23.

ALL would wish to be saved and to enjoy the glory of Paradise; but to gain Heaven, it is necessary to walk in the straight road that leads to eternal bliss. This road is the observance of the divine commands. Hence, in his preaching, the Baptist exclaimed: "Make straight the way of the Lord." In order to be able to walk always in the way of the Lord, without turning to the right or to the left, it is necessary to adopt the proper means. These means are, first, diffidence in ourselves; secondly, confidence in God; thirdly, resistance to temptations.

FIRST MEANS. DIFFIDENCE IN OURSELVES.

1. "With fear and trembling," says the Apostle, "work out your salvation." (Phil. 2:12.) To secure eternal life, we must be always penetrated with fear, we must be always afraid of ourselves (with fear and trembling), and distrust altogether our own strength; for, without the divine grace we can do nothing. "Without me," says Jesus Christ, "you can do nothing." We can do nothing for the salvation of our own souls. St. Paul tells us, that of ourselves we are not capable of even a good thought. "Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God." (2 Cor. 3:5.) Without the aid of the Holy Ghost, we cannot even pronounce the name of Jesus so as to deserve a reward. "And no one can say the Lord Jesus, but by the Holy Ghost." (1 Cor. 12:8.)

2. Miserable the man who trusts to himself in the way of God. St. Peter experienced the sad effects of self-confidence. Jesus Christ said to him: "In this night, before cock crow, thou wilt deny me thrice." (Matt. 26:34.) Trusting in his own strength and his good will, the Apostle replied: "Yea, though I should die with thee, I will not deny thee." (v. 35) What was the result? On the night on which Jesus Christ had been taken, Peter was reproached in the court of Caiphas with being one of the disciples of the Saviour. The reproach filled him with fear: he thrice denied his Master, and swore that he had never known him. Humility and diffidence in ourselves are so necessary for us, that God permits us sometimes to fall into sin, that, by our fall, we may acquire humility and a knowledge of our own weakness. Through want of humility David also fell: hence, after his sin, he said: "Before I was humbled, I offended." (Ps. 118:67.)

3. Hence the Holy Ghost pronounces blessed the man who is always in fear: "Blessed is the man who is always fearful." (Prov. 28:14.) He who is afraid of falling distrusts his own strength, avoids as much as possible all dangerous occasions, and recommends himself often to God, and thus preserves his soul from sin. But the man who is not fearful, but full of self-confidence, easily exposes himself to the danger of sin: he seldom recommends himself to God, and thus he falls. Let us imagine a person suspended over a great precipice by a cord held by another. Surely he would constantly cry out to the person who supports him: Hold fast, hold fast; for God's sake, do not let go. We are all in danger of falling into the abyss of all crime, if God does not support us. Hence we should constantly beseech him to keep his hands over us, and to succour us in all dangers.

4. In rising from bed, St. Philip Neri used to say every morning: O Lord, keep thy hand this day over Philip; if thou do not, Philip will betray thee. And one day, as he walked through the city, reflecting on his own misery, he frequently said, I despair, I despair. A certain religious who heard him, believing that the saint was really tempted to despair, corrected him, and encouraged him to hope in the divine mercy. But the saint replied: "I despair of myself, but I trust in God." Hence, during this life, in which we are exposed to so many dangers of losing God, it is necessary for us to live always in great diffidence of ourselves, and full of confidence in God.

SECOND MEANS. CONFIDENCE IN GOD.

5. St. Francis de Sales says, that the mere attention to self-diffidence on account of our own weakness, would only render us pusillanimous, and expose us to great danger of abandoning ourselves to a tepid life, or even to despair. The more we distrust our own strength, the more we should confide in the divine mercy. This is a balance, says the same saint, in which the more the scale of confidence in God is raised, the more the scale of diffidence in ourselves descends.

6. Listen to me, O sinners who have had the misfortune of having hitherto offended God, and of being condemned to hell: if the Devil tells you that but little hope remains of your eternal salvation, answer him in the words of the Scripture: "No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded." (Eccl. 2:11.) No sinner has ever trusted in God, and has been lost. Make, then, a firm purpose to sin no more; abandon yourselves into the arms of the divine goodness; and rest assured that God will have mercy on you, and save you from Hell. "Cast thy care upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." (Ps. 54:23.) The Lord, as we read in Blosius, one day said to St. Gertrude: "He who confides in me, does me such violence that I cannot but hear all his petitions."

7. "But," says the Prophet Isaias, "they that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall take wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint." (40:31.) They who place their confidence in God shall renew their strength; they shall lay aside their own weakness, and shall acquire the strength of God; they shall fly like eagles in the way of the Lord, without fatigue and without ever failing. David says, that "mercy shall encompass him that hopeth in the Lord." (Ps. 31:10.) He that hopes in the Lord shall be encompassed by his mercy, so that he shall never be abandoned by it.

8. St. Cyprian says, that the divine mercy is an inexhaustible fountain. They who bring vessels of the greatest confidence, draw from it the greatest graces. Hence, the Royal Prophet has said: "Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, as we have hoped in thee." (Ps. 32:22.) Whenever the Devil terrifies us by placing before our eyes the great difficulty of persevering in the grace of God in spite of all the dangers and sinful occasions of this life, let us, without answering him, raise our eyes to God, and hope that in his goodness he will certainly send us help to resist every attack. "I have lifted up my eyes to the mountains, from whence help shall come to me." (Ps. 120:1.) And when the enemy represents to us our weakness, let us say with the Apostle: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me." (Phil. 4:13.) Of myself I can do nothing; but I trust in God, that by his grace I shall be able to do all things.

9. Hence, in the midst of the greatest dangers of perdition to which we are exposed, we should continually turn to Jesus Christ, and throwing ourselves into the hands of him who redeemed us by his death, should say: "Into thy hands I commend my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, the God of truth." (Ps. 30:6.) This prayer should be said with great confidence of obtaining eternal life, and to it we should add: "In thee, O Lord, I have hoped; let me not be confounded for ever." (Ps. 30:1.)

THIRD MEANS. RESISTANCE TO TEMPTATIONS.

10. It is true that when we have recourse to God with confidence in dangerous temptations, he assists us; but, in certain very urgent occasions, the Lord sometimes wishes that we coöperate, and do violence to ourselves, to resist temptations. On such occasions, it will not be enough to have recourse to God once or twice; it will be necessary to multiply prayers, and frequently to prostrate ourselves, and send up our sighs before the image of the Blessed Virgin and the crucifix, crying out with tears: Mary, my mother, assist me; Jesus, my Saviour, save me, for thy mercy' s sake—do not abandon me, do not permit me to lose thee.

11. Let us keep in mind the words of the Gospel: "How narrow is the gate and strait is the way that leadeth to life: and few there are that find it." (Matt. 7:14.) The way to Heaven is strait and narrow: they who wish to arrive at that place of bliss by walking in the paths of pleasure shall be disappointed: and therefore few reach it, because few are willing to use violence to themselves in resisting temptations. "The kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent hear it away." (Matt. 11:12.) In explaining this passage, a certain writer says: "Vi queritur, invaditur, occupatur." It must be sought and obtained by violence: he who wishes to obtain it without inconvenience, or by leading a soft and irregular life, shall not acquire it—he shall be excluded from it.

12. To save their souls, some of the saints have retired into the cloister; some have confined themselves in a cave; others have embraced torments and death. "The violent bear it away" Some complain of their want of confidence in God; but they do not perceive that their diffidence arises from the weakness of their resolution to serve God. St. Teresa used to say: "Of irresolute souls the Devil has no fear." And the Wise Man has declared, t hat "desires kill the slothful." (Prov. 21:25.) Some would wish to be saved and to become saints, but never resolve to adopt the means of salvation, such as meditation, the frequentation of the sacraments, detachment from creatures; or, if they adopt these means, they soon give them up. In a word, they are satisfied with fruitless desires, and thus continue to live in enmity with God, or at least in tepidity, which in the end leads them to the loss of God. Thus in them are verified the words of the Holy Ghost, "desires kill the slothful."

13. If, then, we wish to save our souls, and to become saints, we must make a strong resolution not only in general to give ourselves to God, but also in particular to adopt the proper means, and never to abandon them after having once taken them up. Hence we must never cease to pray to Jesus Christ, and to His holy Mother for holy perseverance.

Sermon IV

FOURTH SUNDAY OF ADVENT

ON THE LOVE OF JESUS CHRIST FOR US, AND ON OUR OBLIGATIONS TO LOVE HIM

"And all flesh shall see the salvation of God."—LUKE 3:6.

THE Saviour of the world, whom, according to the prediction of the prophet Isaias, men were one day to see on this Earth—"and all flesh shall see the salvation of God,"—has already come. We have not only seen him conversing among men, but we have also seen him suffering and dying for the love of us. Let us, then, this morning consider the love which we owe to Jesus Christ at least through gratitude for the love which he bears to us. In the first point we shall consider the greatness of the love which Jesus Christ has shown to us; and in the second we shall see the greatness of our obligations to love him.

FIRST POINT. ON THE GREAT LOVE WHICH JESUS CHRIST HAS SHOWN TO US.

1. "Christ," says St. Augustine, "came on Earth that men might know how much God loves them." He has come, and to show the immense love which this God bears us, he has given himself entirely to us, by abandoning himself to all the pains of this life, and afterwards to the scourges, to the thorns, and to all the sorrows and insults which he suffered in his passion, and by offering himself to die, abandoned by all, on the infamous tree of the cross. "Who loved me, and delivered himself for me." (Gal. 2:20.)

2. Jesus Christ could save us without dying on the cross, and without suffering. One drop of his blood would be sufficient for our redemption. Even a prayer offered to his Eternal Father would be sufficient; because, on account of his divinity, his prayer would be of infinite value, and would therefore be sufficient for the salvation of the world, and of a thousand worlds. "But," says St. Chrysostom, or another ancient author, "what was sufficient for redemption was not sufficient for love." To show how much he loved us, he wished to shed not only a part of his blood, but the entire of it, by dint of torments. This may be inferred from the words which he used on the night before his death: "This is my blood of the new testament, which shall be shed for many." (Matt. 26:28.) The words shall be shed show that, in his passion, the blood of Jesus Christ was poured forth even to the last drop. Hence, when after death his side was opened with a spear, blood and water came forth, as if what then flowed was all that remained of his blood. Jesus Christ, then, though he could save us without suffering, wished to embrace a life of continual pain, and to suffer the cruel and ignominious death of the cross. "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:8.)

3. "Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends." (John 15:13.) To show his love for us, what more could the Son of God do than die for us? What more can one man do for another than give his life for him? "Greater love than this no man hath." Tell me, my brother, if one of your servants—if the vilest man on this Earth had done for you what Jesus Christ has done in dying through pain on a cross, could you remember his love for you, and not love him?

4. St. Francis of Assisium appeared to be unable to think of anything but the passion of Jesus Christ; and, in thinking of it, he continually shed tears, so that by his constant weeping he became nearly blind. Being found one day weeping and groaning at the foot of the crucifix, he was asked the cause of his tears and lamentations, He replied: "I weep over the sorrows and ignominies of my Lord. And what makes me weep still more is, that the men for whom he has suffered so much live in forgetfulness of him."

5. O Christian, should a doubt ever enter your mind that Jesus Christ loves you, raise your eyes and look at him hanging on the cross. Ah! says St. Thomas of Villanova, the cross to which he is nailed, the internal and external sorrows which he endures, and the cruel death which he suffers for you, are convincing proofs of the love which he bears you: "Testis crux, testes dolores, testis amara mors quam pro te sustinuit." (Conc. 3.) Do you not, says St. Bernard, hear the voice of that cross, and of those wounds, crying out to make you feel that he truly loves you? "Clamat crux, clamat vulnus, quod vere dilexit."

6. St. Paul says that the love which Jesus Christ has shown in condescending to suffer so much for our salvation, should excite us to his love more powerfully than the scourging, the crowning with thorns, the painful journey to Calvary, the agony of three hours on the cross, the buffets, the spitting in his face, and all the other injuries which the Saviour endured. According to the Apostle, the love which Jesus has shown us not only obliges, but in a certain manner forces and constrains us, to love a God who has loved us so much. "For the charity of Christ presseth us." (2 Cor. 5:14.) On this text St. Francis de Sales says: "We know that Jesus the true God has loved us so as to suffer death, and even the death of the cross, for our salvation. Does not such love put our hearts as it were under a press, to force from them love by a violence which is stronger in proportion as it is more amiable?

7. So great was the love which inflamed the enamoured heart of Jesus, that he not only wished to die for our redemption, but during his whole life he sighed ardently for the day on which he should suffer death for the love of us. Hence, during his life, Jesus used to say: "I have a baptism wherewith I am to be baptized; and how am I straitened until it be accomplished." (Luke 12:50.) In my passion I am to be baptized with the baptism of my own blood, to wash away the sins of men. "And how am I straitened!" How, says St. Ambrose, explaining this passage, am I straitened by the desire of the speedy arrival of the day of my death? Hence, on the night before his passion he said: "With desire I have desired to eat this pasch with you before I suffer." (Luke 22:15.)

8. "We have," says St. Lawrence Justinian, "seen wisdom become foolish through an excess of love." We have, he says, seen the Son of God become as it were a fool, through the excessive love which he bore to men. Such, too, was the language of the Gentiles when they heard the apostles preaching that Jesus Christ suffered death for the love of men. "But we," says St. Paul, "preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling block, unto the Gentiles foolishness." (1 Cor. 1:23.) Who, they exclaimed, can believe that a God, most happy in himself, and who stands in need of no one, should take human flesh and die for the love of men, who are his creatures? This would be to believe that a God became foolish for the love of men. "It appears folly," says St. Gregory, "that the author of Life should die for men." (Hom vi.) But, whatever infidels may say or think, it is of faith that the Son of God has shed all his blood for the love of us, to wash away the sins of our souls. "Who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." (Apoc. 1:5.) Hence, the saints were struck dumb with astonishment at the consideration of the love of Jesus Christ. At the sight of the crucifix, St. Francis of Paul could do nothing but exclaim, O love! O love! O love!

9. "Having loved his own who were in the world, he loved them unto the end." (John 13:1.) This loving Lord was not content with showing us his love by dying on the cross for our salvation; but, at the end of his life, he wished to leave us his own very flesh for the food of our souls, that thus he might unite himself entirely to us. "Take ye and eat, this is my body." (Matt. 26:26.) But of this gift and this excess of love we shall speak at another time, in treating of the most holy sacrament of the altar. Let us pass to the second point.

SECOND POINT. ON THE GREATNESS OF OUR OBLIGATIONS TO LOVE JESUS CHRIST.

10. He who loves wishes to be loved. "When," says St. Bernard, "God loves, he desires nothing else than to be loved." (Ser. lxxxiii., in Cant.) The Redeemer said: "I am come to cast fire on the Earth, and what will I but that it is kindle?" (Luke 12:49.) I, says Jesus Christ, came on earth to light up the fire of divine love in the hearts of men, "and what will I but that it be kindled?" God wishes nothing else from us than to be loved. Hence the holy Church prays in the following words: "We beseech thee, O Lord, that thy Spirit may inflame us with that fire which Jesus Christ cast upon the Earth, and which he vehemently wished to be kindled." Ah! what have not the saints, inflamed with this fire, accomplished! They have abandoned all things—delights, honours, the purple and the sceptre—that they might burn with this holy fire. But you will ask what are you to do, that you too may be inflamed with the love of Jesus Christ. Imitate David: "In my meditation a fire shall flame out." (Ps. 38). Meditation is the blessed furnace in which the holy fire of divine love is kindled. Make mental prayer every day, meditate on the passion of Jesus Christ, and doubt not but you too shall burn with this blessed flame.

11. St. Paul says, that Jesus Christ died for us to make himself the master of the hearts of all. "To this end Christ died and rose again, that he might be Lord both of the dead and of the living." (Rom. 14:9.) He wished, says the Apostle, to give his life for all men, without a single exception, that not even one should live any longer to himself, but that all might live only to that God who condescended to die for them. "And Christ died for all, that they also who live may not now live to themselves, but unto him who died for them." (2 Cor. 5:15.)

12. Ah! to correspond to the love of this God, it would be necessary that another God should die for him, as Jesus Christ died for us. O ingratitude of men! A God has condescended to give his life for their salvation, and they will not even think on what he has even done for them! Ah! if each of you thought frequently on the sufferings of the Redeemer, and on the love which he has shown to us in his passion, how could you but love him with your whole hearts? To him who sees with a lively faith the Son of God suspended by three nails on an infamous gibbet, every wound of Jesus speaks and says: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." Love, O man, thy Lord and thy God, who has loved thee so intensely. Who can resist such tender expressions? "The wounds of Jesus Christ," says St. Bonaventure, "wound the hardest hearts, and inflame frozen souls."

13. "Oh! if you knew the mystery of the cross!" said St. Andrew the Apostle to the tyrant by whom he was tempted to deny Jesus Christ. O tyrant, if you knew the love which your Saviour has shown you by dying on the cross for your salvation, instead of tempting me, you would abandon all the goods of this Earth to give yourself to the love of Jesus Christ.

14. I conclude, my most beloved brethren, by recommending you henceforth to meditate every day on the passion of Jesus Christ. I shall be content, if you daily devote to this meditation a quarter of an hour. Let each at least procure a crucifix, let him keep it in his room, and from time to time give a glance at it, saying: "Ah! my Jesus, thou hast died for me, and I do not love thee." Had a person suffered for a friend injuries, buffets, and prisons, he would be greatly pleased to find that they were remembered and spoken of with gratitude. But he should be greatly displeased if the friend for whom they had been borne, were unwilling to think or hear of his sufferings. Thus frequent meditation on his passion is very pleasing to our Redeemer; but the neglect of it greatly provokes his displeasure. Oh! how great will be the consolation which we shall receive in our last moments from the sorrows and death of Jesus Christ, if, during life, we shall have frequently meditated on them with love! Let us not wait till others, at the hour of death, place in our hands the crucifix; let us not wait till they remind us of all that Jesus Christ suffered for us. Let us, during life, embrace Jesus Christ crucified; let us keep ourselves always united to him, that we may live and die with him. He who practises devotion to the passion of our Lord, cannot but be devoted to the dolours of Mary, the remembrance of which will be to us a source of great consolation at the hour of death. Oh! how profitable and sweet the meditation of Jesus on the cross! Oh! how happy the death of him who dies in the embraces of Jesus crucified, accepting death with cheerfulness for the love of that God who has died for the love of us!

Sermon V

SUNDAY WITHIN THE OCTAVE OF THE NATIVITY

IN WHAT TRUE WISDOM CONSISTS

"Behold, this CHILD is set for the fall and for the resurrection of many in Israel."—LUKE 2:34.

SUCH was the language of holy Simeon when he had the consolation to hold in his hands the infant Jesus. Among other things which he then foretold, he declared that "this child was set for the fall and for the resurrection of many in Israel." In these words he extols the lot of the saints, who, after this life, shall rise to a life of immortality in the kingdom of bliss, and he deplores the misfortune of sinners, who, for the transitory and miserable pleasures of this world, bring upon themselves eternal ruin and perdition. But, notwithstanding the greatness of his own misery, the unhappy sinner, reflecting only on the enjoyment of present goods, calls the saints fools, because they seek to live in poverty, in humiliation, and self-denial. But a day will come when sinners shall see their errors, and shall say. "We fools esteemed their life madness, and their end without honour." (Wis. 5:4.) We fools; behold how they shall confess that they themselves have been truly fools. Let us examine in what true wisdom consists, and we shall see, in the first point, that sinners are truly foolish, and, in the second, that the saints are truly wise.

FIRST POINT. SINNERS ARE TRULY FOOLISH.

1. What greater folly can be conceived than to have the power of being the friends of God, and to wish to be his enemies? Their living in enmity with God makes the life of sinners unhappy in this world, and purchases for them an eternity of misery hereafter St. Augustine relates that two courtiers of the emperor entered a monastery of hermits, and that one of them began to read the life of St. Anthony. "He read," says the saint, "and his heart was divested of the world." He read, and, in reading, his affections were detached from the Earth. Turning to his companion, he exclaimed: "What do we seek? The friendship of the emperor is the most we can hope for. And through how many perils shall we arrive at still greater danger? Should we obtain his friendship, how long shall it last?" Friend, said he, fools that we are, what do we seek? Can we expect more in this life, by serving the emperor, than to gain his friendship? And should we, after many dangers, succeed in making him our friend, we shall expose ourselves to greater danger of eternal perdition. What difficulties must we encounter in order to become the friend of Cæsar! "But, if I wish, I can in a moment become the friend of God." I can acquire his friendship by endeavouring to recover his grace. His divine grace is that infinite treasure which makes us worthy of his friendship. "For she is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God." (Wis. 7:14.)

2. The Gentiles believe it impossible for a creature to become the friend of God; for, as St. Jerome says, friendship makes friends equal. "Amicitia pares accipit, aut pares facit." But Jesus Christ has declared, that if we observe his commands we shall be his friends. "You are my friends, if you do the things I command." (John 15:14.)

3. How great then is the folly of sinners, who, though they have it in their power to enjoy the friendship of God, wish to live in enmity with him! The Lord does not hate any of his creatures: he does not hate the tiger, the viper, or the toad. "For thou lovest all things that are, and hatest none of the things which thou hast made." (Wis. 11:25.) But he necessarily hates sinners. "Thou hatest all the workers of iniquity." (Ps. 5:7.) God cannot but hate sin, which is his enemy and diametrically opposed to his will; and therefore, in hating sin, he necessarily hates the sinner who is united with his sin. "But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike." (Wis. 14:9.)

4. The sinner is guilty of folly in leading a life opposed to the end for which he was created. God has not created us, nor does he preserve our lives, that we may labour to acquire riches or earthly honours, or that we may indulge in amusements, but that we may love and serve him in this world, in order to love and enjoy him for eternity in the next. "And the end life everlasting." (Rom. 6:22.) Thus the present life, as St. Gregory says, is the way by which we must reach Paradise, our true country. "In the present life we are, as it were, on the road by which we journey to our country." (St. Greg. hom. xi. in Evan.)

5. But the misfortune of the greater part of mankind is, that instead of following the way of salvation, they foolishly walk in the road to perdition. Some have a passion for earthly riches; and, for a vile interest, they lose the immense goods of Paradise: others have a passion for honours; and, for a momentary applause, they lose their right to be kings in Heaven: others have a passion for sensual pleasures; and, for transitory delights, they lose the grace of God, and are condemned to burn for ever in a prison of fire. Miserable souls! if, in punishment of a certain sin, their hand was to be burned with a red-hot iron, or if they were to be shut up for ten years in a dark prison, they certainly would abstain from it. And do they not know that, in chastisement of their sins, they shall be condemned to remain for ever in Hell, where their bodies, buried in fire, shall burn for all eternity? Some, says St. John Chrysostom (Hom. de recup. laps.), to save the body, choose to destroy the soul; but, do they not know that, in losing the soul, their bodies shall be condemned to eternal torments? "If we neglect the soul, we cannot save the body."

6. In a word, sinners lose their reason, and imitate brute animals, that follow the instinct of nature, and seek carnal pleasures without ever reflecting on their lawfulness or unlawfulness. But to act in this manner is, according to St. Chrysostom, to act not like a man, but like a beast. "Hominem illum dicimus," says the saint," "qui imaginem hominis salvam retinet: quæ autem est imago hominis? Rationalem esse." To be men we must be rational: that is, we must act, not according to the sensual appetite, but according to the dictates of reason. If God gave to beasts the use of reason, and if they acted according to its rules, we should say that they acted like men. And it must, on the other hand, be said, that the man whose conduct is agreeable to the senses, but contrary to reason, acts like a beast. He who follows the dictates of reason, provides for the future. "Oh! that they would be wise, and would understand, and would provide for their last end." (Deuter. 32:29.) He looks to the future—that is, to the account he must render at the hour of death, after which he shall be doomed to Hell or to Heaven, according to his merits, "Non est sapiens," says St. Bernard, "qui sibi non est." (Lib. de consid.)

7. Sinners think only of the present, but regard not the end for which they were created. But what will it profit them to gain all things if they lose their last end, which alone can make them happy. "But one thing is necessary." (Luke 10:42.) To attain our end is the only thing necessary for us: if we lose it, all is lost. What is this end? It is eternal life. "Finem vero vitam æternam." During life, sinners care but little for the attainment of their end. Each day brings them nearer to death and to eternity; but they know not their destination. Should a pilot who is asked whither he is going, answer that he did not know, would not all, says St. Augustine, cry out that he was bringing the vessel to destruction? "Fac hominem perdidisse quo tendit, et dicatur ei: quo is? et dicat, nescio: nonne iste navem ad naufragium perducet?" The saint then adds: "Talis est qui currit præter viam." Such are the wise of the world, who know how to acquire wealth and honours, and to indulge in every kind of amusement, but who know not how to save their souls. How miserable the rich glutton, who, though able to lay up riches and to live splendidly, was, after death, buried in Hell! How miserable Alexander the Great, who, after gaining so many kingdoms, was condemned to eternal torments? How great the folly of Henry the Eighth, who rebelled against the Church, but seeing at the hour of death that his soul should be lost, cried out in despair: "Friends, we have lost all!" O God, how many others now weep in Hell, and exclaim: "What hath pride profited us? or what advantage hath the boasting of riches brought us? All those things are passed away like a shadow." (Wis. 5:8.) In the world we made a great figure—we enjoyed abundant riches and honours; and now all is passed away like a shadow, and nothing remains for us but to suffer and weep for eternity. St. Augustine says, that the happiness which sinners enjoy in this life is their greatest misfortune. "Nothing is more calamitous than the felicity of sinners, by which their perverse will, like an internal enemy, is strengthened." (Ep. v. ad Marcellin.)

8. In fine, the words of Solomon are fulfilled with regard to all who neglect their salvation: "Mourning taketh hold of the end of joy." (Prov. 14:13.) All their pleasures, honours, and greatness, end in eternal sorrow and wailing. "Whilst I was yet beginning, he cut me off." (Is. 38:12.) Whilst they are laying the foundation of their hopes of realizing a fortune, death comes, and, cutting the thread of life, deprives them of all their possessions, and sends them to Hell to burn for ever in a pit of fire. What greater folly can be conceived, than to wish to be transformed from the friend of God into the slave of Lucifer, and from the heir of Paradise to become, by sin, doomed to Hell? For, the moment a Christian commits a mortal sin, his name is written among the number of the damned! St. Francis de Sales said that, if the angels were capable of weeping, they would do nothing else than shed tears at the sight of the destruction which a Christian who commits mortal sin brings upon himself.

9. Oh! how great is the folly of sinners, who, by living in sin, lead a life of misery and discontent! All the goods of this world cannot content the heart of man, which has been created to love God, and can find no peace out of God. What are all the grandeurs and all the pleasures of this world but "vanity of vanities?" (Eccl. 1:2.) What are they but "vanity and vexation of spirit?" (Ibid. 4:16.) Earthly goods are, according to Solomon, who had experience of them, vanity of vanities; that is mere vanities, lies, and deceits. They are also a "vexation of spirit:" they not only do not content, but they even afflict the soul; and the more abundantly they are possessed, the greater the anguish which they produce. Sinners hope to find peace in their sins; but what peace can they enjoy? "There is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord." (Is. 48:22.) I abstain from saying more at present on the unhappy life of sinners: I shall speak of it in another place. At present, it is enough for you to know that God gives peace to the souls who love him, and not to those who despise him. Instead of seeking to be the friends of God, sinners wish to be the slaves of Satan, who is a cruel and merciless tyrant to all who submit to his yoke. "Crudelis est et non miserebitur." (Jer. 6:23.) And if he promises delights, he does it, as St. Cyprian says, not for our welfare, but that we may be the companions of his torments in hell: "Ut habeat socios pœnæ, socios gehennæ."

SECOND POINT. THE SAINTS ARE TRULY WISE.

10. Let us be persuaded that the truly wise are those who know how to love God and to gain Heaven. Happy the man to whom God has given the science of the saints. "Dedit illi scientiam sanctorum." (Wis. 10:10.) Oh! how sublime the science which teaches us to know how to love God and to save our souls! Happy, says St. Augustine, is the man "who knows God, although he is ignorant of other things." They who know God, the love which he merits, and how to love him, stand not in need of any other knowledge. They are wiser than those who are masters of many sciences, but know not how to love God. Brother Egidius, of the order of St. Francis, once said to St. Bonaventure: Happy you, O Father Bonaventure, who are so learned, and who, by your learning, can become more holy than I can, who am a poor ignorant man. Listen, replied the saint: if an old woman knows how to love God better than I do, she is more learned and more holy than I am. At hearing this, Brother Egidius exclaimed: "O poor old woman! poor old woman! Father Bonaventure says that, if you love God more than he does, you can surpass him in sanctity."

11. This excited the envy of St. Augustine, and made him ashamed of himself. "Surgunt indocti," he exclaimed, "et rapiunt cœlum." Alas! the ignorant rise up, and bear away the kingdom of Heaven; and what are we, the learned of this world, doing? Oh! how many of the rude and illiterate are saved, because, though unable to read, they know how to love God; and how many of the wise of the world are damned! Oh! truly wise were St. John of God, St. Felix of the order of St. Capuchins, and St. Paschal, who were poor lay Franciscans, and unacquainted with human sciences, but learned in the science of the saints. But the wonder is, that, though worldlings themselves are fully persuaded of this truth, and constantly extol the merit of those who retire from the world to live only to God, still they act as if they believed it not.

12. Tell me, brethren, to which class do you wish to belong—to the wise of the world, or to the wise of God? Before you make a choice, St. Chrysostom advises you to go to the graves of the dead! "Proficiscamur ad sepulchra." Oh! how eloquently do the sepulchres of the dead teach us the science of the saints and the vanity of all earthly goods! "For my part," said the saint, "I see nothing but rottenness, bones, and worms." As if he said: Among these skeletons I cannot distinguish the noble, the rich, or the learned; I see that they have all become dust and rottenness: thus all their greatness and glory have passed away like a dream.

13. What then must we do? Behold the advice of St. Paul: "This, therefore, I say, brethren: the time is short: it remaineth that . . . they that use this world BE as if they used it not; for the fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Cor. 7:29–31.) This world is a scene which shall pass away and end very soon. "The time is short." During the days of life that remain, let us endeavour to live like men who are wise, not according to the world, but according to God, by attending to the sanctification of our souls, and by adopting the means of salvation; by flying dangerous occasions; by practising prayer; joining some pious sodality; frequenting the sacraments; reading every day a spiritual book; and by daily hearing Mass, if it be in our power; or, at least, by visiting Jesus in the holy sacrament of the altar, and some image of the most holy Mary. Thus we shall be truly wise, and shall be happy for time and eternity.

Sermon VI

MALICE OF MORTAL SIN

"Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing."—LUKE 2:48.

MOST holy Mary lost her Son for three days: during that time she wept continually for having lost sight of Jesus, and did not cease to seek after him till she found him. How then does it happen that so many sinners not only lose sight of Jesus, but even lose his divine grace; and instead of weeping for so great a loss, sleep in peace, and make no effort to recover so great a blessing? This arises from their not feeling what it is to lose God by sin. Some say: I commit this sin, not to lose God, but to enjoy this pleasure, to possess the property of another, or to take revenge of an enemy. They who speak such language show that they do not understand the malice of mortal sin. What is mortal sin?

First Point. It is a great contempt shown to God.

Second Point. It is a great offence offered to God.

FIRST POINT. MORTAL SIN IS A GREAT CONTEMPT SHOWN TO GOD.

1. The Lord calls upon Heaven and Earth to detest the ingratitude of those who commit mortal sin, after they had been created by him, nourished with his blood, and exalted to the dignity of his adopted children. "Hear, O ye Heavens, and give ear, O Earth; for the Lord hath spoken. I have brought up children and exalted them; but they have despised me." (Isa. 1:2.) Who is this God whom sinners despise? "He is a God of infinite majesty, before whom all the kings of the Earth and all the blessed in Heaven are less than a drop of water or a grain of sand. As a drop of a bucket, . . . as a little dust." (Isa. 40:15.) In a word, such is the majesty of God, that in his presence all creatures are as if they did not exist. "All nations are before him as if they had no being at all." (Ibid. 40:17.) And what is man, who insults him? St. Bernard answers: "Saccus vermium, cibus vermium." A heap of worms, the food of worms, by which, he shall be devoured in the grave. "Thou art wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." (Apoc. 3:17.) He is so miserable that he can do nothing, so blind that he knows nothing, and so poor that he possesses nothing. And this worm dares to despise a God, and to provoke his wrath. "Vile dust," says the same saint, "dares to irritate such tremendous majesty." Justly, then, has St. Thomas asserted, that the malice of mortal sin is, as it were, infinite: "Peccatum habet quandam infinitatem malitiæ ex infinitatem divinæ majestatis." (Par. 3, q. 2, a. 2, ad. 2.) And St. Augustine calls it an infinite evil. Hence Hell and a thousand Hells are not sufficient chastisement for a single mortal sin.

2. Mortal sin is commonly defined by theologians to be "a turning away from the immutable good." St. Thom., par. 1, q. 24, a. 4; a turning one's back on the sovereign good. Of this God complains by his prophet, saying: "Thou hast forsaken me, saith the Lord; thou art gone backward." (Jer. 15:6.) Ungrateful man, he says to the sinner, I would never have separated myself from thee; thou hast been the first to abandon me: thou art gone backwards; thou hast turned thy back upon me.

3. He who contemns the divine law despises God; because he knows that, by despising the law, he loses the divine grace. "By transgression of the law, thou dishonourest God." (Rom. 2:23.) God is the Lord of all things, because he has created them. "All things are in thy power . . . Thou hast made Heaven and Earth." (Esth. 13:9.) Hence all irrational creatures—the winds, the sea, the fire, and rain—obey God. "The winds and the sea obey him." (Matt. 8:27.) "Fire, hail, snow, ice, stormy winds, which fulfil his word." (Ps. 148:8.) But man, when he sins, says to God: Lord, thou dost command me, but I will not obey; thou dost command me to pardon such an injury, but I will resent it; thou dost command me to give up the property of others, but I will retain it; thou dost wish that I should abstain from such a forbidden pleasure, but I will indulge in it. "Thou hast broken my yoke, thou hast burst my bands, and thou saidst: 'I will not serve.' " (Jer. 2:20.) In fine, the sinner when he breaks the command, says to God: I do not acknowledge thee for my Lord. Like Pharaoh, when Moses, on the part of God, commanded him in the name of the Lord to allow the people to go into the desert, the sinner answers: "Who is the Lord, that I should hear his voice, and let Israel go?" (Exod. 5:2.)

4. The insult offered to God by sin is heightened by the vileness of the goods for which sinners offend him. "Wherefore hath the wicked provoked God." (Ps. 9:34.) For what do so many offend the Lord? For a little vanity; for the indulgence of anger; or for a beastly pleasure. "They violate me among my people for a handful of barley and a piece of bread." (Ezec. 13:19.) God is insulted for a handful of barley—for a morsel of bread! O God! why do we allow ourselves to be so easily deceived by the Devil? "There is," says the Prophet Osee, "a deceitful balance in his hand." (12:7.) We do not weigh things in the balance of God, which cannot deceive, but in the balance of Satan, who seeks only to deceive us, that he may bring us with himself into Hell. "Lord," said David, "who is like to thee?" (Ps. 34:10.) God is an infinite good; and when he sees sinners put him on a level with some earthly trifle, or with a miserable gratification, he justly complains in the language of the prophet: "To whom have you likened me or made me equal? saith the Holy One." (Isa. 40:25.) In your estimation, a vile pleasure is more valuable than my grace. Is it a momentary satisfaction you have preferred before me? "Thou hast east me off behind thy back." (Ezec. 23:35.) Then, adds Salvian, "there is no one for whom men have less esteem than for God." (Lib. v., Avd. Avar.) Is the Lord so contemptible in your eyes as to deserve to have the miserable things of the Earth preferred before him?

5. The tyrant placed before St. Clement a heap of gold, of silver, and of gems, and promised to give them to the holy martyr if he would renounce the faith of Christ. The saint heaved a sigh of sorrow at the sight of the blindness of men, who put earthly riches in comparison with God. But many sinners exchange the divine grace for things of far less value; they seek after certain miserable goods, and abandon that God who is an infinite good, and who alone can make them happy. Of this the Lord complains, and calls on the Heavens to be astonished, and on its gates to be struck with horror: "Be astonished, O ye Heavens, at this; and ye gates thereof, be very desolate, saith the Lord." He then adds: "For my people have done two evils: they have forsaken me, the fountain of living water, and have digged to themselves cisterns—broken cisterns—that can hold no water." (Jer 2:12 and 13.) We regard with wonder and amazement the injustice of the Jews, who, when Pilate offered to deliver Jesus or Barabbas, answered: "Not this man, but Barabbas." (John 18:40.) The conduct of sinners is still worse; for, when the Devil proposes to them to choose between the satisfaction of revenge—a miserable pleasure—and Jesus Christ, they answer: "Not this man, but Barabbas." That is, not the Lord Jesus, but sin.

6. "There shall be no new God in thee," says the Lord. (Ps. 80:10.) You shall not abandon me, your true God, and make for yourself a new god, whom you shall serve. St. Cyprian teaches that men make their god whatever they prefer before God, by making it their last end; for God is the only last end of all: "Quidquid homo Deo anteponit, Deum sibi facit." And St. Jerome says: "Unusquisque quod cupit, si veneratur, hoc illi Deus est. Vitium in corde, est idolum in altari." (In Ps. lxxx.) The creature which a person prefers to God, becomes his God. Hence, the holy doctor adds, that as the Gentiles adored idols on their altars, so sinners worship sin in their hearts. When King Jeroboam rebelled against God, he endeavoured to make the people imitate him in the adoration of idols. He one day placed the idols before them, and said: "Behold thy gods, O Israel!" (3 Kings 12:28.) The Devil acts in a similar manner towards sinners: he places before them such a gratification, and says: Make this your God. Behold! this pleasure, this money, this revenge is your God: adhere to these, and forsake the Lord. When the sinner consents to sin, he abandons his Creator, and in his heart adores as his god the pleasure which he indulges. "Vitium in corde est idolum in altari."

7. The contempt which the sinner offers to God is increased by sinning in God's presence. According to St. Cyril of Jerusalem, some adored the sun as their god, that during the night they might, in the absence of the sun, do what they pleased, without fear of divine chastisement. "Some regarded the sun as their God, that, after the setting of the sun, they might be without a god." (Catech. iv.) The conduct of these miserable dupes was very criminal; but they were careful not to sin in presence of their god. But Christians know that God is present in all places, and that he sees all things. "Do not I fill Heaven and Earth? saith the Lord," (Jer. 23:24); and still they do not abstain from insulting him, and from provoking his wrath in his very presence: "A people that continually provoke me to anger before my face." (Isa. 65:3.) Hence, by sinning before him who is their judge, they even make God a witness of their iniquities: "I am the judge and the witness, saith the Lord." (Jer. 29:23.) St. Peter Chrysologus says, that, "the man who commits a crime in the presence of his judge, can offer no defence." The thought of having offended God in his divine presence, made David weep and exclaim: "To thee only have I sinned, and have done evil before thee." (Ps. 1:6.) But let us pass to the second point, in which we shall see more clearly the enormity of the malice of mortal sin.

SECOND POINT. MORTAL SIN IS A GREAT OFFENCE OFFERED TO GOD.

8. There is nothing more galling than to see oneself despised by those who were most beloved and most highly favoured. Whom do sinners insult? They insult a God who bestowed so many benefits upon them, and who loved them so as to die on a cross for their sake; and by the commission of mortal sin they banish that God from their hearts. A soul that loves God is loved by him, and God himself comes to dwell within her. "If any one love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him, and will make our abode with him." (John 14:23.) The Lord, then, never departs from a soul, unless he is driven away, even though he should know that she will soon banish him from her heart. According to the Council of Trent, "he deserts not the soul, unless he is deserted."

9. When the soul consents to mortal sin she ungratefully says to God: Depart from me. "The wicked have said to God: Depart from us." (Job 21:14.) Sinners, as St. Gregory observes, say the same, not in words, but by their conduct. "Recede, non verbis, sed moribus." They know that God cannot remain with sin in the soul: and, in violating the divine commands, they feel that God must depart; and, by their acts they say to him: since you cannot remain any longer with us, depart—farewell. And through the very door by which God departs from the soul, the Devil enters to take possession of her. When the priest baptizes an infant, he commands the demon to depart from the soul: "Go out from him, unclean spirits, and make room for the Holy Ghost." But when a Christian consents to mortal sin, he says to God: Depart from me; make room for the Devil, whom I wish to serve.

10. St. Bernard says, that mortal sin is so opposed to God, that, if it were possible for God to die, sin would deprive him of life; "Peccatum quantum in se est Deum perimit." Hence, according to Job, in committing mortal sin, man rises up against God, and stretches forth his hand against him: "For he hath stretched out his hand against God, and hath strengthened himself against the Almighty." (Job. 15:25.)

11. According to the same St. Bernard, they who wilfully violate the divine law, seek to deprive God of life in proportion to the malice of their will; "Quantum in ipsa est Deum perimit propria voluntas." (Ser. iii. de Res.) Because, adds the saint, self-will "would wish God to see its own sins, and to be unable to take vengeance on them." Sinners know that the moment they consent to mortal sin, God condemns them to Hell. Hence, being firmly resolved to sin, they wish that there was no God, and, consequently, they would wish to take away his life, that he might not be able to avenge their crime. "He hath," continues Job, in his description of the wicked, "run against him with his neck raised up, and is armed with a fat neck." (15:26.) The sinner raises his neck; that is, his pride swells up, and he runs to insult his God; and, because he contends with a powerful antagonist, "he is armed with a fat neck." "A fat neck" is the symbol of ignorance, of that ignorance which makes the sinner say: This is not a great sin; God is merciful; we are flesh; the Lord will have pity on us. O temerity! O illusion! which brings so many Christians to Hell.

Moreover, the man who commits a mortal sin afflicts the heart of God. "But they provoked to wrath, and afflicted the spirit of the Holy One." (Isaias 63:10.) What pain and anguish would you not feel, if you knew that a person whom you tenderly loved, and on whom you bestowed great favours, had sought to take away your life! God is not capable of pain; but, were he capable of suffering, a single mortal sin would be sufficient to make him die through sorrow. "Mortal sin," says Father Medina, "if it were possible, would destroy God himself: because it would be the cause of infinite sadness to God." As often, then, as you committed mortal sin, you would, if it were possible, have caused God to die of sorrow; because you knew that by sin you insulted him and turned your back upon him, after he had bestowed so many favours upon you, and even after he had given all his blood and his life for your salvation.

[An act of sorrow, etc.]

Sermon VII

SECOND SUNDAY AFTER THE EPIPHANY

ON THE CONFIDENCE WITH WHICH WE OUGHT TO RECOMMEND OURSELVES TO THE MOTHER OF GOD[14124]

"And the wine failing, the Mother of Jesus saith to him: They have no wine."—JOHN 2:3.

IN the Gospel of this day we read that Jesus Christ, having been invited, went with his holy mother to a marriage of Cana of Galilee. "The wine failing," Mary said to her divine Son: "They have no wine." By these words she intended to ask her Son to console the spouses, who were afflicted because the wine had failed. Jesus answered: "Woman, what is it to me and to thee? my hour is not yet come." (John 2:4.) He meant that the time destined for the performance of miracles was that of his preaching through Judea. But, though his answer appeared to be a refusal of the request of Mary, the Son, says St. Chrysostom, resolved to yield to the desire of the mother. "Although he said, 'my hour is not yet come,' he granted the petition of his mother." (Hom. in ii. Joan.) Mary said to the waiters: "Whatever he shall say to you, do ye." Jesus bid them fill the water-pots with water—the water was changed into the most excellent wine. Thus the bridegroom and the entire family were filled with gladness. From the fact related in this day's gospel, let us consider, in the first point, the greatness of Mary's power to obtain from God the graces which we stand in need of; and in the second, the tenderness of Mary's compassion, and her readiness to assist us all in our wants.

FIRST POINT. THE GREATNESS OF MARY'S POWER TO OBTAIN FROM GOD FOR US ALL THE GRACES WE STAND IN NEED OF.

1. So great is Mary's merit in the eyes of God, that, according to St. Bonaventure, her prayers are infallibly heard. "The merit of Mary is so great before God, that her petition cannot be rejected." (De Virg., c. iii.) But why are the prayers of Mary so powerful in the sight of God? It is, says St. Antonine, because she is his mother. "The petition of the mother of God partakes of the nature of a command, and therefore it is impossible that she should not be heard." (Par. 4, tit. 13, c. xvii., § 4.) The prayers of the saints are the prayers of servants; but the prayers of Mary are the prayers of a mother, and therefore, according to the holy doctor, they are regarded in a certain manner as commands by her Son, who loves her so tenderly. It is then impossible that the prayers of Mary should be rejected.

2. Hence, according to Cosmas of Jerusalem, the intercession of Mary is all-powerful. "Omnipotens auxilium tuum, O Maria." It is right, as Richard of St. Lawrence teaches, that the son should impart his power to the mother. Jesus Christ, who is all-powerful, has made Mary omnipotent, as far as a creature is capable of omnipotence; that is, omnipotent in obtaining from him, her divine Son, whatever she asks. "Cum autem eadem sit potestas filii et matris ab omnipotente filio, omnipotens mater facta est." (Lib. 4, de Laud. Virg.)

3. St. Bridget heard our Saviour one day addressing the Virgin in the following words: "Ask from me whatever you wish, for your petition cannot be fruitless." (Rev.1. 1, cap. iv.) My mother, ask of me what you please; I cannot reje ct any prayer which you present to me; "because since you refused me nothing on earth, I will refuse you nothing in Heaven." (Ibid.) St. George, Archbishop of Nicomedia, says that Jesus Christ hears all the prayers of his mother, as if he wished thereby to discharge the obligation which he owes to her for having given to him his human nature, by consenting to accept him for her Son. "Filius, exolvens debitum petitiones tuas implet." (Orat. de Exitu Mar.) Hence, St. Methodius, martyr, used to say to Mary: "Euge, euge, quæ debitorum habeas filium, Deo enim universi debemus, tibi autem ille debitor est." (Orat. Hyp. Dom.) Rejoice, rejoice, O holy virgin; for thou hast for thy debtor that Son to whom we are all debtors; to thee he owes the human nature which he received from thee.

4. St. Gregory of Nicomedia encourages sinners by the assurance that, if they have recourse to the Virgin with a determination to amend their lives, she will save them by her intercession. Hence, turning to Mary, he exclaimed: "Thou hast insuperable strength, lest the multitude of our sins should overcome thy clemency." O mother of God, the sins of a Christian, however great they may be, cannot overcome thy mercy. "Nothing," adds the same saint, "resists thy power; for the Creator regards thy glory as his own." Nothing is impossible to thee, says St. Peter Damian: thou canst raise even those who are in despair to hopes of salvation. "Nihil tibi impossible, quæ etiam desperatos in spem salutis potes relevare." (Ser. i. de Nat. B.V.)

5. Richard of St. Lawrence remarks that, in announcing to the Virgin that God has chosen her for the mother of his Son, the Archangel Gabriel said to her: "Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found grace with God." (Luke 1:30.) From which words the same author concludes: "Cupientes invenire gratiam, quæramus inventricem gratiæ." If we wish to recover lost grace, let us seek Mary, by whom this grace has been found She never lost the divine grace; she always possessed it. If the angel declared that she had found grace, he meant that she had found it not for herself, but for us miserable sinners, who have lost it. Hence Cardinal Hugo exhorts us to go to Mary, and say to her: O blessed lady, property should be restored to those who lost it: the grace which thou hast found is not thime—for thou hast never lost the grace of God—but it is ours; we have lost it through our own fault: to us, then, thou oughtest to restore it. "Sinners, who by your sins have forfeited the divine grace, run to the Virgin, and say to her with confidence: Restore us to our property, which thou hast found."

6. It was revealed to St. Gertrude, that all the graces which we ask of God through the intercession of Mary, shall be given to us. She heard Jesus saying to his divine mother: "Through thee all who ask mercy with a purpose of amending their lives, shall obtain grace." If all Paradise asked a favour of God, and Mary asked the opposite grace, the Lord would hear Mary, and would reject the petition of the rest of the celestial host. Because, says Father Suarez, "God loved the Virgin alone more than all the other saints." Let us, then, conclude this first point in the words of St. Bernard: "Let us seek grace, and let us seek it through Mary; for she is a mother, and her petition cannot be rejected." (Serm. de Aquæd.) Let us seek through Mary all the graces we desire to receive from God, and we shall obtain them; for she is a mother, and her son cannot refuse to hear her prayers, or to grant the graces which she asks from him.

SECOND POINT. ON THE TENDER COMPASSION OF MARY, AND HER READINESS TO ASSIST US IN ALL OUR WANTS.

7. The tenderness of Mary's mercy may be inferred from the fact related in this day's Gospel. The wine fails—the spouses are troubled—no one speaks to Mary to ask her Son to console them in their necessity. But the tenderness of Mary's heart, which, according to St. Bernardine of Sienna, cannot but pity the afflicted, moved her to take the office of advocate, and, without being asked, to entreat her Son to work a miracle. "Unasked, she assumed the office of an advocate and a compassionate helper." (Tom. 3, ser. ix.) Hence, adds the same saint, if, unasked, this good lady has done so much, what will she not do for those who invoke her intercession? "Si hoc non rogata perfecit, quid rogata perficiet?"

8. From the fact already related, St. Bonaventure draws another argument to show the great graces which we may hope to obtain through Mary, now that she reigns in Heaven. If she was so compassionate on earth, how much greater must be her mercy now that she is in Paradise? "Great was the mercy of Mary while in exile on earth; but it is much greater now that she is a queen in Heaven; because she now sees the misery of men." (St. Bona. in Spec. Virg., cap. viii.) Mary in Heaven enjoys the vision of God; and therefore she sees our wants far more clearly than when she was on earth; hence, as her pity for us is increased, so also is her desire to assist us more ardent. How truly has Richard of St. Victor said to the Virgin: "So tender is thy heart that thou canst not see misery and not afford succour." It is impossible for this loving mother to behold a human being in distress without extending to him pity and relief.

9. St. Peter Damian says that the Virgin "loves us with an invincible love." (Ser. i. de Nat. Virg.) How ardently soever the saints may have loved this amiable queen, their affection fell far short of the love which Mary bore to them. It is this love that makes her so solicitous for our welfare. The saints in Heaven, says St. Augustine, have great power to obtain grace from God for those who recommend themselves to their prayers; but as Mary is of all the saints the most powerful, so she is of all the most desirous to procure for us the divine mercy: "Sicut omnibus Sanctis potentior, sic omnibus est pro nobis sollicitior."

10. And, as this our great advocate once said to St. Bridget, she regards not the iniquities of the sinner who has recourse to her, but the disposition with which he invokes her aid. If he comes to her with a firm purpose of amendment she receives him, and by her intercession heals his wounds, and brings him to salvation. "However great a man's, sins may be, if he shall return to me, I am ready instantly to receive him. Nor do I regard the number or the enormity of his sins, but the will with which he comes to me; for I do not disdain to anoint and heal his wounds, because I am called, and truly am, the mother of mercy."

11. The blessed Virgin is called a "fair olive tree in the plains:" "Quasi oliva speciosa in campis." (Eccl. 24:19.) From the olive, oil only comes forth; and from the hands of Mary only graces and mercies flow. According to Cardinal Hugo, it is said that she remains in the plains, to show that she is ready to assist all those who have recourse to her: "Speciosa in campis ut omnes ad eam confugiant." In the Old Law there were five cities of refuge, in which not all, but only those who had committed certain crimes, could find an asylum; but in Mary, says St. John Damascene, all criminals, whatever may be their offences, may take refuge. Hence he calls her "the city of refuge for all who have recourse to her." Why, then, says St. Bernard, should we be afraid to approach Mary? She is all sweetness and clemency; in her there is nothing austere or terrible: "Quid ad Mariam accedere trepidat humana fragilitas? Nihil austerum in ea, nihil terribile, tota sauvis est."

12. St. Bonaventure used to say that, in turning to Mary, he saw mercy itself receiving him. "When I behold thee, O my lady, I see nothing but mercy." The Virgin said one day to St. Bridget: "Miser erit, qui ad misericordiam cum possit, non accedit." Miserable and miserable for eternity shall be the sinner who, though he has it in his power during life to come to me, who am able and willing to assist him, neglects to invoke my aid, and is lost. "The devil," says St. Peter, "as a roaring lion goeth about seeing whom he may devour." (1 Pet. 5:8.) But, according to Bernardine a Bustis, this mother of mercy is constantly going about in search of sinners to save them. "She continually goes about seeking whom she may save." (Maril. par. 3, ser. iii.) This queen of clemency, says Richard of St. Victor, presents our petitions, and begins to assist us before we ask the assistance of her prayers; "Velocius occurrit ejus pietas quam invocetur, et causas miserorum anticipat." (In Can., c. xxiii.) Because, as the same author says, Mary's heart is so full of tenderness towards us, that she cannot behold our miseries without affording relief. "Nec possis miserias scire, et non subvenire."

13. Let us, then, in all our wants, be most careful to have recourse to this mother of mercy, who is always ready to assist those who invoke her aid. "Invenies semper paratam auxiliari," says Richard of St. Lawrence. She is always prepared to come to our help, and frequently prevents our supplications: but, ordinarily, she requires that we should pray to her, and is offended when we neglect to ask her assistance. "In te domina peccant," says St. Bonaventure, "non solum qui tibi injuriam irrogant, sed etiam qui te non rogant." (In Spec. Virg.) Thou, O blessed lady, art displeased not only with those who commit an injury against thee, but also with those who do not ask favours from thee. Hence, as the same holy doctor teaches, it is not possible that Mary should neglect to succour any soul that flies to her for protection; for she cannot but pity and console the afflicted who have recourse to her. "Ipsa enim non misereri ignorat et miseris non satisfacere."

14. But, to obtain special favours from this good lady, we must perform in her honour certain devotions practised by her servants; such as, first, to recite every day at least five decades of the Rosary; secondly, to fast every Saturday in her honour. Many persons fast every Saturday on bread and water: you should fast in this manner at least on the vigils of her seven principal festivals. Thirdly, to say the three Aves when the bell rings for the Angelus Domini; and to salute her frequently during the day with an Ave Maria, particularly when you hear a clock strike, or when you see an image of the Virgin, and also when you leave or return to your house. Fourthly, to say every evening the Litany of the Blessed Virgin before you go to rest; and for this purpose procure an image of Mary, and keep it near your bed. Fifthly, to wear the scapular of Mary in sorrow, and of Mount Carmel. There are many other devotions practised by the servants of Mary; but the most useful of all is, to recommend yourself frequently to her prayers. Never omit to say three Aves in the morning, to beg of her to preserve you from sin during the day. In all temptations have immediate recourse to her, saying: "Mary, assist me." To resist every temptation, it is sufficient to pronounce the names of Jesus and Mary; and if the temptation continues, let us continue to invoke Jesus and Mary, and the devil shall never be able to conquer us.

15. St. Bonaventure calls Mary the salvation of those who invoke her: "O salus te invocantium." And if a true servant of Mary were lost (I mean one truly devoted to her, who wishes to amend his life, and invoke with confidence this advocate of sinners), this should happen either because Mary would be unable or unwilling to assist him. But, says St. Bernard, this is impossible: being the mother of omnipotence and of mercy, Mary cannot want the power or the will to save her servants. Justly then is she called the salvation of all who invoke her aid. Of this truth there are numberless examples: that of St. Mary of Egypt will be sufficient. After leading for many years a sinful and dissolute life, she wished to enter the church of Jerusalem in which the festival of the holy cross was celebrated. To make her feel her miseries, God closed against her the door which was open to all others: as often as she endeavoured to enter, an invisible force drove her back. She instantly perceived her miserable condition, and remained in sorrow outside the church. Fortunately for her there was an image of most holy Mary over the porch of the church. As a poor sinner she recommended herself to the divine mother, and promised to change her life. After her prayer, she felt encouraged to go into the church, and, behold! the door which was before closed against her she now finds open: she enters, and confesses her sins. She leaves the church, and, under the influence of divine inspiration, goes into the desert, where she lived for forty-seven years, and became a saint.

Sermon VIII

THIRD SUNDAY AFTER THE EPIPHANY

ON THE REMORSE OF THE DAMNED

"But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into the exterior darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."—MATT. 8:12.

IN the Gospel of this day it is related that, "when Jesus Christ entered into Capharnaum, there came to him a centurion beseeching him" to cure his servant, who lay sick of the palsy. Jesus answered: "I will come and heal him." "No," replied the centurion, "I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof; but only say the word, and my servant shall be healed." (v. 8.) Seeing the centurion's faith, the Redeemer instantly consoled him by restoring health to his servant; and, turning to his disciples, he said: "Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of Heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into the exterior darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." By these words our Lord wished to signify, that many persons born in infidelity shall be saved, and enjoy the society of the saints, and that many who are born in the bosom of the Church shall be cast into Hell, where the worm of conscience, by its gnawing, shall make them weep bitterly for all eternity.

Let us examine the remorses of conscience which a damned Christian shall suffer in Hell. First remorse, arising from the thought of the little which he required to do in order to save his soul. Second remorse, arising from the remembrance of the trifles for which he lost his soul. Third remorse, arising from the knowledge of the great good which he has lost through his own fault.

FIRST REMORSE OF THE DAMNED CHRISTIAN, ARISING FROM THE THOUGHT OF THE LITTLE WHICH HE REQUIRED TO DO IN ORDER TO SAVE HIS SOUL.

1. A damned soul once appeared to St. Hubert, and said, that two remorses were her most cruel executioners in Hell: the thought of the little which was necessary for her to have done in this life to secure her salvation; and the thought of the trifles for which she brought herself to eternal misery. The same thing has been said by St. Thomas. Speaking of the reprobate, he says: "They shall be in sorrow principally because they are damned for nothing, and because they could most easily have obtained eternal life." Let us stop to consider this first source of remorse; that is, how few and transitory are the pleasures for which all the damned are lost. Each of the reprobate will say for eternity: If I abstained from such a gratification; if in certain circumstances I overcame human respect; if I avoided such an occasion of sin—such a companion, I should not now be damned; if I had frequented some pious sodality; if I had gone to confession every week; if in temptations I had recommended myself to God, I would not have relapsed into sin. I have so often proposed to do these things, but I have not done them. I began to practise these means of salvation, but afterwards gave them up; and thus I am lost.

2. This torment of the damned will be increased by the remembrance of the good example given them by some young companions who led a chaste and pious life even in the midst of the world. It will be still more increased by the recollection of all the gifts which the Lord had bestowed upon them, that by their co-operation they might acquire eternal salvation; the gifts of nature—health, riches, respectability of family, talents; all gifts granted by God, not to be employed in the indulgence of pleasures and in the gratification of vanity, but in the sanctification of their souls, and in becoming saints. So many gifts of grace, so many divine lights, holy inspirations, loving calls, and so many years of life to repair past disorders. But they shall for ever hear from the angel of the Lord that for them the time of salvation is past. "The angel whom I saw standing, swore by Him that liveth for ever and ever . . . that time shall be no longer." (Apoc. 10:6.)

3. Alas! what cruel swords shall all these blessings received from God be to the heart of a poor damned Christian, when he shall see himself shut up in the prison of Hell, and that there is no more time to repair his eternal ruin! In despair he will say to his wretched companions: "The harvest is past; the summer is ended; and we are not saved." (Jer. 8:20.) The time, he will say, of gathering fruits of eternal life is past; the summer, during which we could have saved our souls, is over, but we are not saved: the winter is come; but it is an eternal winter, in which we must live in misery and despair as long as God shall be God.

4. O fool, he will say, that I have been! If I had suffered for God the pains to which I have submitted for the indulgence of my passions—if the labours which I have endured for my own damnation, had been borne for my salvation, how happy should I now be! And what now remains of all past pleasures, but remorse and pain, which now torture, and shall torture me for eternity? Finally, he will say, I might be for ever happy, and now I must be for ever miserable. Ah! this thought will torture the damned more than the fire and all the other torments of Hell.

SECOND REMORSE OF THE DAMNED, ARISING FROM THE REMEMBRANCE OF THE TRIFLES FOR WHICH THEY LOST THEIR SOULS.

5. Saul forbid the people, under pain of death, to taste food. His son Jonathan, who was then young, being hungry, tasted a little honey. Having discovered that Jonathan had violated the command, the king declared that he should die. Seeing himself condemned to death, Jonathan said with tears: "I did but taste a little honey, . . . and behold I must die." (1 Kings 14:43.) But the people, moved to pity for Jonathan, interposed with his father, and delivered him from death. For the unhappy damned there is no compassion; there is no one to intercede with God to deliver them from the eternal death of Hell. On the contrary, all rejoice at the just punishment which they suffer for having wilfully lost God and Paradise for the sake of a transitory pleasure.

6. After having eaten the pottage of lentiles for which he sold his right of primogeniture, Esau was tortured with grief and remorse for what he had lost, and "roared out with a great cry." (Gen. 27:34.) Oh! how great shall be the roaring and howling of the damned, at the thought of having lost, for a few poisonous and momentary pleasures, the everlasting kingdom of Paradise, and of being condemned for eternity to a continual death!

7. The unfortunate reprobate shall be continually employed in reflecting on the unhappy cause of their damnation. To us who live on earth our past life appears but a moment—but a dream. Alas! what will the fifty or sixty years which they may have spent in this world appear to the damned, when they shall find themselves in the abyss of eternity, and when they shall have passed a hundred and a thousand millions of years in torments, and shall see that their miserable eternity is only beginning, and shall be for ever in its commencement? But have the fifty years spent on this earth been full of pleasures? Perhaps the sinner, living in enmity with God, enjoyed uninterrupted happiness in his sins? How long do the pleasures of sin last? Only for a few minutes; the remaining part of the lives of those who live at a distance from God is full of anguish and pain. Oh! what will these moments of pleasure appear to a damned soul, when she shall find herself in a pit of fire?

8. "What hath pride profited us? or what advantage hath the boasting of riches brought us? All those things have passed away like a shadow." (Wis. 5:8.) Unhappy me! each of the damned shall say, I have lived on earth according to my corrupt inclinations; I have indulged my pleasures; but what have they profited me? They have lasted but for a short time; they have made me lead a life of bitterness and disquietude; and now I must burn in this furnace for ever, in despair, and abandoned by all.

THIRD REMORSE OF THE DAMNED, ARISING FROM THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE GREAT GOOD WHICH THEY HAVE LOST BY THEIR OWN FAULT.

9. A certain queen, blinded by the ambition of being a sovereign, said one day: "If the Lord gives me a reign of forty years, I shall renounce Paradise." The unhappy queen reigned for forty years; but now that she is in another world, she cannot but be grieved at having made such a renunciation. Oh! how great must be her anguish at the thought of having lost the kingdom of Paradise for the sake of a reign of forty years, full of troubles, of crosses, and of fears! "Plus cœlo torquetor, quam gehenna," says St. Peter Chrysologus. To the damned the voluntary loss of Paradise is a greater loss than the very pains of Hell.

10. The greatest pain in Hell is the loss of God, that sovereign good, who is the source of all the joys of Paradise. "Let torments," says St. Bruno, "be added to torments, and let them not be deprived of God." (Serm. de Jud. fin.) The damned would be content to have a thousand Hells added to the Hell which they suffer, provided they were not deprived of God; but their Hell shall consist in seeing themselves deprived for ever of God through their own fault. St. Teresa used to say, that when a person loses, through his own fault, a trifle—a small sum of money, or a ring of little value—the thought of having lost it through his own neglect afflicts him and disturbs his peace. What then must be the anguish of the damned in reflecting that they have lost God, a good of infinite value, and have lost him through their own fault?

11. The damned shall see that God wished them to be saved, and had given them the choice of eternal life or of eternal death. "Before man is life and death, . . . that which he shall choose shall be given to him." (Eccles. 15:18.) They shall see that, if they wished, they might have acquired eternal happiness, and that, by their own choice, they are damned. On the day of judgment they shall see many of their companions among the elect; but, because they would not put a stop to their career of sin, they have gone to end it in Hell. "Therefore we have erred," they shall say to their unhappy associates in Hell; we have erred in losing Heaven and God through our own fault, and our error is irreparable. They shall continually exclaim: "There is no peace for my bones because of my sins." (Ps. 37:4.) The thought of having been the cause of their own damnation produces an internal pain, which enters into the very bones of the damned, and prevents them from ever enjoying a moment's repose. Hence, each of them shall be to himself an object of the greatest horror. Each shall suffer the pain threatened by the Lord: "I will set THEE before thy face." (Ps. 49:21.)

12. If, beloved brethren, you have hitherto been so foolish as to lose God for a miserable pleasure, do not persevere in your folly. Endeavour, now that you have it in your power, to repair your past error. Tremble! Perhaps, if you do not now resolve to change your life, you shall be abandoned by God, and be lost for ever. When the Devil tempts you, remember Hell—the thought of Hell will preserve you from that land of misery. I say, remember Hell and have recourse to Jesus Christ and to most holy Mary, and they will deliver you from sin, which is the gate of Hell.

Sermon IX

FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER THE EPIPHANY

DANGERS TO ETERNAL SALVATION

"And when he entered into the boat, his disciples followed him; and, behold, a great tempest arose in the sea."—MATT. 8:23, 24.

ON THE GREATNESS OF THE DANGERS TO WHICH OUR ETERNAL SALVATION IS EXPOSED, AND ON THE MANNER IN WHICH WE OUGHT TO GUARD AGAINST THEM.

1. IN this day's Gospel we find that, when Jesus Christ entered the boat along with his disciples, a great tempest arose, so that the boat was agitated by the waves, and was on the point of being lost. During this storm the Saviour was asleep; but the disciples, terrified by the storm, ran to awake him, and said: "Lord, save us: we perish." (v. 25.) Jesus gave them courage by saying: "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then rising up, he commanded the winds and the sea, and there came a great calm." Let us examine what is meant by the boat in the midst of the sea, and by the tempest which agitated the sea.

2. The boat on the sea represents man in this world. As a vessel on the sea is exposed to a thousand dangers—to pirates, to quicksands, to hidden rocks, and to tempests; so man in this life is encompassed with perils arising from the temptations of Hell—from the occasions of sin, from the scandals or bad counsels of men, from human respect, and, above all, from the bad passions of corrupt nature, represented by the winds that agitate the sea and expose the vessel to great danger of being lost.

3. Thus, as St. Leo says, our life is full of dangers, of snares, and of enemies: "Plena omnia periculis, plena laqueis: incitant cupiditates, insidiantur illecebræ; blandiuntur lucra." (S. Leo, serm. v, de Quad.) The first enemy of the salvation of every Christian is his own corruption. "But every man is tempted by his own concupiscence, being drawn away and allured." (St. James 1:14.) Along with the corrupt inclinations which live within us, and drag us to evil, we have many enemies from without that fight against us. We have the devils, with whom the contest is very difficult, because they are stronger than we are." "Bellum grave," says Cassiodorus, "qui cum fortiore." (In Psal. v.) Hence, because we have to contend with powerful enemies, St. Paul exhorts us to arm ourselves with the divine aid: "Put you on the armour of God, that you may be able to stand against the deceits of the Devil. For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spirits of wickedness in high places." (Eph. 6:11, 12.) The Devil, according to St. Peter, is a lion who is continually going about roaring, through the rage and hunger which impel him to devour our souls. "Your adversary, the Devil, like a roaring lion, goeth about seeking whom he may devour." (1 Peter, 5:8.) St. Cyprian says that Satan is continually lying in wait for us, in order to make us his slaves: "Circuit demon nos singulos, et tanquam hostis clausos obsidens muros explorat et tenat num sit pars aliqua minis stabilis, cujus auditu ad interiora penetretur." (S. Cyp. lib. de zelo, etc.)

4. Even the men with whom we must converse endanger our salvation. They persecute or betray us, or deceive us by their flattery and bad counsels. St. Augustine says that, among the faithful there are in every profession hollow and deceitful men. "Omnis professio in ecclesia habet fictos." (In Ps. xciv.) Now if a fortress were full of rebels within, and encompassed by enemies from without, who is there that would not regard it as lost? Such is the condition of each of us as long as we live in this world. Who shall be able to deliver us from so many powerful enemies? Only God: "Unless the Lord keep the city, he watcheth in vain that keepeth it." (Ps. 126:2.)

5. What then is the means by which we can save our souls in the midst of so many dangers? It is to imitate the holy disciples—to have recourse to our Divine Master, and say to him: "Save us; we perish." Save us, O Lord; if thou do not we are lost. When the tempest is violent, the pilot never takes his eyes from the light which guides him to the port. In like manner we should keep our eyes always turned to God, why alone can deliver us from the many dangers to which we are exposed. It was thus David acted when he found himself assailed by the dangers of sin. "I have lifted up my eyes to the mountains, from whence help shall come to me." (Ps. 120:1.) To teach us to recommend ourselves continually to him who alone can save us by his grace, the Lord has ordained that, as long as we remain on this earth, we should live in the midst of a continual tempest, and should be surrounded by enemies. The temptations of the Devil, the persecutions of men, the adversity which we suffer in this world, are not evils: they are, on the contrary, advantages, if we know how to make of them the use which God wishes, who sends or permits them for our welfare. They detach our affections from this earth, and inspire a disgust for this world, by making us feel bitterness and thorns even in its honours, its riches, its delights, and amusements. The Lord permits all these apparent evils, that we may take away our affections from fading goods, in which we meet with so many dangers of perdition, and that we may seek to unite ourselves with him who alone can make us happy.

6. Our error and mistake is, that when we find ourselves harassed by infirmities, by poverty, by persecutions, and by such tribulations, instead of having recourse to the Lord, we turn to men, and place our confidence in their assistance, and thus draw upon ourselves the malediction of God, who says, "Cursed be the man who trusteth in man." (Jer. 17:5.) The Lord does not forbid us, in our afflictions and dangers, to have recourse to human means; but he curses those who place their whole trust in them. He wishes us to have recourse to himself before all others, and to place our only hope in him, that we may also centre in him all our love.

7. As long as we live on this earth, we must, according to St. Paul, work out our salvation with fear and trembling, in the midst of the dangers by which we are beset. "Cum metu et tremore vestram salutem operamini." (Phil. 2:12.) Whilst a certain vessel was in the open sea a great tempest arose, which made the captain tremble. In the hold of the vessel there was an animal eating with as much tranquillity as if the sea were perfectly calm. The captain being asked why he was so much afraid, replied: If I had a soul like the soul of this brute, I too would be tranquil and without fear; but because I have a rational and an immortal soul, I am afraid of death, after which I must appear before the judgment-seat of God; and therefore I tremble through fear. Let us also tremble, beloved brethren. The salvation of our immortal souls is at stake. They who do not tremble are, as St. Paul says, in great danger of being lost; because they who fear not, seldom recommend themselves to God, and labour but little to adopt the means of salvation. Let us beware: we are, says St. Cyprian, still in battle array, and still combat for eternal salvation. "Adhuc in acie constituti de vita nostra dimicamus." (S. Cypr., lib. 1, cap. i.)

8. The first means of salvation, then, is to recommend ourselves continually to God, that he may keep his hands over us, and preserve us from offending him. The next is, to cleanse the soul from all past sins by making a general confession. A general confession is a powerful help to a change of life. When the tempest is violent the burden of the vessel is diminished, and each person on board throws his goods into the sea in order to save his life. O folly of sinners, who, in the midst of such great dangers of eternal perdition, instead of diminishing the burden of the vessel—that is, instead of unburdening the soul of her sins—load her with a greater weight. Instead of flying from the dangers of sin, they fearlessly continue to put themselves voluntarily into dangerous occasions; and, instead of having recourse to God's mercy for the pardon of their offences, they offend him still more, and compel him to abandon them.

9. Another means is, to labour strenuously not to allow ourselves to become the slaves of irregular passions. "Give me not over to a shameless and foolish mind." (Eccl. 23:6.) Do not, O Lord, deliver me up to a mind blinded by passion. He who is blind sees not what he is doing, and therefore he is in danger of falling into every crime. Thus so many are lost by submitting to the tyranny of their passions. Some are slaves to the passion of avarice. A person who is now in the other world said: Alas! I perceive that a desire of riches is beginning to rule over me. So said the unhappy man; but he applied no remedy. He did not resist the passion in the beginning, but fomented it till death, and thus at his last moments left but little reason to hope for his salvation. Others are slaves to sensual pleasures. They are not content with lawful gratifications, and therefore they pass to the indulgence of those that are forbidden. Others are subject to anger; and because they are not careful to check the fire at its commencement, when it is small, it increases and grows into a spirit of revenge.

10. "Hi hostes cavendi," says St. Ambrose, "hi graviores tyranni. Multi in persecutione publica coronati, in hac persecutione cecidcrunt." (In Ps. cxviii. serm. 20.) Disorderly affections, if they are not beaten down in the beginning, become our greatest tyrants. Many, says St. Ambrose, after having victoriously resisted the persecutions of the enemies of the faith, were afterwards lost because they did not resist the first assaults of some earthly passion. Of this, Origen was a miserable example. He fought for, and was prepared to give his life in defence of the faith; but, by afterwards yielding to human respect, he was led to deny it. (Natalis Alexander, His. Eccl., tom. 7, dis. xv., q. 2, a. 1.) We have still a more miserable example in Solomon, who, after having received so many gifts from God, and after being inspired by the Holy Ghost, was, by indulging a passion for certain pagan, women, induced to offer incense to idols. The unhappy man who submits to the slavery of his wicked passions, resembles the ox that is sent to the slaughter after a life of constant labour. During their whole lives worldlings groan under the weight of their sins, and, at the end of their days, fall into Hell.

11. Let us conclude. When the winds are strong and violent, the pilot lowers the sails and casts anchor. So, when we find ourselves assailed by any bad passion, we should always lower the sails; that is, we should avoid all the occasions which may increase the passion, and should cast anchor by uniting ourselves to God, and by begging of him to give us strength not to offend him.

12. But some of you will say, What am I to do? I live in the midst of the world, where my passions continually assail me even against my will. I will answer in the words of Origen: "Donec quis in tenebris sæcularibus manet et in negotiorum obscuritate versatur, non potest servire Domino. Exeundum est ergo de Egypto, relinquendus est mundus, non loco sed animo." (Hom. iii. in Exod.) The man who lives in the darkness of the world and in the midst of secular business, can with difficulty serve God. Whoever then wishes to insure his eternal salvation, let him retire from the world, and take refuge in one of those exact religious communities which are the secure harbours in the sea of this world. If he cannot actually leave the world, let him leave it at least in affection, by detaching his heart from the things of this world, and from his own evil inclinations: "Go not after thy lusts," says the Holy Ghost, "but turn away from thy own will." (Eccl. 18:30.) Follow not your own concupiscence; and when your will impels you to evil, you must not indulge, but must resist its inclinations.

13. "The time is short: it remaineth that they also who have wives be as if they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as if they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as if they possessed not; and they that use this world, as if they used it not; for the fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Cor. 7:29, etc.) The time of life is short; we should then prepare for death, which is rapidly approaching; and to prepare for that awful moment, let us reflect that everything in this world shall soon end. Hence, the Apostle tells those who suffer in this life to be as if they suffered not, because the miseries of this life shall soon pass away, and they who save their souls shall be happy for eternity; and he exhorts those who enjoy the goods of this earth to be as if they enjoyed them not, because they must one day leave all things; and if they lose their souls, they shall be miserable for ever.

Sermon X

FIFTH SUNDAY AFTER THE EPIPHANY

ON THE PAINS OF HELL

"Gather up first the cockle, and bind into bundles to burn."—MATT. 13:30.

I shall first speak of the fire, which is the principal pain that torments the senses of the damned, and afterwards of the other pains of hell.

1. BEHOLD! the final doom of sinners who abuse the divine mercy is, to burn in the fire of hell. God threatens hell, not to send us there, but to deliver us from that place of torments. "Minatur Deus gehennem," says St. Chrysostom, "ut a gehenna liberet, et ut firmiac stabiles evitemus minas." (Hom. v. de Pœnit.) Remember, then, brethren, that God gives you to-day the opportunity of hearing this sermon, that you may be preserved from hell, and that you may give up sin, which alone can lead you to hell.

2. My brethren, it is certain and of faith that there is a hell. After judgment the just shall enjoy the eternal glory of Paradise, and sinners shall be condemned to suffer the everlasting chastisement reserved for them in hell. "And these shall go into everlasting punishment, but the just into life everlasting." (Matt. 25:46.) Let us examine in what hell consists. It is what the rich glutton called it—a place of torments. "In hunc locum tormentorum." (Luc. 16:28.) It is a place of suffering, where each of the senses and powers of the damned has its proper torment, and in which the torments of each person will be increased in proportion to the forbidden pleasures in which he indulged. "As much as she hath glorified herself and lived in delicacies, so much torment and sorrow give ye to her." (Apoc. 18:7.)

3. In offending God the sinner does two evils: he abandons God, the sovereign good, who is able to make him happy, and turns to creatures, who are incapable of giving any real happiness to the soul. Of this injury which men commit against him, the Lord complains by his prophet Jeremy: "For my people have done two evils. They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and have digged to themselves cisterns—broken cisterns—that can hold no water." (Jer. 2:13.) Since, then, the sinner turns his back on God, he shall be tormented in hell, by the pain arising from the loss of God, of which I shall speak on another occasion [see the Sermon for the nineteenth Sunday after Pentecost], and since, in offending God, he turns to creatures, he shall be justly tormented by the same creatures, and principally by fire.

4. "The vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worms." (Eccl. 7:19.) Fire and the remorse of conscience are the principal means by which God takes vengeance on the flesh of the wicked. Hence, in condemning the reprobate to hell, Jesus Christ commands them to go into eternal fire. Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire." (Matt. 25:41.) This fire, then, shall be one of the most cruel executioners of the damned.

5. Even in this life the pain of fire is the most terrible of all torments. But St. Augustine says, that in comparison of the fire of hell, the fire of this earth is no more than a picture compared with the reality. "In cujus comparatione noster hic ignus depictus est." St. Anselm teaches, that the fire of hell as far surpasses the fire of this world, as the fire of the real exceeds that of painted fire. The pain, then, produced by the fire of hell is far greater than that which is produced by our fire, because God has made the fire of this earth for the use of man, but he has created the fire of hell purposely for the chastisement of sinners; and therefore, as Tertullian says, he has made it a minister of his justice. "Longe alius est ignis, qui usui humano, alius qui Dei justitiæ, deservit." This avenging fire is always kept alive by the wrath of God. "A fire is kindled in my rage." (Jer. 15:14.)

6. "And the rich man also died, and he was buried in hell." (Luke 16:22.) The damned are buried in the fire of hell; hence they have an abyss of fire below, an abyss of fire above, and an abyss of fire on every side. As a fish in the sea is surrounded by water, so the unhappy reprobate are encompassed by fire on every side. The sharpness of the pain of fire may be inferred from the circumstance, that the rich glutton complained of no other torment. "I am tormented in this flame." (Ibid. v. 24.)

7. The Prophet Isaias says that the Lord will punish the guilt of sinners with the spirit of fire. "If the Lord shall wash away the filth of the daughters of Sion by the spirit of burning" (4:4). "The spirit of burning" is the pure essence of fire. All spirits or essences, though taken from simple herbs or flowers, are so penetrating, that they reach the very bones. Such is the fire of hell. Its activity is so great, that a single spark of it would be sufficient to melt a mountain of bronze. The disciple relates, that a damned person, who appeared to a religious, dipped his hand into a vessel of water; the religious placed in the vessel a candlestick of bronze, which was instantly dissolved.

8. This fire shall torment the damned not only externally, but also internally. It will burn the bowels, the heart, the brains, the blood within the veins, and the marrow within the bones. The skin of the damned shall be like a caldron, in which their bowels, their flesh, and their bones shall be burned. David says, that the bodies of the damned shall be like so many furnaces of fire. "Thou shalt make them as an oven of fire in the time of thy anger." (Ps. 20:10.)

9. O God! certain sinners cannot bear to walk under a strong sun, or to remain before a large fire in a close room; they cannot endure a spark from a candle; and they fear not the fire of hell, which, according to the Prophet Isaias, not only burns, but devours the unhappy damned. "Which of you can dwell with devouring fire?" (Isaias 33:14.) As a lion devours a lamb, so the fire of hell devours the reprobate; but it devours without destroying life, and thus tortures them with a continual death. Continue, says St. Peter Damian to the sinner who indulges in impurity, continue to satisfy your flesh; a day will come, or rather an eternal night, when your impurities, like pitch, shall nourish a fire within your very bowels. "Venit dies, imo nox, quando libido tua vertetur in picem qua se nutriet perpetuus ignis in visceribus tuis." (Epist. 6.) And according to St. Cyprian, the impurities of the wicked shall boil in the very fat which will issue from their accursed bodies.

10. St. Jerome teaches, that in this fire sinners shall suffer not only the pain of the fire, but also all the pains which men endure on this earth. "In uno igne omnia supplicia sentient in inferno peccatores." (Ep. ad Pam.) How manifold are the pains to which men are subject in this life. Pains in the sides, pains in the head, pains in the loins, pains in the bowels. All these together torture the damned.

11. The fire itself will bring with it the pain of darkness; for, by its smoke it will, according to St. John, produce a storm of darkness which shall blind the damned." "To whom the storm of darkness is reserved for ever." (St. Jude 13.) Hence, hell is called a land of darkness covered with the shadow of death. "A land that is dark and covered with the mist of death a land of misery and darkness, where the shadow of death, and no order but everlasting horror dwelleth." (Job 10:21, 22.) To hear that a criminal is shut up in a dungeon for ten or twenty years excites our compassion. Hell is a dungeon closed on every side, into which a ray of the sun or the light of a candle never enters. Thus the damned "shall never see light." (Ps. 48:20.) The fire of this world gives light, but the fire of hell is utter darkness. In explaining the words of David, "the voice of the Lord divideth the flame of fire," (Ps. 28:7,) St. Basil says, that in hell the Lord separates the fire that burns from the flame which illuminates, and therefore this fire burns, but gives no light.

B. Albertus Magnus explains this passage more concisely by saying that God "divides the heat from the light." St. Thomas teaches, that in hell there is only so much light as is necessary to torment the damned by the sight of their associates and of the devils: "Quantum sufficit ad videndum illa quæ torquere possunt." (3 p., q. 97, art. 5.) And according to St. Augustine, the bare sight of these infernal monsters excites sufficient terror to cause the death of all the damned, if they were capable of dying. "Videbunt monstra, quorum visio postet illos occidere."

12. To suffer a parching thirst, without having a drop of water to quench it, is intolerably painful. It has sometimes happened, that travellers who could procure no refreshment after a long journey, have fainted from the pain produced by thirst. So great is the thirst of the damned, that if one of them were offered all the water on this earth, he would exclaim: All this water is not sufficient to extinguish the burning thirst which I endure. But, alas! the unhappy darned shall never have a single drop of water to refresh their tongues. "He cried out and said: Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, to cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame." (St. Luke 16:24.) The rich glutton has not obtained, and shall never obtain, this drop of water, as long as God shall be God.

13. The reprobate shall be likewise tormented by the stench which pervades hell. The stench shall arise from the very bodies of the damned. "Out of their carcasses shall arise a stink." (Isaiah 34:3.) The bodies of the damned are called carcasses, not because they are dead (for they are living, and shall be for ever alive to pain), but on account of the stench which they exhale. Would it not be very painful to be shut up in a close room with a fetid corpse? St. Bonaventure says, that if the body of one of the damned were placed in the earth, it would, by its stench, be sufficient to cause the death of all men. How intolerable, then, must it be to live for ever in the dungeons of hell in the midst of the immense multitudes of the damned! Some foolish worldlings say: If I go to hell, I shall not be there alone. Miserable fools! do you not see that the greater the number of your companions, the more insufferable shall be your torments? "There," says St. Thomas, "the society of the reprobate shall cause an increase and not a diminution of misery." (Suppl., q. 86, art. 1.) The society of the reprobate augments their misery, because each of the damned is a source of suffering to all the others. Hence, the greater their number, the more they shall mutually torment each other. "And the people," says the prophet Isaias, "shall be ashes after a fire, as a bundle of thorns they shall be burnt with fire." (Isa. 33:12.) Placed in the midst of the furnace of hell, the damned are like so many grains reduced to ashes by that abyss of fire, and like so many thorns tied together and wounding each other.

14. They are tormented not only by the stench of their companions, but also by their shrieks and lamentations. How painful it is to a person longing for sleep to hear the groans of a sick man, the barking of a dog, or the screams of an infant. The damned must listen incessantly to the wailing and howling of their associates, not for a night, nor for a thousand nights, but for all eternity, without the interruption of a single moment.

15. The damned are also tormented by the narrowness of the place in which they are confined; for, although the dungeon of hell is large, it will be too small for so many millions of the reprobate, who like sheep shall be heaped one over the other. "They are," says David, "laid in hell like sheep." (Ps. 48:15.) We learn from the Scriptures that they shall be pressed together like grapes in the winepress, by the vengeance of an angry God. "The winepress of the fierceness of the wrath of God the Almighty." (Apoc. 19:15.) From this pressure shall arise the pain of immobility. "Let them become unmoveable as a stone." (Exod. 16:16.) In whatever position the damned shall fall into hell after the general judgment, whether on the side, or on the back, or with the head downwards, in that they must remain for eternity, without being ever able to move foot or hand or finger, as long as God shall be God. In a word, St. Chrysostom says, that all the pains of this life, however great they may be, are scarcely a shadow of the torments of the damned. "Hœc omnia ludicra sunt et risus ad illa supplicia: pone ignem, ferrum, et bestias, attamen vix umbra sunt ad illa tormenta." (Hom. xxxix. ad pop. Ant.)

16. The reprobate, then, shall be tormented in all the senses of the body. They shall also be tormented in all the powers of the soul. Their memory shall be tormented by the remembrance of the years which they had received from God for the salvation of their souls, and which they spent in labouring for their own damnation; by the remembrance of so many graces and so many divine lights which they abused. Their understanding shall be tormented by the knowledge of the great happiness which they forfeited in losing their souls, heaven, and God; and by a conviction that this loss is irreparable. Their will shall be tormented by seeing that whatsoever they ask or desire shall be refused. "The desire of the wicked shall perish." (Ps. 111:10.) They shall never have any of those things for which they wish, and must for ever suffer all that is repugnant to their will. They would wish to escape from these torments and to find peace; but in these torments they must for ever remain, and peace they shall never enjoy.

17. Perhaps they may sometimes receive a little comfort, or at least enjoy occasional repose? No, says Cyprian: "Nullum ibi refrigerium, nullum remedium, atque ita omni tormento atrocius desperatio." (Serm. de Ascens.) In this life, how great soever may be the tribulations which we suffer, there is always some relief or interruption. The damned must remain for ever in a pit of fire, always in torture, always weeping, without ever enjoying a moment's repose. But perhaps there is some one to pity their sufferings? At the very time that they are so much afflicted the devils continually reproach them with the sins for which they are tormented, saying: Suffer, burn, live for ever in despair: you yourselves have been the cause of your destruction. And do not the saints, the divine mother, and God, who is called the Father of Mercies, take compassion on their miseries? No; "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." (Matt. 26:29.) The saints, represented by the stars, not only do not pity the damned, but they even rejoice in the vengeance inflicted on the injuries offered to their God. Neither can the divine mother pity them, because they hate her Son. And Jesus Christ, who died for the love of them, cannot pity them, because they have despised his love, and have voluntarily brought themselves to perdition.

Sermon XI

SIXTH SUNDAY AFTER THE EPIPHANY

ON THE DEATH OF THE JUST

"The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal until the whole was leavened."—MATT. 13:33.

IN this day's gospel we find that a woman, after putting leaven in the dough, waits till the entire is fermented. Here the Lord gives us to understand that the kingdom of heaven—that is, the attainment of eternal beatitude—is like the leaven. By the leaven is understood the divine grace, which makes the soul acquire merits for eternal life. But this eternal life is obtained only when "the whole is leavened;" that is, when the soul has arrived at the end of the present life and the completion of her merits. We shall, then, speak to-day of the death of the just, which we should not fear, but should desire with our whole souls. For, says St. Bonaventure, "Triplex in morte congratulatio, hominem ab omni labore, peccato, et periculo liberari." Man should rejoice at death, for three reasons—First, because death delivers him from labour—that is, from suffering the miseries of this life and the assault of his enemies. Secondly, because it delivers him from actual sins. Thirdly, because it delivers him from the danger of falling into hell, and opens Paradise to him.

FIRST POINT. DEATH DELIVERS US FROM THE MISERIES OF THIS LIFE, AND FROM THE ASSAULTS OF OUR ENEMIES.

1. What is death? St. Eucherius answers, that "death is the end of miseries." Job said that our life, however short it may be, is full of miseries, of infirmities, of crosses, of persecutions, and fears. "Man born of a woman, living for a short time, is filled with many miseries." (Job 14:1.) What, says St. Augustine, do men who wish for a prolongation of life on this earth desire but a prolongation of suffering?" "Quid est diu vivere nisi diu tor queri." (Serm. xvii de Serb. Dom.) Yes; for, as St. Ambrose remarks, the present life was given to us not for repose or enjoyment, but for labour and suffering, that by toils and pains we may merit Paradise. "Hæc vita homini non ad quitem data est, sed ad laborem." (Serm. xliii.) Hence the same holy doctor says, that, though death is the punishment of sin, still the miseries of this life are so great, that death appears to be a relief rather than a chastisement: "Ut mors remedium videatur esse, non pœna."

2. To those who love God, the severest of all the crosses of this life are the assaults of hell to rob them of the divine grace. Hence St. Denis the Areopagite says, that they joyfully meet death, as the end of their combats, and embrace it with gladness, because they hope to die a good death, and to be thus freed from all fear of ever again falling into sin. "Divino gaudio et mortis terminum tanquam ad finem certaminum tendunt, non amplius metuentus pervertii." (De Hier. Eccl., cap. vii.) The greatest consolation which a soul that loves God experiences at the approach of death, arises from the thought of being delivered from so many temptations, from so many remorses of conscience, and from so many dangers of offending God. Ah! says St. Ambrose, as long as we live, "we walk among snares." We walk continually in the midst of the snares of our enemies, who lie in wait to deprive us of the life of grace. It was the fear of falling into sin that made St. Peter of Alcantara, in his last moments, say to a lay brother who, in attending the saint, accidently touched him: "Brother, remove, remove from me, for I am still alive and in danger of being lost." The thought of being freed from the danger of sin by death consoled St. Teresa, and made her rejoice as often as she heard the clock strike, that an hour of the combat was past. Hence she used to say: "In each moment of life we may sin and lose God." Hence the news of approaching death filled the saints not with sorrow or regret, but with sentiments of joy; because they knew that their struggles and the dangers of losing the divine grace were soon to have an end.

3. "But the just man, if he be prevented with death, shall be in rest." (Wis. 4:7.) He who is prepared to die, regards death as a relief. If, says St. Cyprian, you lived in a house whose roof and walls were tottering and threatening destruction, would you not fly from it as soon as possible? In this life everything menaces ruin to the poor soul—the world, the devils, the flesh, the passions, all draw her to sin and to eternal death. It was this that made St. Paul exclaim: "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom. 7:24.) Who shall deliver me from this body of mine, which lives continually in a dying state, on account of the assaults of my enemies? Hence he esteemed death as a great gain, because it brought to him the possession of Jesus Christ, his true life. Happy then are they who die in the Lord: because they escape from pains and toils, and go to rest. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labours." (Apoc. 14:13.) It is related in the lives of the ancient fathers, that one of them who was very old, when dying, smiled, while the others wept. Being asked why he smiled, he said: "Why do you weep at seeing me go to rest?—Ex labore ad requiem vado, et vos ploratis?" At the hour of death, St. Catherine of Sienna said to her sisters in religion: Rejoice with me: for I leave this land of suffering, and am going to the kingdom of peace. The death of the saints is called a sleep—that is, the repose which God gives to his servants as the reward of their toil. "When he shall give sleep to his beloved, behold the inheritance of the Lord." (Ps. 126:2.) Hence the soul that loves God neither weeps nor is troubled at the approach of death, but, embracing the crucifix, and burning with love, she says: "In peace in the self same I will sleep and I will rest." (Ps. 4:9.)

4. That "Proficiscere de hoc mundo," ("Depart, Christian soul, from this world,") which is so appalling to sinners at the hour of death, does not alarm the saints. "But the souls of the just are in the hands of God, and the torment of death shall not touch them." (Wis. 3:1.) The saint is not afflicted, like worldlings, at the thought of being obliged to leave the goods of this earth, because he has kept the soul detached from them. During life, he always regarded God as the Lord of his heart and as the sole riches which he desired: "What have I in heaven? and, besides thee, what do I desire upon earth? Thou art the God of my heart and the God that is my portion for ever." (Ps. 72:25, 26.) He is not afflicted at leaving honours, because the only honour which he sought was, to love and to be loved by God. All the honours of this world he has justly esteemed as smoke and vanity. He is not afflicted at leaving his relatives, because he loved them only in God. In his last moments he recommends them to his heavenly Father, who loves them more than he does. And having a secure confidence of salvation, he hopes to be better able to assist his relatives from Paradise, than on this earth. In a word, what he frequently said during life, he continues to repeat with greater fervour at the hour of death—"My God and my all."

5. Besides, his peace is not disturbed by the pains of death; but, seeing that he is now at the end of his life, and that he has no more time to suffer for God, or to offer him other proofs of love, he accepts those pains with joy, and offers them to God as the last remains of life; and uniting his death with the death of Jesus Christ, he offers it to the Divine Majesty.

6. And although the remembrance of the sins which he has committed will afflict, it will not disturb him; for, since he is convinced that the Lord will forget the sins of all true penitents, the very sorrow which he feels for his sins, gives him an assurance of pardon. "If the wicked do penance. . . . I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done." (Ezec. 18:21 and 22.) "How," asks St. Basil, "can any one be certain that God has pardoned his sins? He may be certain of pardon if he say: I have hated and abhorred iniquity." (In Reg. inter. 12.) He who detests his sins, and offers to God his death in atonement for them, may rest secure that God has pardoned them. "Mors," says St. Augustine, "quæ in lege naturæ erat pœna peccati in lege gratiæ est hostia pro peccato." (Lib. iv. de Trin. c. xxii.) Death, which was a chastisement of sin under the law of nature, has become, in the law of grace, a victim of penance, by which the pardon of sin is obtained.

7. The very love which a soul bears to God, assures her of his grace, and delivers her from the fear of being lost. "Charity casteth out fear." (1 John 4:18.) If, at the hour of death, you are unwilling to pardon an enemy, or to restore what is not your own, or if you wish to keep up an improper friendship, then tremble for your eternal salvation; for you have great reason to be afraid of death; but if you seek to avoid sin, and to preserve in your heart a testimony that you love God, be assured that he is with you: and if the Lord is with you, what do you fear? And if you wish to be assured that you have within you the divine love, embrace death with peace, and offer it from your heart to God. He that offers to God his death, makes an act of love the most perfect that is possible for him to perform; because, by cheerfully embracing death to please God, at the time and in the manner which God ordains, he becomes like the martyrs, the entire merit of whose martyrdom consisted in suffering and dying to please God.

SECOND POINT. DEATH FREES US FROM ACTUAL SINS.

8. It is impossible to live in this world without committing at least some slight faults. "A just man shall fall seven times." (Prov. 24:16.) He who ceases to live, ceases to offend God. Hence St. Ambrose called death the burial of vices: by death they are buried, and never appear again. "Quid est mors nisi sepultura vitorum?" (De Bono Mort. cap. iv.) The venerable Vincent Caraffa consoled himself at the hour of death by saying: now that I cease to live, I cease for ever to offend my God. He who dies in the grace of God, goes into that happy state in which he shall love God for ever, and shall never more offend him. "Mortuus," says the same holy doctor, "nescit peccare. Quid tanto pere vita mistam desideramus, in qua quanto diutius quis fuerit, tanto majori oneratur sarcina peccatorum." How can we desire this life, in which the longer we live, the greater shall be the load of our sins?

9. Hence the Lord praises the dead more than any man living: "I praised the dead rather than the living." (Eccl. 4:2.) Because no man on this earth, however holy he may be, is exempt from sins. A spiritual soul gave directions that the person who should bring to her the news of death, should say: "Console yourself, for the time has arrived when you shall no longer offend God."

10. St. Ambrose adds, that God permitted death to enter into the world, that, by dying, men should cease to sin: "Passus est Dominus subintrare mortem ut culpa cessaret." (Loco cit.) It is, then, a great error to imagine that death is a chastisement for those who love God. It is a mark of the love which God bears to them; because he shortens their life to put an end to sin, from which they cannot be exempt as long as they remain on this earth. "For his soul pleased God: therefore he hastened to bring him out of the midst of iniquities." (Wis. 4:14.)

THIRD POINT. DEATH DELIVERS US FROM THE DANGER OF FALLING INTO HELL, AND OPENS PARADISE TO US.

11. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of the saints." (Ps. 115:16.) Considered according to the senses, death excites fear and terror; but, viewed with the eye of faith, it is consoling and desirable. To the saints it is as amiable and as precious, as it appears terrible to sinners. "It is precious," says St. Bernard, "as the end of labours, the consummation of victory, the gate of life." The joy of the cup-bearer of Pharaoh, at hearing from Joseph that he should soon be released from prison, bears no comparison to that which a soul that loves God feels on hearing that she is to be liberated from the exile of this earth, and to be transported to the enjoyment of God in her true country. The Apostle says, that, as long as we remain in the body, we wander at a distance from our country in a strange land, and far removed from the life of God: "While we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord." (2 Cor. 5:6.) Hence, St. Bruno teaches, that our death should not be called death, but the beginning of life. "Mors dicenda non est, sed vitæ principium." And St. Athanasius says: "Non est justis mors sed translatio." To the just, death is but a passage from the miseries of this earth to the eternal delights of Paradise. O desirable death! exclaimed St. Augustine; who is there that does not desire thee? For thou art the term of evils, the end of toils, and the beginning of everlasting repose! "O mors desirabilis, malorum finis, laboris clausula, quietis principium."

12. No one can enter into heaven to see God without passing through the gate of death. "This is the gate of the Lord—the just shall enter into it." (Ps. 117:20.) Hence, addressing death, St. Jerome said: "Aperi mini soror mea." Death, my sister, if you do not open the gate to me, I cannot enter to enjoy my God. And St. Charles Borromeo, seeing in his house a picture of death with a knife in the hand, sent for a painter to cancel the knife, and substitute for it a key of gold; because, said the saint, it is death that opens Paradise. Were a queen confined in a dark prison, how great would be her joy at hearing that the gates of the prison are open, and that she is to return from the dungeon to her palace! It was to be liberated by death from the prison of this life that David asked, when he said: "Bring my soul out of prison." (Ps. 141:8.) This, too, was the favour which the venerable Simeon asked of the infant Jesus, when he held him in his arms: "Now thou dost dismiss thy servant." (Luke 2:29.) "As if detained by force," says St. Ambrose, "he asked to be dismissed." Simeon sought to be delivered by death, as if he had been compelled by force to live on this earth.

13. St. Cyprian says, that the sinner who shall pass from temporal to eternal death, has just reason to be afraid of death. "Mori timeat, qui ad secundum mortem de hac morte transibit." But he who is in the state of grace and hopes to pass from death to eternal life—which is the true life—fears not death. It is related that a certain rich man gave to St. John the Almoner a large sum of money to be dispensed in alms, for the purpose of obtaining from God a long life for his only son. The son died in a short time. The father complained of the death of his son; but, to console him, the Lord sent an angel to say to him: "You have sought a long life for your son, and the Lord has heard your prayer; for your son is in heaven, where he enjoys eternal life." This is the grace which, according to the promise of the prophet Osee, the Redeemer obtained for us. "O death, I will be thy death." (13:14.) By his redemption, Jesus Christ destroyed death, and changed it into a source of life to us. When St. Pionius, martyr, was asked how he could go to death with so much joy, he answered: "You err; I do not go to death but to life." "Erratis non ad mortem, sed ad vitam contendo." (Apud Eusub., lib. iv. cap. xiv.) Thus also St. Symphorosa exhorted her son, St. Symphorian, to martyrdom: "My son," said she, "life is not taken away from you; it is only changed for a better one."

14. St. Augustine says, that they who love God desire to see him speedily, and that, therefore, to them life is a cause of suffering, and death an occasion of joy. "Patienter vivit, delectabiliter moritur." (Trac. ix. in Ep. Joan.) St. Teresa used to s ay, that to her life was death. Hence she composed the celebrated hymn, "I die because I do not die." To that great servant of God D. Sancia Carriglio—a penitent of Father M. Avila—it was one day revealed, that she had but a year to live; she answered: "Alas! must I remain another year at a distance from God? O sorrowful year, which will appear to me longer than an age." Such is the language of souls who love God from their heart. It is a mark of little love of God not to desire to see him speedily.

15. Some of you will say: I desire to go to God, but I fear death. I am afraid of the assaults which I shall then experience from hell. I find that the saints have trembled at the hour of death; how much more ought I to tremble! I answer: It is true that hell doos not cease to assail even the saints at death, but it is also true that God does not cease to assist his servants at that moment; and when the dangers are increased, he multiplies his helps. "Ibi plus auxilii," says St. Ambrose, "ubi plus periculi." (ad Jos. cap. v.) The servant of Eliseus was struck with terror when he saw the city surrounded by enemies; but the saint inspired him with courage by showing to him a multitude of angels sent by God to defend it. Hence the prophet afterwards said: "Fear not, for there are more with us than with them." (4 Kings 6:16.) The powers of hell will assail the dying Christian; but his angel guardian will come to console him. His patrons, and St. Michael, who has been appointed by God to defend his faithful servants in their last combat with the devils, will come to his aid. The mother of God will come to assist those who have been devoted to her. Jesus Christ shall come to defend from the assaults of hell the souls for which he died on a cross: he will give them confidence and strength to resist every attack. Hence, filled with courage, they will say: "The Lord is my light and my salvation: whom shall I fear?" (Isa. 26:1.) Truly has Origen said, that the Lord is more desirous of our salvation than the devil is of our perdition, because God's love for us far surpasses the devil's hatred of our souls. "Major illa cura est, ut nos ad veram pertrahat salutem, quam diabolo, ut nos ad æternam damnationem impellat." (Hom. xx.)

16. God is faithful, he will never permit us to be tempted above our strength: "Fidclis Deus non patietur vos tentari supra id quod potestis." (1 Cor. 10:13.) It is true that some saints have suffered great fear at the hour of death; but they have been few. The Lord, as Belluacensis says, has permitted this fear to cleanse them at death from some defect. "Justi quandoque dure moriendo purgantur in hoc mundo." But we know that, generally speaking, the saints have died with a joyful countenance. Father Joseph Scamacca, a man of a holy life, being asked if, in dying, he felt confidence in God, answered: Have I served Mahomet, that I should now doubt of the goodness of my God, or of his wish to save me? Ah! the Lord knows well how to console his servants in their last moments. Even in the midst of the agony of death, he infuses into their souls a certain sweetness and a certain foretaste of that happiness which he will soon bestow upon them. As they who die in sin begin to experience from the bed of death a certain foretaste of hell—certain extraordinary terrors, remorses, and fits of despair; so, on the other hand, the saints, by the fervent acts of divine love which they then make, and by the confidence and the desire which they feel of soon seeing God, taste, before death, that peace which they shall afterwards fully enjoy in heaven.

17. Father Suarez died with so much peace, that in his last moments he said: "I could not have imagined that death was so sweet." Being advised by his physician not to fix his thoughts so constantly on death, Cardinal Baronius said: Is it lest the fear of death should shorten my life? I fear not; on the contrary, I love and desire death. Of the Cardinal Bishop of Rochester, Saunders relates, that, in preparing to die for the faith, he put on his best clothes, saying that he was going to a nuptial feast. When he came within view of the place of execution, he threw away his staff, and said: O my feet, walk fast; for we are not far from Paradise. "Ite pedes, parum a paradiso distamus." Before death, he wished to recite the TE DEUM, in thanksgiving to God for permitting him to die for the holy faith; and, full of joy, he laid his head on the block. St. Francis of Assisium began to sing at the hour of death. Brother Elias said to him: Father, at the hour of death, we ought rather to weep than to sing. But, replied the saint, I cannot abstain from singing at the thought of soon going to enjoy God. A nun of the order of St. Teresa, in her last moments, said to her sisters in religion, who were in tears: O God! why do you weep? I am going to possess my Jesus; if you love me, weep not, but rejoice with me. (Dis. Parol. i. § 6.)

18. Father Granada relates, that a certain sportsman found in a wood a solitary singing in his last agony. How, said the sportsman, can you sing in such a state? The hermit replied: Brother, between me and God there is nothing but the wall of this body. I now see that since my flesh is falling in pieces, the prison shall be destroyed, and I shall soon go to see God. It is for this reason I rejoice and sing. Through the desire of seeing God, St. Ignatius, martyr, said, that if the wild beasts should spare him, he would provoke them to devour him. "Ego vim faciam, ut devorer." St. Catherine of Genoa was astonished that some persons regarded death as a misfortune, and said: "O beloved death, in what a mistaken light do men view you! Why do you not come to me? I call on you day and night." (Vita, c. 7.)

19. Oh! how peculiarly happy is the death of the servants of Mary! Father Binetti relates, that a person whom he assisted in his last moments, and who was devoted to the Blessed Virgin, said to him: "Father, you cannot conceive the consolation which arises at death from the remembrance of having served Mary. Ah! my father, if you knew what happiness I feel on account of having served this good mother! I cannot express it." What joy shall the lovers of Jesus Christ experience at his coming to them in the most holy viaticum! Happy the soul that can then address her Saviour in the words which St. Philip Neri used when the viaticum was brought to him: "Behold my love! behold my love! give me my love!" But, to entertain these sentiments at death, we must have ardently loved Jesus Christ during life.

Sermon XII

SEPTUAGESIMA SUNDAY

ON THE IMPORTANCE OF SALVATION

"He sent them into his vineyard."—MATTHEW 20:2.

THE vines of the Lord are our souls, which he has given us to cultivate by good works, that we may be one day admitted into eternal glory. "How," says Salvian, "does it happen that a Christian believes, and still does not fear the future?" Christians believe death, judgment, hell, and Paradise: but they live as if they believed them not—as if these truths of faith were fables or the inventions of human genius. Many live as if they were never to die, or as if they had not to give God an account of their life—as if there were neither a hell nor a heaven. Perhaps they do not believe in them? They believe, but do not reflect on them; and thus they are lost. They take all possible care of worldly affairs, but attend not to the salvation of their souls. I shall show you, this day, that the salvation of your souls is the most important of all affairs.

First Point.—Because, if the soul is lost, all is lost.

Second Point.—Because, if the soul is lost once, it is lost for ever.

FIRST POINT. IF THE SOUL IS LOST, ALL IS LOST.

1. "But," says St. Paul, "we entreat you . . . that you do your own business." (1 Thess. 4:10, 11.) The greater part of worldlings are most attentive to the business of this world. What diligence do they not employ to gain a law-suit or a post of emolument! How many means are adopted—how many measures taken? They neither eat nor sleep. And what efforts do they make to save their souls? All blush at being told that they neglect the affairs of their families; and how few are ashamed to neglect the salvation of their souls. "Brethren," says St. Paul, "I entreat you that you do your own business;" that is, the business of your eternal salvation.

2. "Nugæ puerorum," says St. Bernard, "nugæ vocantur, nugæ malorum negotia vocantur." The trifles of children are called trifles, but the trifles of men are called business; and for these many lose their souls. If in one worldly transaction you suffer a loss, you may repair it in another; but if you die in enmity with God, and lose your soul, how can you repair the loss? "What exchange can a man give for his soul:" (Matt. 16:26.) To those who neglect the care of salvation, St. Euterius says: "Quam pretiosus sis, O homo, si Creatori non credis, interroga Redemptorem." (Hom. ii. in Symb.) If, from being created by God to his own image, you do not comprehend the value of your soul, learn it from Jesus Christ, who has redeemed you with his own blood. "You were not redeemed with corruptible things, as gold or silver, . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb unspotted and undefiled." (1 Pet. 1:18, 19.)

3. God, then, sets so high a value on your soul; such is its value in the estimatien of Satan, that, to become master of it, he does not sleep night or day, but is continually going about to make it his own. Hence St. Augustine exclaims: "The enemy sleeps not, and you are asleep." The enemy is always awake to injure you, and you slumber. Pope Benedict the Twelfth, being asked by a prince for a favour which he could not conscientiously grant, said to the ambassador: Tell the prince, that, if I had two souls, I might be able to lose one of them in order to please him; but, since I have but one, I cannot consent to lose it. Thus he refused the favour which the prince sought from him.

4. Brethren, remember that, if you save your souls, your failure in every worldly transaction will be but of little importance: for, if you are saved, you shall enjoy complete happiness for all eternity. But, if you lose your souls, what will it profit you to have enjoyed all the riches, honours, and amusements of this world? If you lose your souls, all is lost. "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" (Matt. 16:26.) By this maxim St. Ignatius of Loyola drew many souls to God, and among them the soul of St. Francis Xavier, who was then at Paris, and devoted his attention to the acquirement of worldly goods. One day St. Ignatius said to him: "Francis, whom do you serve? You serve the world, which is a traitor, that promises, but does not perform. And if it should fulfil all its promises, how long do its goods last? Can they last longer than this life? And, after death, what will they profit you, if you shall not have saved your soul?" He then reminded Francis of the maxims of the Gospel: "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" "But one thing is necessary?" (Luke 10:42.) It is not necessary to become rich on this earth—to acquire honours and dignities; but it is necessary to save our souls; because, unless we gain heaven we shall be condemned to hell: there is no middle place: we must be either saved or damned. God has not created us for this earth; neither does he preserve our lives that we may become rich and enjoy amusements. "And the end life everlasting." (Rom. 6:22.) He has created us, and preserved us, that we may acquire eternal glory.

5. St. Philip Neri used to say, that he who does not seek, above all things, the salvation of his soul, is a fool. If on this earth there were two classes of men, one mortal, and the other immortal, and if the former saw the latter entirely devoted to the acquisition of earthly goods, would they not exclaim: O fools that you are! You have it in your power to secure the immense and eternal goods of Paradise, and you lose your time in procuring the miserable goods of this earth, which shall end at death. And for these you expose yourselves to the danger of the eternal torments of hell. Leave to us, for whom all shall end at death, the care of these earthly things. But, brethren, we are all immortal, and each of us shall be eternally happy or eternally miserable in the other life. But the misfortune of the greater part of mankind is, that they are solicitous about the present, and never think of the future. "Oh! that they would be wise, and would understand, and would provide for their last end." (Deut. 32:29.) Oh! that they knew how to detach themselves from present goods, which last but a short time, and to provide for what must happen after death—an eternal reign in heaven, or everlasting slavery in hell. St. Philip Neri, conversing one day with Francis Zazzera, a young man of talent who expected to make a fortune in the world, said to him: "You shall realize a great fortune; you shall be a prelate, afterwards a cardinal, and in the end, perhaps, pope. But what must follow? what must follow? Go, my son, think on these words." The young man departed, and after meditating on the words, what must follow? what must follow? he renounced his worldly prospects, and gave himself entirely to God; and, retiring from the world, he entered into the congregation of St. Philip, and died a holy death.

6. "The fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Cor. 7:31.) On this passage, Cornelius a Lapide, says, that "the world is as it were a stage." The present life is a comedy, which passes away. Happy the man who acts his part well in this comedy by saving his soul. But if he shall have spent his life in the acquisition of riches and worldly honours, he shall justly be called a fool; and at the hour of death he shall receive the reproach addressed to the rich man in the gospel: "Fool, this night do they require thy soul of thee; and whose shall these things be which thou hast provided?" (Luke 12:20.) In explaining the words "they require," Toletus says, that the Lord has given us our souls to guard them against the assaults of our enemies; and that at death the angel shall come to require them of us, and shall present them at the tribunal of Jesus Christ. But if we shall have lost our souls by attending only to the acquisition of earthly possessions, these shall belong to us no longer—they shall pass to other hands: and what shall then become of our souls?

7. Poor worldlings! of all the riches which they acquired, of all the pomps which they displayed in this life, what shall they find at death? "They have slept their sleep: and all the men of riches have found nothing in their hands." (Ps. 75:6.) The dream of this present life shall be over at death, and they shall have acquired nothing for eternity. Ask of so many great men of this earth—of the princes and emperors, who, during life, have abounded in riches, honours, and pleasures, and are at this moment in hell—what now remains of all the riches which they possessed in this world? They answer with tears: "Nothing, nothing." And of so many honours enjoyed—of so many past pleasures—of so many pomps and triumphs, what now remains? They answer with howling: "Nothing, nothing."

8. Justly, then, has St. Francis Xavier said, that in the world there is but one good and one evil. The former consists in saving our souls; the latter in losing them. Hence, David said: "One thing I have asked of the Lord; this I will seek after—that I may dwell in the house of the Lord." (Ps. 26:4.) One thing only have I sought, and will for ever seek, from God—that he may grant me the grace to save my soul; for, if I save my soul, all is safe; if I lose it, all is lost. And, what is more important, if my soul be once lost, it is lost for ever. Let us pass to the second point.

SECOND POINT. IF THE SOUL BE ONCE LOST, IT IS LOST FOR EVER.

9. Men die but once. If a Christian died twice, he might lose his soul the first, and save it the second time. But we can die only once: if the soul be lost the first time, it is lost for ever. This truth St. Teresa frequently inculcated to her nuns: "One soul," she would say, "one eternity." As if she said: We have but one soul: if this be lost, all is lost. There is but "one eternity;" if the soul be once lost, it is lost for ever. "Periisse semel æternum est."

10. St. Eucherius says that there is no error so great as the neglect of eternal salvation. "Sane supra omnem errorem est dissimulare negotium æternæ salutis." It is an error which surpasses all errors, because it is irremediable. Other mistakes may be repaired: if a person loses property in one way, he may acquire it in another; if he loses a situation, a dignity, he may afterwards recover them; if he even loses his life, provided his soul be saved, all is safe. But he who loses his soul has no means of repairing the loss. The wailing of the damned arises from the thought, that for them the time of salvation is over, and that there is no hope of remedy for their eternal ruin. "The summer is ended, and we are not saved." (Jer. 8:20.) Hence they weep, and shall inconsolably weep for ever, saying: "Therefore we have erred from the way of truth, and the light of justice hath not shined unto us." (Wis. 5:6.) But what will it profit them to know the error they have committed, when it will be too late to repair it?

11. The greatest torment of the damned arises from the thought of having lost their souls, and of having lost them through their own fault. "Destruction is thy own, O Israel; thy help is only from me." (Osee 13:9.) O miserable being! God says to each of the damned; thy perdition is thine own; that is from thyself; by sin thou hast been the cause of thy damnation; for I was ready to save thee if thou hadst wished to attend to thy salvation. St. Teresa used to say, that when a person loses a trifle through negligence, his peace is disturbed by the thought of having lost it through his own fault. O God! what shall be the pain which each of the damned shall feel on entering into hell, at the thought of having lost his soul—his all—and of having lost them through his own fault!

12. "We must, then, from this day forward, devote all our attention to the salvation of our souls. There is no question, says St. John Chrysostom, of losing some earthly good which we must one day relinquish. But there is question of losing Paradise, and of going to suffer for ever in hell: "De immortalibus suppliciis, de cœlestis regni amissione res agitur." We must fear and tremble; it is thus we shall be able to secure eternal happiness. "With fear and trembling work out your salvation." (Phil. 2:12.) Hence, if we wish to save our souls, we must labour strenuously to avoid dangerous occasions, to resist temptations, and to frequent the sacraments. Without labour we cannot obtain heaven. "The violent bear it away." The saints tremble at the thought of eternity. St. Andrew Avellino exclaimed with tears: Who knows whether I shall be saved or damned? St. Lewis Bertrand said with trembling: What shall be my lot in the other world? And shall we not tremble? Let us pray to Jesus Christ and his most holy mother to help us to save our souls. This is for us the most important of all affairs: if we succeed in it, we shall be eternally happy; if we fail, we must be for ever miserable.

Sermon XIII

SEXAGESIMA SUNDAY

ON THE UNHAPPY LIFE OF SINNERS, AND ON THE HAPPY LIFE OF THOSE WHO LOVE GOD

"And that which fell among the thorns are they who have heard, and, going their way, are choked with the cares and riches of this life, and yield no fruit."—LUKE 8:14.

IN the parable of this day's gospel we are told that part of the seed which the sower went out to sow fell among thorns. The Saviour has declared that the seed represents the divine word, and the thorns the attachment of men to earthly riches and pleasures, which are the thorns that prevent the fruit of the word of God, not only in the future, but even in the present life. O misery of poor sinners! By their sins they not only condemn themselves to eternal torments in the next, but to an unhappy life in this world. This is what I intend to demonstrate in the following discourse.

First Point. The unhappy life of sinners.

Second Point. Happy life of those who love God.

FIRST POINT. UNHAPPY LIFE OF SINNERS.

1. The devil deceives sinners, and makes them imagine that, by indulging their sensual appetites, they shall lead a life of happiness, and shall enjoy peace. But there is no peace for those who offend God. "There is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord." (Isa. 48:22.) God declares that all his enemies have led a life of misery, and that they have not even known the way of peace. "Destruction and unhappiness in their ways: and the way of peace they have not known." (Ps. 13:3.)

2. Brute animals that have been created for this world, enjoy peace in sensual delights. Give to a dog a bone, and he is perfectly content; give to an ox a bundle of hay, and he desires nothing more. But man, who has been created for God, to love God, and to be united to him, can be made happy only by God, and not by the world, though it should enrich him with all its goods. What are worldly goods? They may be all reduced to pleasures of sense, to riches, and to honours. "All that is in the world," says St. John, "is the concupiscence of the flesh," or sensual delights, "and the concupiscence of the eyes," or riches, "and the pride of life"—that is, earthly honours. (1 John 2:16.) St. Bernard says, that a man may be puffed up with earthly goods, but can never be made content or happy by them. "Inflari potest, satiari, non potest." And how can earth and wind and dung satisfy the heart of man? In his comment on these words of St. Peter—"Behold, we have left all things"—the same saint says, that he saw in the world different classes of fools. All had a great desire of happiness. Some, such as the avaricious, were content with riches; others, ambitious of honours and of praise, were satisfied with wind; others, seated round a furnace, swallowed the sparks that were thrown from it—these were the passionate and vindictive; others, in fine, drank fetid water from a stagnant pool—and these were the voluptuous and unchaste. O fools! adds the saint, do you not perceive that all these things, from which you seek content, do not satisfy, but, on the contrary, increase the cravings of your heart? "Hæc potius famem provocant, quam extinguunt." Of this we have a striking example in Alexander the Great, who, after having conquered half the world, burst into tears, because he was not master of the whole earth.

3. Many expect to find peace in accumulating riches; but how can these satisfy their desires? "Major pecunia," says St. Augustine, "avaritiæ fauces non claudit, sed extendit." A large quantity of money does not close, but rather extends, the jaws of avarice;—that is, the enjoyment of riches excites, rather than satiates, the desire of wealth. "Thou wast debased even to hell; thou hast been wearied in the multitude of thy ways; yet thou saidst not, I will rest. (Isa. 57:9, 10.) Poor worldlings! they labour and toil to acquire an increase of wealth and property, but never enjoy repose: the more they accumulate riches, the greater their disquietude and vexation. "The rich have wanted, and have suffered hunger; but they that seek the Lord shall not be deprived of any good." (Ps. 33:11.) The rich of this world are, of all men, the most miserable; because, the more they possess, the more they desire to possess. They never succeed in attaining all the objects of their wishes, and therefore they are far poorer than men who have but a competency, and seek God alone. These are truly rich, because they are content with their condition, and find in God every good. "They that seek the Lord shall not be deprived of any good." To the saints, because they possess God, nothing is wanting; to the worldly rich, who are deprived of God, all things are wanting, because they want peace. The appellation of fool was, therefore, justly given to the rich man in the gospel (Luke 12:19.), who, because his land brought forth plenty of fruits, said to his soul: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years: take rest, eat, drink, make good cheer." (Luke 12:19.) But this man was called a fool. "Thou fool, this night do they require thy soul of thee; and whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" (v. 20.) And why was he called a fool. Because he imagined that by these goods—by eating and drinking—he should be content, and should enjoy peace. "Rest," he said, "eat, drink." "Numquid, says St. Basil of Seleucia, "animam porcinam habes?" Hast thou the soul of a brute, that thou expectest to make it happy by eating and drinking?

4. But, perhaps sinners who seek after and attain worldly honours are content? All the honours of this earth are but smoke and wind ("Ephraim feedeth on the wind"—Osee 12:1), and how can these content the heart of a Christian? "The pride of them," says David, "ascendeth continually." (Ps. 73:23.) The ambitious are not satisfied by the attainment of certain honours: their ambition and pride continually increase; and thus their disquietude, their envy, and their fears are multiplied.

5. They who live in the habit of sins of impurity, feed, as the Prophet Jeremiah says, on dung. "Qui voluptuose vescebantur, amplexati sunt stercora." (Thren. 4:5.) How can dung content or give peace to the soul? Ah! what peace, what peace can sinners at a distance from God enjoy? They may possess the riches, honours, and delights of this world; but they never shall have peace. No; the word of God cannot fail: he has declared that there is no peace for his enemies. "There is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord." (Isaias, 48:22.) Poor sinners! they, as St. Chrysostom says, always carry about with them their own executioner—that is, a guilty conscience, which continually torments them. "Peccator conscientiam quasi carnificem circumgestat." (Serm. x. de Laz.) St. Isidore asserts, that there is no pain more excruciating than that of a guilty conscience. Hence he adds, that he who leads a good life is never sad. "Nulla pœna gravior pœna conscientiæ: vis nunquam esse tristis? bene vive." (S. Isid., lib. 2, Solit.)

6. In describing the deplorable state of sinners, the Holy Ghost compares them to a sea continually tossed by the tempest. "The wicked are like the raging sea, which cannot rest." (Isa. 57:20.) Waves come and go, but they are all waves of bitterness and rancour; for every cross and contradiction disturbs and agitates the wicked. If a person at a ball or musical exhibition, were obliged to remain suspended by a cord with his head downwards, could he feel happy at the entertainment? Such is the state of a Christian in enmity with God: his soul is as it were turned upside down; instead of being united with God and detached from creatures, it is united with creatures and separated from God. But creatures, says St. Vincent Ferrer, are without, and do not enter to content the heart, which God alone can make happy. "Non intrant ibi ubi est sitis." The sinner is like a man parched with thirst, and standing in the middle of a fountain: because the waters which surround him do not enter to satisfy his thirst, he remains in the midst of them more thirsty than before.

7. Speaking of the unhappy life which he led when he was in a state of sin, David said: "My tears have been my bread, day and night, whilst it is said to me daily: Where is thy God?" (Ps. 41:4.) To relieve himself, he went to his villas, to his gardens, to musical entertainments, and to various other royal amusements, but they all said to him: "David, if thou expectest comfort from us, thou art deceived. Where is thy God? Go and seek thy God, whom thou hast lost; for he alone can restore thy peace." Hence David confessed that, in the midst of his princely wealth, he enjoyed no repose, and that he wept night and day. Let us now listen to his son Solomon, who acknowledged that he indulged his senses in whatsoever they desired. "Whatsoever my eyes desired, I refused them not." (Eccl. 2:10.) But, after all his sensual enjoyments, he exclaimed: "Vanity of vanities: . . . behold all is vanity and affliction of spirit." (Eccles. 1:2 and 14.) Mark! he declares that all the pleasures of this earth are not only vanity of vanities, but also affliction of spirit. And this sinners well know from experience; for sin brings with it the fear of divine vengeance. The man who is encompassed by powerful enemies never sleeps in peace; and can the sinner, who has God for an enemy, enjoy tranquillity? "Fear to them that work evil." (Prov. 10:29.) The Christian who commits a mortal sin feels himself oppressed with fear—every leaf that moves excites terror. "The sound of dread is always in his ears." (Job 15:21.) He appears to be always flying away, although no one pursues him. "The wicked man fleeth when no man pursueth." (Prov. 28:1.) He shall be persecuted, not by men, but by his own sin. It was thus with Cain, who, after having killed his brother Abel, was seized with fear, and said: "Every one, therefore, that findeth me shall kill me." (Gen. 4:14.) The Lord assured him that no one should injure him: "The Lord said to him: "No; it shall not be so." (v. 15.) But, notwithstanding this assurance, Cain, pursued by his own sins, was, as the Scripture attests, always flying from one place to another "He dwelt a fugitive on the earth." (v. 16.)

8. Moreover, sin brings with it remorse of conscience—that cruel worm that gnaws incessantly, and never dies. "Their worm shall not die." (Isa 66:24.) If the sinner goes to a festival, to a comedy, to a banquet, his conscience continually reproaches him, saying: Unhappy man! you have lost God; if you were now to die, what should become of you? The torture of remorse of conscience, even in the present life, is so great that, to free themselves from it, some persons have put an end to their lives Judas, through despair, hanged himself. A certain man who had killed an infant, was so much tormented with remorse that he could not rest. To rid himself of it he entered into a monastery; but finding no peace even there, he went before a judge, acknowledged his crime, and got himself condemned to death.

9. God complains of the injustice of sinners in leaving him, who is the fountain of all consolation, to plunge themselves into fetid and broken cisterns, which can give no peace. "For my people have done two evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain of living water, and have digged to themselves cisterns—broken cisterns—that can hold no water." (Jer. 2:13.) You have, the Lord says to sinners, refused to serve me, your God, in, peace. Unhappy creatures! you shall serve your enemies in hunger, and thirst, and nakedness, and in want of every kind. "Because thou didst not serve the Lord thy God with joy and gladness, . . . thou shalt serve thy enemy in hunger, and thirst, and "nakedness, and in want of all things." (Deut. 28:47, 48.) This is what sinners experience every day. What do not the vindictive endure after they have satisfied their revenge by the murder of an enemy? They fly continually from the relations of their murdered foe, and from the minister of justice. They live as fugitives, poor, afflicted, and abandoned by all. What do not the voluptuous and unchaste suffer in order to gratify their wicked desires? What do not the avaricious suffer in order to acquire the possessions of others? Ah! if they suffered for God what they suffer for sin, they would lay up great treasures for eternity, and would lead a life of peace and happiness: but, by living in sin, they lead a life of misery here, to lead a still more miserable life for eternity hereafter. Hence they weep continually in hell, saying: "We wearied ourselves in the way of iniquity and destruction, and have walked through hard ways." (Wis. 5:7.) We have, they exclaim, walked through hard ways, through paths covered with thorns. We wearied ourselves in the way of iniquity: we have laboured hard: we have sweated blood: we have led a life full of misery, of gall, and of poison. And why? To bring ourselves to a still more wretched life in this pit of fire.

SECOND POINT. THE HAPPY LIFE OF THOSE WHO LOVE GOD.

10. "Justice and peace have kissed." (Ps. 84:11.) Peace resides in every soul in which justice dwells. Hence David said: "Delight in the Lord, and he will give thee the requests of thy heart." (Ps. 36:4.) To understand this text, we must consider that worldlings seek to satisfy the desires of their hearts with the goods of this earth; but, because these cannot make them happy, their hearts continually make fresh demands; and, how much soever they may acquire of these goods, they are not content. Hence the Prophet says: "Delight in the Lord, and he will give thee the requests of thy heart." Give up creatures, seek your delight in God, and he will satisfy all the cravings of your heart.

11. This is what happened to St. Augustine, who, as long as he sought happiness in creatures, never enjoyed peace; but, as soon as he renounced them, and gave to God all the affections of his heart, he exclaimed: "All things are hard, O Lord, and thou alone art repose." As if he said: Ah! Lord, I now know my folly. I expected to find felicity in earthly pleasures; but now I know that they are only vanity and affliction of spirit, and that thou alone art the peace and joy of our hearts.

12. The Apostle says, that the peace which God gives to those who love, surpasses all the sensual delights which a man can enjoy on this earth. "The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding." (Phil. 4:7.) St. Francis of Assisium, in saying "My God and my all," experienced on this earth an anticipation of Paradise. St. Francis Xavier, in the midst of his labours in India for the glory of Jesus Christ, was so replenished with divine consolations, that he exclaimed: "Enough, O Lord, enough." Where, I ask, has any lover of this world been found, so satisfied with the possessions of worldly goods, as to say: Enough, O world, enough; no more riches, no more honours, no more applause, no more pleasures? Ah, no! worldlings are constantly seeking after higher honours, greater riches, and new delights; but the more they have of them, the less are their desires satisfied, and the greater their disquietude.

13. It is necessary to persuade ourselves of this truth, that God alone can give content. Worldlings do not wish to be convinced of it, through an apprehension that, if they give themselves to God, they shall lead a life of bitterness and discontent. But, with the Royal Prophet, I say to them: "O taste, and see that the Lord is sweet." (Ps. 33:9.) Why, O sinners, will you despise and regard as miserable that life which you have not as yet tried? "O taste and see." Begin to make a trial of it; hear Mass every day; practise mental prayer and the visitation of the most holy sacrament; go to communion at least once a week; fly from evil conversations; walk always with God; and you shall see that, by such a life, you will enjoy that sweetness and peace which the world, with all its delights, has not hitherto been able to give you.

Sermon XIV

QUINQUAGESIMA SUNDAY

DELUSIONS OF SINNERS

"Lord, that I may see."—LUKE 18:41.

1. THE Devil brings sinners to hell by closing their eyes to the dangers of perdition. He first blinds them, and then leads them with himself to eternal torments. If, then, we wish to be saved, we must continually pray to God in the words of the blind man in the gospel of this day, "Lord, that I may see." Give me light: make me see the way in which I must walk in order to save my soul, and to escape the deceits of the enemy of salvation. I shall, brethren, this day place before your eyes the delusion by which the devil tempts men to sin and to persevere in sin, that you may know how to guard yourselves against his deceitful artifices.

2. To understand these delusions better, let us imagine the case of a young man who, seized by some passion, lives in sin, the slave of Satan, and never thinks of his eternal salvation. My son, I say to him, what sort of life do you lead? If you continue to live in this manner, how will you be able to save your soul? But, behold! the devil, on the other hand, says to him: Why should you be afraid of being lost? Indulge your passions for the present: you will afterwards confess your sins, and thus all shall be remedied. Behold the net by which the devil drags so many souls into hell. "Indulge your passions: you will hereafter make a good confession." But, in reply, I say, that in the meantime you lose your soul. Tell me: if you had a jewel worth a thousand pounds, would you throw it into a river with the hope of afterwards finding it again? What if all your efforts to find it were fruitless? O God! you hold in your hand the invaluable jewel of your soul, which Jesus Christ has purchased with his own blood, and you cast it into hell! Yes; you cast it into hell; because according to the present order of providence, for every mortal sin you commit, your name is written among the number of the damned. But you say. "I hope to recover God's grace by making a good confession." And if you should not recover it, what shall be the consequences? To make a good confession, a true sorrow for sin is necessary, and this sorrow is the gift of God: if he does not give it, will you not be lost for ever?

3. You rejoin: "I am young; God compassionates my youth; I will hereafter give myself to God." Behold another delusion! You are young; but do you not know that God counts, not the years, but the sins of each individual? You are young; but how many sins have you committed? Perhaps there are many persons of a very advanced age, who have not been guilty of the fourth part of the sins which you have committed. And do you not know that God has fixed for each of us the number of sins which he will pardon? "The Lord patiently expecteth, that, when the day of judgment shall come, he may punish them in the fulness of their sins." (2 Mach. 6:14.) God has patience, and waits for a while; but, when the measure of the sins which he has determined to pardon is filled up, he pardons no more, but chastises the sinner, by suddenly depriving him of life in the miserable state of sin, or by abandoning him in his sin, and executing that threat which he made by the prophet Isaias—"I shall take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be wasted." (Isa. 5:5.) If a person has cultivated land for many years, has encompassed it with a hedge for its protection, and expended a large sum of money on it, but finds that, after all, it produces no fruit, what will he do with it? He will pluck up the hedge, and abandon it to all men and beasts that may wish to enter. Tremble, then, lest God should treat you in a similar manner. If you do not give up sin, your remorse of conscience and your fear of divine chastisement shall daily increase. Behold the hedge taken away, and your soul abandoned by God—a punishment worse than death itself.

4. You say: "I cannot at present resist this passion." Behold the third delusion of the devil, by which he makes you believe that at present you have not strength to overcome certain temptations. But St. Paul tells us that God is faithful, and that he never permits us to be tempted above our strength. "And God is faithful, who will not permit you to be tempted above that which you are able." (1 Cor. 10:13.) I ask, if you are not now able to resist the temptation, how can you expect to resist it hereafter? If you yield to it, the Devil will become stronger, and you shall become weaker; and if you be not now able to extinguish this flame of passion, how can you hope to be able to extinguish it when it shall have grown more violent? You say: "God will give me his aid." But this aid God is ready to give at present if you ask it. Why then do you not implore his assistance? Perhaps you expect that, without now taking the trouble of invoking his aid, you will receive from him increased helps and graces, after you shall have multiplied the number of your sins? Perhaps you doubt the veracity of God, who has promised to give whatever we ask of him? "Ask," he says, "and it shall be given you." (Matt. 7:7.) God cannot violate his promises. "God is not as man, that he should lie, nor as the son of man, that he should be changed. Hath he said, then, and will he not do?" (Num. 23:19.) Have recourse to him, and he will give you the strength necessary to resist the temptation. God commands you to resist it, and you say: "I have not strength." Does God, then, command impossibilities? No; the Council of Trent has declared that "God does not command impossibilities; but, by his commands, he admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask what you cannot do; and he assists, that you may be able to do it." (Sess. 6. c. xiii.) "When you see that you have not sufficient strength to resist temptation with the ordinary assistance of God, ask of him the additional help which you require, and he will give it to you; and thus you shall be able to conquer all temptations, however violent they may be.

5. But you will not pray; and you say that at present you will commit this sin, and will afterwards confess it. But, I ask, how do you know that God will give you time to confess it? You say: "I will go to confession before the lapse of a week." And who has promised you this week? Well, then you say: "I will go to confession to-morrow." And who promises you to-morrow? "Crastinum Deus non promisit," says St. Augustine, "fortasse dabit, et fortasse non dabit." God has not promised you to-morrow. Perhaps he will give it, and perhaps he will refuse it to you, as he has to so many others. How many have gone to bed in good health, and have been found dead in the morning! How many, in the very act of sin, has the Lord struck dead and sent to hell! Should this happen to you, how will you repair your eternal ruin? "Commit this sin, and confess it afterwards." Behold the deceitful artifice by which the devil has brought so many thousands of Christians to hell. We scarcely ever find a Christian so sunk in despair as to intend to damn himself. All the wicked sin with the hope of afterwards going to confession. But, by this illusion, how many have brought themselves to perdition! For them there is now no time for confession, no remedy for their damnation.

6. "But God is merciful." Behold another common delusion by which the devil encourages sinners to persevere in a life of sin! A certain author has said, that more souls have been sent to hell by the mercy of God than by his justice. This is indeed the case; for men are induced by the deceits of the devil to persevere in sin, through confidence in God's mercy; and thus they are lost. "God is merciful." Who denies it? But, great as his mercy, how many does he every day send to hell? God is merciful, but he is also just, and is, therefore, obliged to punish those who offend him. "And his mercy," says the divine mother, "to them that fear him." (Luke 1:50.) But with regard to those who abuse his mercy and despise him, he exercises justice. The Lord pardons sins, but he cannot pardon the determination to commit sin. St. Augustine says, that he who sins with the intention of repenting after his sins, is not a penitent but a scoffer. "Irrisor est non pœnitens." But the Apostle tells us that God will not be mocked. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked." (Gal. 6:7.) It would be a mockery of God to insult him as often and as much as you pleased, and afterwards to expect eternal glory.

7. "But," you say, "as God has shown me so many miseries hitherto, I hope he will continue to do so for the future." Behold another delusion! Then, because God has not as yet chastised your sins, he will never punish them! On the contrary, the greater have been his mercies, the more you should tremble, lest, if you offend him again, he should pardon you no more, and should take vengeance on your sins. Behold the advice of the Holy Ghost: "Say not: I have sinned, and what harm hath befallen me? for the Most High is a patient rewarder." (Eccles. 5:4.) Do not say: "I have sinned, and no chastisement has fallen upon me." God bears for a time, but not for ever. He waits for a certain time; but when that arrives, he then chastises the sinner for all his past iniquities: and the longer he has waited for repentance, the more severe the chastisement. "Quos diutius expectat," says St. Gregory, "durius damnat." Then, my brother, since you know that you have frequently offended God, and that he has not sent you to hell, you should exclaim: "The mercies of the Lord, that we are not consumed." (Thren. 3:22.) Lord, I thank you for not having sent me to hell, which I have so often deserved. And therefore you ought to give yourself entirely to God, at least through gratitude, and should consider that, for less sins than you have committed, many are now in that pit of fire, without the smallest hope of being ever released from it. The patience of God in bearing with you, should teach you not to despise him still more, but to love and serve him with greater fervour, and to atone, by penitential austerities and by other holy works, for the insults you have offered to him. You know that he has shown mercies to you, which he has not shown to others. "He hath not done in like manner to every nation." (Ps. 147:20.) Hence you should tremble, lest, if you commit a single additional mortal sin, God should abandon you, and cast you into hell.

8. Let us come to the next illusion. "It is true that, by this sin, I lose the grace of God; but, even after committing this sin, I may be saved." You may, indeed, be saved: but it cannot be denied that if, after having committed so many sins, and after having received so many graces from God, you again offend him, there is great reason to fear that you shall be lost. Attend to the words of the sacred Scripture: "A hard heart shall fare evil at the last." (Eccles. 3:27.) The obstinate sinner shall die an unhappy death. "Evil doers shall be cut off." (Ps. 36:9.) The wicked shall be cut off by the divine justice. "For what things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap." (Gal. 6:8.) He that sows in sin, shall reap eternal torments. "Because I called and you refused, . . . I also will laugh in your destruction, and will mock when that shall come to you which you feared." (Prov. 1:24, 26.) I called, says the Lord, and you mocked me; but I will mock you at the hour of death. "Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time." (Deut. 32:35.) The chastisement of sins belongs to me, and I will execute vengeance on them when the time of vengeance shall arrive. "The man that with a stiff neck despiseth him that reproveth him, shall suddenly be destroyed, and health shall not follow him." (Prov. 29:1.) The man who obstinately despises those who correct him, shall be punished with a sudden death, and for him there shall be no hope of salvation.

9. Now, brethren, what think you of these divine threats against sinners? Is it easy, or is it not very difficult, to save your souls, if, after so many divine calls, and after so many mercies, you continue to offend God? You say: "But after all, it may happen that I will save my soul." I answer: "What folly is it to trust your salvation to a perhaps?" How many with this "perhaps I may be saved," are now in hell? Do you wish to be one of their unhappy companions? Dearly beloved Christians, enter into yourselves, and tremble; for this sermon may be the last of God's mercies to you.

Sermon XV

FIRST SUNDAY OF LENT

ON THE NUMBER OF SINS BEYOND WHICH GOD PARDONS NO MORE

"Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."—MATT. 4:7.

IN this day's gospel we read that, having gone into the desert, Jesus Christ permitted the devil to "set him upon the pinnacle of the temple," and say to him: "If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down;" for the angels shall preserve thee from all injury. But the Lord answered that, in the Sacred Scriptures it is written: "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." The sinner who abandons himself to sin without striving to resist temptations, or without at least asking God's help to conquer them, and hopes that the Lord will one day draw him from the precipice, tempts God to work miracles, or rather to show to him an extraordinary mercy not extended to the generality of Christians. God, as the Apostle says, "will have all men to be saved," (1 Tim. 2:4); but he also wishes us all to labour for our own salvation, at least by adopting the means of overcoming our enemies, and of obeying him when he calls us to repentance. Sinners hear the calls of God, but they forget them, and continue to offend him. But God does not forget them. He numbers the graces which he dispenses, as well as the sins which we commit. Hence, when the time which he has fixed arrives, God deprives us of his graces, and begins to inflict chastisement. I intend to show, in this discourse, that, when sins reach a certain number, God pardons no more. Be attentive.

1. St. Basil, St. Jerome, St. John Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and other fathers, teach that, as God (according to the words of Scripture, "Thou hast ordered all things in measure, and number, and weight" (Wis. 11:21), has fixed for each person the number of the days of his life, and the degrees of health and talent which he will give him, so he has also determined for each the number of sins which he will pardon; and when this number is completed, he will pardon no more. "Illud sentire nos convenit," says St. Augustine, "tamdiu unumquemque a Dei patientia sustineri, quo consummato nullam illi veniam reserveri." (De Vita Christi, cap. iii.) Eusebius of Cesarea says: "Deus expectat usque ad certum numerum et postea deserit." (Lib. 8, cap. ii.) The same doctrine is taught by the above mentioned fathers.

2. "The Lord hath sent me to heal the contrite of heart." (Isa. 61:1.) God is ready to heal those who sincerely wish to amend their lives, but cannot take pity on the obstinate sinner The Lord pardons sins, but he cannot pardon those who are determined to offend him. Nor can we demand from God a reason why he pardons one a hundred sins, and takes others out of life, and sends them to hell, after three or four sins. By his Prophet Amos, God has said: "For three crimes of Damascus, and for four, I will not convert it." (1:3.) In this we must adore the judgments of God, and say with the Apostle: "O the depth of the riches, of the wisdom, and of the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments." (Rom. 11:33.) He who receives pardon, says St. Augustine, is pardoned through the pure mercy of God; and they who are chastised are justly punished. "Quibus datur misericordia, gratis datur: quibus non datur ex justitia non datur." (1 de Corrept.) How many has God sent to hell for the first offence? St. Gregory relates, that a child of five years, who had arrived at the use of reason, for having uttered a blasphemy, was seized by the devil and carried to hell. The divine mother revealed to that great servant of God, Benedicta of Florence, that a boy of twelve years was damned after the first sin. Another boy of eight years died after his first sin and was lost. You say; I am young: there are many who have committed more sins than I have. But is God on that account obliged to wait for your repentance if you offend him? In the gospel of St. Matthew (21:19) we read, that the Saviour cursed a fig tree the first time he saw it without fruit. "May no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And immediately the fig tree withered away." You must, then, tremble at the thought of committing a single mortal sin, particularly if you have already been guilty of mortal sins.

3. "Be not without fear about sins forgiven, and add not sin to sin." (Eccl. 5:5.) Say not then, O sinner: As God has forgiven me other sins, so he will pardon me this one if I commit it. Say not this; for, if to the sin which has been forgiven you add another, you have reason to fear that this new sin shall be united to your former guilt, and that thus the number will be completed, and that you shall be abandoned. Behold how the Scripture unfolds this truth more clearly in another place. "The Lord patiently expecteth, that when the day of judgment shall come, he may punish them in the fulness of sins." (2 Mac. 6:14.) God waits with patience until a certain number of sins is committed, but, when the measure of guilt is filled up, he waits no longer, but chastises the sinner. "Thou hast sealed up my offences as it were in a bag." (Job 14:17.) Sinners multiply their sins without keeping any account of them; but God numbers them that, when the harvest is ripe, that is, when the number of sins is completed, he may take vengeance on them. "Put ye in the sickles, for the harvest is ripe." (Joel 3:13.)

4. Of this there are many examples in the Scriptures. Speaking of the Hebrews, the Lord in one place says: "All the men that have tempted me now ten times . . . shall not see the land." (Num. 14:22, 23.) In another place he says, that he restrained his vengeance against the Amorrhites, because the number of their sins was not completed. "For as yet the iniquities of the Amorrhites are not at the full." (Gen. 15:16.) We have again the example of Saul, who, after having disobeyed God a second time, was abandoned. He entreated Samuel to interpose before the Lord in his behalf. "Bear, I beseech thee, my sin, and return with me, that I may adore the Lord." (1 Kings 15:25.) But, knowing that God had abandoned Saul, Samuel answered: "I will not return with thee, because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee," etc. (v. 26.) Saul, you have abandoned God, and he has abandoned you. We have another example in Balthassar, who, after having profaned the vessels of the temple, saw a hand writing on the wall, "Mane, Thecel, Phares." Daniel was requested to expound the meaning of these words. In explaining the word Thecel, he said to the king: "Thou art weighed in the balance, and art found wanting." (Dan. 5:27.) By this explanation he gave the king to understand that the weight of his sins in the balance of divine justice had made the scale descend. "The same night, Balthassar, the Chaldean king, was killed." (Dan. 5:30.) Oh! how many sinners have met with a similar fate! Continuing to offend God till their sins amounted to a certain number they have been struck dead and sent to hell. "They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment they go down to hell." (Job 21:13.) Tremble, brethren, lest, if you commit another mortal sin, God should cast you into hell.

5. If God chastised sinners the moment they insult him, we should not see him so much despised. But, because he does not instantly punish their transgressions, and because, through mercy, he restrains his anger and waits for their return, they are encouraged to continue to offend him. "For, because sentence is not speedily pronounced against the evil, the children of men commit evil without any fear." (Eccles. 8:11.) But it is necessary to be persuaded that, though God bears with us, he does not wait, nor bear with us for ever. Expecting, as on former occasions, to escape from the snares of the Philistines, Samson continued to allow himself to be deluded by Dalila. "I will go out as I did before, and shake myself." (Judges 16:20.) But "the Lord was departed from him." Samson was at length taken by his enemies, and lost his life. The Lord warns you not to say: I have committed so many sins, and God has not chastised me "Say not: I have sinned, and what harm hath befallen me? for the Most High is a patient rewarder." (Eccl. 5:4.) God has patience for a certain term, after which he punishes the first and last sins. And the greater has been his patience, the more severe his vengeance.

6. Hence, according to St. Chrysostom, God is more to be feared when he bears with sinners than when he instantly punishes their sins. "Plus timendum est, cum tolerat quam cum festinanter punit." And why? Because, says St. Gregory, they to whom God has shown most mercy, shall, if they do not cease to offend him, be chastised with the greatest rigour. "Quos diutius expectat durius damnat." The saint adds that God often punishes such sinners with a sudden death, and does not allow them time for repentance. "Sæpe qui diu tolerati sunt subita morte rapiuntur, ut nee flere ante mortem liceat." And the greater the light which God gives to certain sinners for their correction, the greater is their blindness and obstinacy in sin. "For it had been better for them not to have known the way of justice, than, after they had known it, to turn back." (2 Pet. 2:21.) Miserable the sinners who, after having been enlightened, return to the vomit. St Paul says, that it is morally impossible for them to be again converted. "For it is impossible for those who were once illuminated—have tasted also the heavenly gifts, . . . and are fallen away, to be renewed again to penance." (Heb. 6:4, 6.)

7. Listen, then, O sinner, to the admonition of the Lord: "My son, hast thou sinned? Do so no more, but for thy former sins pray that they may be forgiven thee." (Eccl. 21:1.) Son, add not sins to those which you have already committed, but be careful to pray for the pardon of your past trangressions; otherwise, if you commit another mortal sin, the gates of the divine mercy may be closed against you, and your soul may be lost for ever. When, then, beloved brethren, the devil tempts you again to yield to sin, say to yourself: If God pardons me no more, what shall become of me for all eternity? Should the Devil, in reply, say: "Fear not, God is merciful;" answer him by saying: What certainty or what probability have I, that, if I return again to sin, God will show me mercy or grant me pardon? Because the threat of the Lord against all who despise his calls: "Behold I have called and you refused . . . I also will laugh in your destruction, and will mock when that shall come to you which you feared." (Prov. 1:24, 26.) Mark the words I also; they mean that, as you have mocked the Lord by betraying him again after your confession and promises of amendment, so he will mock you at the hour of death. "I will laugh and will mock." But "God is not mocked." (Gal. 6:7.) "As a dog," says the Wise Man, "that returneth to his vomit, so is the fool that repeateth his folly." (Prov. 26:11.) B. Denis the Carthusian gives an excellent exposition of this text. He says that, as a dog that eats what he has just vomited, is an object of disgust and abomination, so the sinner who returns to the sins which he has detested and confessed, becomes hateful in the sight of God. "Sicut id quod per vomitum est rejectum, resumere est valide abominabile ac turpe sic peccata deleta reiterari."

8. O folly of sinners! If you purchase a house, you spare no pains to get all the securities necessary to guard against the loss of your money; if you take medicine, you are careful to assure yourself that it cannot injure you; if you pass over a river, you cautiously avoid all danger of falling into it; and for a transitory enjoyment, for the gratification of revenge, for a beastly pleasure, which lasts but a moment, you risk your eternal salvation, saying: "I will go to confession after I commit this sin." And when, I ask, are you to go to confession? You say: "On to-morro w." But who promises you to-morrow? Who assures you that you shall have time for confession, and that God will not deprive you of life, as he has deprived so many others, in the act of sin? "Diem tenes," says St. Augustine, "qui horam non tenes." You canno t be certain of living for another hour, and you say: "I will go to confession to-morrow." Listen to the words of St. Gregory: "He who has promised pardon to penitents, has not promised to-morrow to sinners." (Hom. xii. in Evan). God has promised pardon to all who repent; but he has not promised to wait till to-morrow for those who insult him. Perhaps God will give you time for repentance, perhaps he will not. But, should he not give it, what shall become of your soul? In the meantime, for the sake of a miserable pleasure, you lose the grace of God, and expose yourself to the danger of being lost for ever.

9. Would you, for such transient enjoyments, risk your money, your honour, your possessions, your liberty, and your life? No, you would not. How then does it happen that, for a miserable gratification, you lose your soul, heaven, and God? Tell me: do you believe that heaven, hell, eternity, are truths of faith? Do you believe that, if you die in sin, you are lost for ever? Oh! what temerity, what folly is it, to condemn yourself voluntarily to an eternity of torments with the hope of afterwards reversing the sentence of your condemnation! "Nemo," says St. Augustine, "sub spe salutis vult ægrotare." No one can be found so foolish as to take poison with the hope of preventing its deadly effects by adopting the ordinary remedies. And you will condemn yourself to hell, saying that you expect to be afterwards preserved from it. O folly! which, in conformity with the divine threats, has brought, and brings every day, so many to hell. "Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness, and evil shall come upon thee, and thou shalt not know the rising thereof." (Isa. 47:10, 11.) You have sinned, trusting rashly in the divine mercy: the punishment of your guilt shall fall suddenly u pon you, and you shall not know from whence it comes. What do you say? What resolution do you make? If, after this sermon, you do not firmly resolve to give yourself to God, I weep over you, and regard you as lost.

Sermon XVI

SECOND SUNDAY OF LENT

ON HEAVEN

"Lord, it is good for us to be here."—MATT. 17:4.

IN this day's gospel we read, that wishing to give his disciples a glimpse of the glory of Paradise, in order to animate them to labour for the divine honour, the Redeemer was transfigured, and allowed them to behold the splendour of his countenance. Ravished with joy and delight, St. Peter exclaimed: "Lord, it is good for us to be here." Lord, let us remain here; let us never more depart from this place; for, the sight of thy beauty consoles us more than all the delights of the earth. Brethren, let us labour during the remainder of our lives to gain heaven. Heaven is so great a good, that, to purchase it for us, Jesus Christ has sacrificed his life on the cross. Be assured, that the greatest of all the torments of the damned in hell, arise from the thought of having lost heaven through their own fault. The blessings, the delights, the joys, the sweetness of Paradise may be acquired; but they can be described and understood only by those blessed souls that enjoy them. But let us, with the aid of the holy Scripture, explain the little that can be said of them here below.

1. According to the Apostle, no man on this earth can comprehend the infinite blessings which God has prepared for the souls that love him. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love him." (1 Cor. 2:9.) In this life we cannot have an idea of any other pleasures than those which we enjoy by means of the senses. Perhaps we imagine that the beauty of heaven resembles that of a wide extended plain covered with the verdure of spring, interspersed with trees in full bloom, and abounding in birds fluttering about and singing on every side; or, that it is like the beauty of a garden full of fruits and flowers, and surrounded by fountains in continual play. "Oh! what a Paradise," to behold such a plain, or such a garden! But, oh! how much greater are the beauties of heaven! Speaking of Paradise, St. Bernard says: O man, if you wish to understand the blessings of heaven, know that in that happy country there is nothing which can be disagreeable, and everything that you can desire. "Nihil est quod nolis, totum est quod velis." Although there are some things here below which are agreeable to the senses, how many more are there which only torment us? If the light of day is pleasant, the darkness of night is disagreeable: if the spring and the autumn are cheering, the cold of winter and the heat of summer are painful. In addition, we have to endure the pains of sickness, the persecution of men, and the inconveniences of poverty; we must submit to interior troubles, to fears, to temptations of the devil, doubts of conscience, and to the uncertainty of eternal salvation.

2. But, after entering into Paradise, the blest shall have no more sorrows. "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." The Lord shall dry up the tears which they have shed in this life. "And death shall be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor sorrow, shall be any more, for the former things are passed away. And he that sat on the throne, said: "Behold, I make all things new." (Apoc. 21:4, 5.) In Paradise, death and the fear of death are no more: in that place of bliss there are no sorrows, no infirmities, no poverty, no inconveniencies, no vicissitudes of day or night, of cold or of heat. In that kingdom there is a continual day, always serene, a continual spring, always blooming. In Paradise there are no persecutions, no envy; for all love each other with tenderness, and each rejoices at the happiness of the others, as if it were his own. There is no more fear of eternal perdition; for the soul confirmed in grace can neither sin nor lose God.

3. "Totum est quod velis." In heaven you have all you can desire. "Behold, I make all things new." There everything is new; new beauties, new delights, new joys. There all our desires shall be satisfied. The sight shall be satiated with beholding the beauty of that city. How delightful to behold a city in which the streets should be of crystal, the houses of silver, the windows of gold, and all adorned with the most beautiful flowers. But, oh! how much more beautiful shall be the city of Paradise! the beauty of the place shall be heightened by the beauty of the inhabitants, who are all clothed in royal robes; for, according to St. Augustine, they are all kings. "Quot cives, tot reges." How delighted to behold Mary, the queen of heaven, who shall appear more beautiful than all the other citizens of Paradise! But, what it must be to behold the beauty of Jesus Christ! St. Teresa once saw one of the hands of Jesus Christ, and was struck with astonishment at the sight of such beauty. The smell shall be satiated with odours, but with the odours of Paradise. The hearing shall be satiated with the harmony of the celestial choirs. St. Francis once heard for a moment an angel playing on a violin, and he almost died through joy. How delightful must it be to hear the saints and angels singing the divine praises! "They shall praise thee for ever and ever." (Ps. 83:5.) What must it be to hear Mary praising God! St. Francis de Sales says, that, as the singing of the nightingale in the wood surpasses that of all other birds, so the voice of Mary is far superior to that of all the other saints. In a word, there are in Paradise all the delights which man can desire.

4. But the delights of which we have spoken are the least of the blessings of Paradise. The glory of heaven consists in seeing and loving God face to face. "Totum quod expectamus," says St. Augustine, "duæ syllabæ sunt, Deus." The reward which God promises to us does not consist altogether in the beauty, the harmony, and other advantages of the city of Paradise. God himself, whom the saints are allowed to behold, is, according to the promises made to Abraham, the principal reward of the just in heaven. "I am thy reward exceeding great." (Gen. 15:1.) St. Augustine asserts, that, were God to show his face to the damned, "Hell would be instantly changed into a Paradise of delights." (Lib. de trip. habit., tom. 9.) And he adds that, were a departed soul allowed the choice of seeing God and suffering the pains of hell, or of being freed from these pains and deprived of the sight of God, "she would prefer to see God, and to endure these torments."

5. The delights of the soul infinitely surpass all the pleasures of the senses. Even in this life divine love infuses such sweetness into the soul when God communicates himself to her, that the body is raised from the earth. St. Peter of Alcantara once fell into such an ecstacy of love, that, taking hold of a tree, he drew it up from the roots, and raised it with him on high. So great is the sweetness of divine love, that the holy martyrs, in the midst of their torments, felt no pain, but were on the contrary filled with joy. Hence, St. Augustine says that, when St. Lawrence was laid on a red-hot gridiron, the fervour of divine love made him insensible to the burning heat of the fire. "Hoc igne incensus non sentit incendium." Even on sinners who weep for their sins, God bestows consolations which exceed all earthly pleasures. Hence St. Bernard says: "If it be so sweet to weep for thee, what must it be to rejoice in thee!"

6. How great is the sweetness which a soul experiences, when, in the time of prayer, God, by a ray of his own light, shows to her his goodness and his mercies towards her, and particularly the love which Jesus Christ has borne to her in his passion! She feels her heart melting, and as it were dissolved through love. But in this life we do not see God as he really is: we see him as it were in the dark. "We see now through a glass in a dark manner, but then face to face." (1 Cor. 13:12.) Here below God is hidden from our view; we can see him only with the eyes of faith: how great shall be our happiness when the veil shall be raised, and we shall be permitted to behold God face to face! We shall then see his beauty, his greatness, his perfection, his amiableness, and his immense love for our souls.

7. "Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred." (Eccl. 9:1.) The fear of not loving God, and of not being loved by him, is the greatest affliction which souls that love God endure on the earth; but, in heaven, the soul is certain that she loves God, and that he loves her; she sees that the Lord embraces her with infinite love, and that this love shall not be dissolved for all eternity. The knowledge of the love which Jesus Christ has shown her in offering himself in sacrifice for her on the cross, and in making himself her food in the sacrament of the altar, shall increase the ardour of her love. She shall also see clearly all the graces which God has bestowed upon her, all the helps which he has given her, to preserve her from falling into sin, and to draw her to his love. She shall see that all the tribulations, the poverty, infirmities, and persecutions which she regards as misfortunes, have all proceeded from love, and have been the means employed by Divine Providence to bring her to glory. She shall see all the lights, loving calls, and mercies which God had granted to her, after she had insulted him by her sins. From the blessed mountain of Paradise she shall see so many souls damned for fewer sins than she had committed, and shall see that she herself is saved and secured against the possibility of ever losing God.

8. The goods of this earth do not satisfy our desires: at first they gratify the senses; but when we become accustomed to them they cease to delight. But the joys of Paradise constantly satiate and content the heart. "I shall be satisfied when thy glory shall appear." (Ps. 16:15.) And though they satiate they always appear to be as new as the first time when they were experienced; they are always enjoyed and always desired, always desired and always possessed. "Satiety," says St. Gregory, "accompanies desire." (Lib. 13, Mor., c. xviii.) Thus, the desires of the saints in Paradise do not beget pain, because they are always satisfied; and satiety does not produce disgust, because it is always accompanied with desire. Hence the soul shall be always satiated and always thirsty: she shall be for ever thirsty, and always satiated with delights. The damned are, according to the Apostle, vessels full of wrath and of torments, "vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction." (Rom. 9:22.) But the just are vessels full of mercy and of joy, so that they have nothing to desire. "They shall be inebriated with the plenty of thy house." (Ps. 35:9.) In beholding the beauty of God, the soul shall be so inflamed and so inebriated with divine love, that she shall remain happily lost in God; for she shall entirely forget herself, and for all eternity shall think only of loving and praising the immense good which she shall possess for ever, without the fear of having it in her power ever to lose it. In this life, holy souls love God; but they cannot love him with all their strength, nor can they always actually love him. St. Thomas teaches, that this perfect love is only given to the citizens of heaven, who love God with their whole heart, and never cease to love him actually. "Ut totum cor hominis semper actualiter in Deum feratur ista est perfectio patriæ." (2, 2 quæst. 44, art. 4, ad. 2.)

9. Justly, then, has St. Augustine said, that to gain the eternal glory of Paradise, we should cheerfully embrace eternal labour. "Pro æterna requie æternus labor subeundus esset." "For nothing," says David, "shalt thou save them." (Ps. 55:8.) The saints have done but little to acquire Heaven. So many kings, who have abdicated their thrones and shut themselves up in a cloister; so many holy anchorets, who have confined themselves in a cave; so many martyrs, who have cheerfully submitted to torments—to the rack, and to red-hot plates—have done but little. "The sufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared to the glory to come." (Rom. 8:18.) To gain heaven, it would be but little to endure all the pains of this life.

10. Let us, then, brethren, courageously resolve to bear patiently with all the sufferings which shall come upon us during the remaining days of our lives: to secure heaven they are all little and nothing. Rejoice then; for all these pains, sorrows, and persecutions shall, if we are saved, be to us a source of never-ending joys and delights. "Your sorrows shall be turned into joy." (John 16:20.) When, then, the crosses of this life afflict us, let us raise our eyes to heaven, and console ourselves with the hope of Paradise. At the end of her life, St. Mary of Egypt was asked, by the Abbot St. Zozimus, how she had been able to live for forty-seven years in the desert where he found her dying. She answered: "With the hope of Paradise." If we be animated with the same hope, we shall not feel the tribulations of this life. Have courage! Let us love God and labour for heaven. There the saint expects us, Mary expects us, Jesus Christ expects us; he holds in his hand a crown to make each of us a king in that eternal kingdom.

Sermon XVII

THIRD SUNDAY IN LENT

ON CONCEALING SINS IN CONFESSION

"And he was casting out a devil, and the same was dumb."—LUKE 11:14.

THE devil does not bring sinners to hell with their eyes open: he first blinds them with the malice of their own sins. "For their own malice blinded them." (Wis. 2:21.) He thus leads them to eternal perdition. Before we fall into sin, the enemy labours to blind us, that we may not see the evil we do and the ruin we bring upon ourselves by offending God. After we commit sin, he seeks to make us dumb, that, through shame, we may conceal our guilt in confession. Thus, he leads us to hell by a double chain, inducing us, after our transgressions, to consent to a still greater sin—the sin of sacrilege. I will speak on this subject to-day, and will endeavour to convince you of the great evil of concealing sins in confession

1. In expounding the words of David—"Set a door O Lord, round about my lips," (Ps. 140:3)—St. Augustine says: "Non dixit claustrum, sed ostium: ostium et aperitur et clauditur: aperiatur ad confessionem peccati: claudatur ad excusationem peccati." We should keep a door to the mouth, that it may be closed against detraction, and blasphemies, and all improper words, and that it may be opened to confess the sins we have committed. "Thus," adds the holy doctor, "it will be a door of restraint, and not of destruction." To be silent when we are impelled to utter words injurious to God or to our neighbour, is an act of virtue; but, to be silent in confessing our sins, is the ruin of the soul. After we have offended God, the devil labours to keep the mouth closed, and to prevent us from confessing our guilt. St. Antonine relates, that a holy solitary once saw the devil standing beside a certain person who wished to go to confession. The solitary asked the fiend what he was doing there. The enemy said in reply: "I now restore to these penitents what I before took away from them; I took away from them shame while they were committing sin; I now restore it that they may have a horror of confession." "My sores are putrefied and corrupted, because of my foolishness." (Ps. 37:6.) Gangrenous sores are fatal; and sins concealed in confession are spiritual ulcers, which mortify and become gangrenous.

2. "Pudorem," says St. Chrysostom, "dedit Deus peccato, confessioni fiduciam: invertit rem diabolis, peccato fiduciam præbet, confessioni pudorem." (Proem. in Isa.) God has made sin shameful, that we may abstain from it, and gives us confidence to confess it by promising pardon to all who accuse themselves of their sins. But the devil does the contrary: he gives confidence to sin by holding out hopes of pardon; but, when sin is committed, he inspires shame, to prevent the confession of it.

3. A disciple of Socrates, at the moment he was leaving a house of bad fame, saw his master pass: to avoid being seen by him, he went back into the house. Socrates came to the door and said: My son, it is a shameful thing to enter, but not to depart from this house. "Non te pudeat, fili egredi ex hoc loco, intrasse pudeat." To you also, O brethren, who have sinned, I say, that you ought to be ashamed to offend so great and so good a God. But you have no reason to be ashamed of confessing the sins which you have committed. "Was it shameful in St. Mary Magdalene to acknowledge publicly at the feet of Jesus Christ that she was a sinner? By her confession she became a saint. Was it shameful in St. Augustine not only to confess his sins, but also to publish them in a book, that, for his confusion, they might be known to the whole world? Was it shameful in St. Mary of Egypt to confess, that for so many years she had led a scandalous life? By their confessions these have become saints, and are honoured on the altars of the Church.

4. We say that the man who acknowledges his guilt before a secular tribunal is condemned, but in the tribunal of Jesus Christ, they who confess their sins obtain pardon, and receive a crown of eternal glory. "After confession," says St. Chrysostom, "a crown is given to penitents." He who is afflicted with an ulcer must, if he wish to be cured, show it to a physician: otherwise it will fester and bring on death. "Quod ignorat," says the Council of Trent, "medicina non curat." If, then, brethren, your souls be ulcerated with sin, be not ashamed to confess it; otherwise you are lost. "For thy soul be not ashamed to say the truth." (Eccl. 4:24.) But, you say, I feel greatly ashamed to confess such a sin. If you wish to be saved, you must conquer this shame. "For there is a shame that bringeth sin, and there is a shame that bringeth glory and grace." (Ib. 4:25.) There are, according to the inspired writer, two kinds of shame: one of which leads souls to sin, and that is the shame which makes them conceal their sins at confession; the other is the confusion which a Christian feels in confessing his sins; and this confusion obtains for him the grace of God in this life, and the glory of heaven in the next.

5. St. Augustine says, that to prevent the sheep from seeking assistance by her cries the wolf seizes her by the neck, and thus securely carries her away and devours her. The devil acts in a similar manner with the sheep of Jesus Christ. After having induced them to yield to sin, he seizes them by the throat, that they may not confess their guilt; and thus he securely brings them to hell. For those who have sinned grievously, there is no means of salvation but the confession of their sins. But, what hope of salvation can he have who goes to confession and conceals his sins, and makes use of the tribunal of penance to offend God, and to make himself doubly the slave of Satan? What hope would you entertain of the recovery of the man who, instead of taking the medicine prescribed by his physician, drank a cup of poison? O God! What can the sacrament of penance be to those who conceal their sins, but a deadly poison, which adds to their guilt the malice of sacrilege? In giving absolution, the confessor dispenses to his patient the blood of Jesus Christ; for it is through the merits of that blood that he absolves from sin. What, then, does the sinner do, when he conceals his sins in confession? He tramples under foot the blood of Jesus Christ. And should he afterwards receive the holy communion in a state of sin, he is, according to St. Chrysostom, as guilty as if he threw the consecrated host into a sink. "Non minus detestabile est in os pollutum, quam in sterquilinum mittere Dei Filium." (Hom. lxxxiii., in Matt.) Accursed shame! how many poor souls do you bring to hell? "Magis memores pudoris," says Tertullian, "quam salutis." Unhappy souls! they think only of the shame of confessing their sins, and do not reflect that, if they conceal them, they shall be certainly damned.

6. Some penitents ask: "What will my confessor say when he hears that I have committed such a sin?" What will he say? He will say that you are, like all persons living on this earth, miserable and prone to sin: he will say that, if you have done evil, you have also performed a glorious action in overcoming shame, and in candidly confessing your fault.

7. "But I am afraid to confess this sin." To how many confessors, I ask, must you tell it? It is enough to mention it to one priest, who hears many sins of the same kind from others. It is enough to confess it once: the confessor will give you penance and absolution, and your conscience shall be tranquillized. But, you say: "I feel a great repugnance to tell this sin to my spiritual father." Tell it, then, to another confessor, and, if you wish, to one to whom you are unknown. "But, if this come to the knowledge of my confessor, he will be displeased with me." What then do you mean to do? Perhaps, to avoid giving displeasure to him, you intend to commit a heinous crime, and remain under sentence of damnation. This would be the very height of folly.

8. Are you afraid that the confessor will make known your sin to others? Would it not be madness to suspect that he is so wicked as to break the seal of confession by revealing your sin to others? Remember that the obligation of the seal of confession is so strict, that a confessor cannot speak out of confession, even to the penitent, of the smallest venial fault; and if he did so,[14125]

9. But you say: "I am afraid that my confessor, when he hears my sin, will rebuke me with great severity." O God! Do you not see that all these are deceitful artifices of the devil to bring you to hell? No; the confessor will not rebuke you, but he will give an advice suited to your state. A confessor cannot experience greater consolation than in absolving a penitent who confesses his sins with true sorrow and with sincerity. If a queen were mortally wounded by a slave, and you were in possession of a remedy by which she could be cured, how great would be your joy in saving her life! Such is the joy which a confessor feels in absolving a soul in the state of sin. By his act he delivers her from eternal death: and by restoring to her the grace of God, he makes her a queen of Paradise.

10. But you have so many fears, and are not afraid of damning your own soul by the enormous crime of concealing sins in confession. You are afraid of the rebuke of your confessor, and fear not the reproof which you shall receive from Jesus Christ, your Judge, at the hour of death. You are afraid that your sins shall become known (which is impossible), and you dread not the day of judgment, on which, if you conceal them, they shall be revealed to all men. If you knew that, by concealing sins in confession, they shall be made known to all your relatives and to all your neighbours, you would certainly confess them. But, do you not know, says St. Bernard, that if you refuse to confess your sins to one man, who, like yourself, is a sinner, they shall be made known not only to all your relatives and neighbours, but to the entire human race? "Si pudor est tibi uni homini, et peccatori peccatum exponere, quid faturus es in die judicii, ubi omnibus exposita tua consciențtia patebit?" (S. Ber. super illud Joan., cap. xi.) "Lazare veni foras." If you do not confess your sin, God himself shall, for your confusion, publish not only the sin which you conceal, but also all your iniquities, in the presence of the angels and of the whole world. "I will discover thy shame to thy face, and will show thy wickedness to the nations." (Nah. 3:5.)

11. Listen, then, to the advice of St. Ambrose. The devil keeps an account of your sins, to charge you with them at the tribunal of Jesus Christ. Do you wish, says the saint, to prevent this accusation? Anticipate your accuser: accuse yourself now to a confessor, and then no accuser shall appear against you at the judgment-seat of God. "Præveni accusatorem tuum; si to accusaveris, accusatorem nullum timebis." (Lib. 2 de Pænit., cap. ii.) But, according to St. Augustine, if you excuse yourself in confession, you shut up sin within your soul, and shut out pardon. "Excusas te, includis peccatum, excludis indulgentiam." (Hom. xii. 50.)

12. If, then, brethren, there be a single soul among you who has ever concealed a sin, through shame, in the tribunal of penance, let him take courage, and make a full confession of all his faults. "Give glory to God with a good heart." (Eccl. 35:10.) Give glory to God, and confusion to the devil. A certain penitent was tempted by Satan to conceal a sin through shame; but she was resolved to confess it; and while she was going to her confessor, the devil came forward and asked her where she was going. She courageously answered: "I am going to cover myself and you with confusion." Act you in a similar manner; if you have ever concealed a mortal sin, confess it candidly to your director, and confound the devil. Remember that the greater the violence you do yourself in confessing your sins, the greater will be the love with which Jesus Christ will embrace you.

13. Courage, then! expel this viper which you harbour in your soul, and which continually corrodes your heart and destroys your peace. Oh! what a hell does a Christian suffer who keeps in his heart a sin concealed through shame in confession! He suffers an anticipation of hell. It is enough to say to the confessor: "Father, I have a certain scruple regarding my past life, but I am ashamed to tell it." This will be enough: the confessor will help to pluck out the serpent which gnaws your conscience. And, that you may not entertain groundless scruples, I think it right to tell you, that if the sin which you are ashamed to tell be not mortal, or if you never considered it to be a mortal sin, you are not obliged to confess it; for we are bound only to confess mortal sins. Moreover, if you have doubts whether you ever confessed a certain sin of your former life, but know that, in preparing for confession, you always carefully examined your conscience, and that you never concealed a sin through shame; in this case, even though the sin, about the confession of which you are doubtful, had been a grievous fault, you are not obliged to confess it; because it is presumed to be morally certain that you have already confessed it. But, if you know that the sin was grievous, and that you never accused yourself of it in confession, then there is no remedy; you must confess it, or you must be damned for it. But, O lost sheep, go instantly to confession. Jesus Christ is waiting for you; he stands with arms open to pardon and embrace you, if you acknowledge your guilt. I assure you that, after having confessed all your sins, you shall feel such consolation at having unburdened your conscience and acquired the grace of God, that you shall for ever bless the day on which you made this confession. Go as soon as possible in search of a confessor. Do not give the devil time to continue to tempt you, and to make you put off your confession: go immediately; for Jesus Christ is waiting for you.

Sermon XVIII

FOURTH SUNDAY OF LENT

ON THE TENDER COMPASSION WHICH JESUS CHRIST ENTERTAINS TOWARDS SINNERS

"Make the men sit down."—JOHN 6:10.

WE read in this day's gospel that, having gone up into a mountain with his disciples, and seeing a multitude of five thousand persons, who followed him because they saw the miracles which he wrought on them that were diseased, the Redeemer said to St. Philip: "Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?" "Lord," answered St. Philip, "two-hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient that every one may take a little." St. Andrew then said: There is a boy here that has five barley loaves and two fishes; but what are these among so many? But Jesus Christ said: "Make the men sit down." And he distributed the loaves and fishes among them. The multitude were satisfied: and the fragments of bread which remained filled twelve baskets. The Lord wrought this miracle through compassion for the bodily wants of these poor people; but far more tender is his compassion for the necessities of the souls of the poor—that is, of sinners who are deprived of the divine grace. This tender compassion of Jesus Christ for sinners shall be the subject of this day's discourse.

1. Through the bowels of his mercy towards men, who groaned under the slavery of sin and Satan, our most loving Redeemer descended from heaven to earth, to redeem and save them from eternal torments by his own death. Such was the language of St. Zachary, the father of the Baptist, when the Blessed Virgin, who had already become the mother of the Eternal Word, entered his house. "Through the bowels of the mercy of our God, in which the Orient from on high hath visited us." (Luke 1:78.)

2. Jesus Christ, the good pastor, who came into the world to obtain salvation for us his sheep, has said: "I am come that they may have life, and may have it more abundantly." (John 10:10.) Mark the expression, "more abundantly," which signifies that the Son of Man came on earth not only to restore us to the life of grace which we lost, but to give us a better life than that which we forfeited by sin. Yes; for as St. Leo says, the benefits which we have derived from the death of Jesus are greater than the injury which the devil has done us by sin. "Ampliora adepti sumus per Christi gratiam quam per diaboli amiseramus invidiam." (Ser. i., de Ascen.) The same doctrine is taught by the Apostle, who says that, "where sin abounded, grace did more abound." (Rom. 5:20.)

3. But, my Lord, since thou hast resolved to take human flesh, would not a single prayer offered by thee be sufficient for the redemption of all men? What need, then, was there of leading a life of poverty, humiliation, and contempt, for thirty-three years, of suffering a cruel and shameful death on an infamous gibbet, and of shedding all thy blood by dint of torments? I know well, answers Jesus Christ, that one drop of my blood, or a simple prayer, would be sufficient for the salvation of the world; but neither would be sufficient to show the love which I bear to men: and therefore, to be loved by men when they should see me dead on the cross for the love of them, I have resolved to submit to so many torments and to so painful a death. This, he says, is the duty of a good pastor. "I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd giveth his life for his sheep . . . I lay down my life for my sheep." (John 10:11, 15.)

4. O men, O men, what greater proof of love could the Son of God give us than to lay down his life for us his sheep? "In this we have known the charity of God; because he hath laid down his life for us." (1 John 3:16.) No one, says the Saviour, can show greater love to his friends than to give his life for them. "Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends." (John 15:13.) But thou, O Lord, hast died not only for friends, but for us who were thy enemies by sin. "When we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." (Rom. 5:10.) O infinite love of our God, exclaims St. Bernard; "to spare slaves, neither the Father has spared the Son, nor the Son himself." To pardon us, who were rebellious servants, the Father would not pardon the Son, and the Son would not pardon himself, but, by his death, has satisfied the divine justice for the sins which we have committed.

5. When Jesus Christ was near his passion he went one day to Samaria: the Samaritans refused to receive him. Indignant at the insult offered by the Samaritans to their Master, St. James and St. John, turning to Jesus, said: "Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them?" (Luke 9:54.) But Jesus, who was all sweetness, even to those who insulted him, answered: "You know not of what spirit you are. The Son of Man came not to destroy souls, but to save." (v. 55 and 56.) He severely rebuked the disciples. What spirit is this, he said, which possesses you? It is not my spirit: mine is the spirit of patience and compassion; for I am come, not to destroy, but to save the souls of men: and you speak of fire, of punishment, and of vengeance. Hence, in another place, he said to his disciples: "Learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart." (Matt. 11:29.) I do not wish of you to learn of me to chastise, but to be meek, and to bear and pardon injuries.

6. How beautiful has he described the tenderness of his heart towards sinners in the following words: "What man of you that hath an hundred sheep: and, if he lose one of them, doth he not leave ninety-nine in the desert, and go after that which is lost until he find it: and when he hath found it, lay it upon his shoulder rejoicing; and coming home, call together his friends and neighbours, saying to them: Rejoice with me, because I have found my sheep that was lost?" (Luke 15:4, 5, and 6.) But, O Lord, it is not thou that oughtest to rejoice, but the sheep that has found her pastor and her God. The sheep indeed, answers Jesus, rejoices at finding me, her shepherd; but far greater is the joy which I feel at having found one of my lost sheep. He concludes the parable in these words:—"I say to you, that even so there shall be joy in heaven for one sinner that doth penance, more than upon ninety-nine just, who need not penance." (Luke 15:7.) There is more joy in heaven at the conversion of one sinner, than upon ninety-nine just men who preserve their innocence. What sinner, then, can be so hardened as not to go instantly and cast himself at the feet of his Saviour, when he knows the tender love with which Jesus Christ is prepared to embrace him, and carry him on his shoulders, as soon as he repents of his sins?

7. The Lord has also declared his tenderness towards penitent sinners in the parable of the Prodigal Child. (Luke 15:12, etc.) In that parable the Son of God says, that a certain young man, unwilling to be any longer under the control of his father, and desiring to live according to his caprice and corrupt inclinations, asked the portion of his father's substance which fell to him. The father gave it with sorrow, weeping over the ruin of his son. The son departed from his father's house. Having in a short time dissipated his substance, he was reduced to such a degree of misery that, to procure the necessaries of life, he was obliged to feed swine. All this was a figure of a sinner, who, after departing from God, and losing the divine grace and all the merits he had acquired, leads a life of misery under the slavery of the devil. In the gospel it is added that the young man, seeing his wretched condition, resolved to return to his father: and the father, who is a figure of Jesus Christ, seeing his son return to him, was instantly moved to pity. "His father saw him, and was moved with compassion" (v. 20); and, instead of driving him away, as the ungrateful son had deserved, "running to him, he fell upon his neck and kissed him." He ran with open arms to meet him, and, through tenderness, fell upon his neck, and consoled him by his embraces. He then said to his servants: "Bring forth quickly the first robe, and put it on him." According to St. Jerome and St. Augustine, the first robe signifies the divine grace, which, in addition to new celestial gifts, God, by granting pardon, gives to the penitent sinner. "And put a ring on his finger." Give him the ring of a spouse. By recovering the grace of God, the soul becomes again the spouse of Jesus Christ. "And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat and make merry" (v. 23). Bring hither the fatted calf—which signifies the holy communion, or Jesus in the holy sacrament mystically killed and offered in sacrifice on the altar; let us eat and rejoice. But why, O divine Father, so much joy at the return of so ungrateful a child? Because, answered the Father, this my son was dead, and he is come to life again; he was lost, and I have found him.

8. This tenderness of Jesus Christ was experienced by the sinful woman (according to St. Gregory, Mary Magdalene) who cast herself at the feet of Jesus, and washed them with her tears. (Luke 7:47 and 50.) The Lord, turning to her with sweetness, consoled her by saying: "Thy sins are forgiven; . . . thy faith hath made thee safe; go in peace." (Luke 7:48 and 50.) Child, thy sins are pardoned; thy confidence in me has saved thee; go in peace. It was also felt by the man who was sick for thirty-eight years, and who was infirm both in body and soul. The Lord cured his malady, and pardoned his sins. "Behold," says Jesus to him, "thou art made whole; sin no more, lest some worse thing happen to thee." (John 5:14.) The tenderness of the Redeemer was also felt by the leper who said to Jesus Christ: "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." (Matt. 8:2.) Jesus answered: "I will: be thou made clean" (v. 3). As if he said: Yes; I will that thou be made clean; for I have come down from heaven for the purpose of consoling all: be healed, then, according to thy desire. "And forthwith his leprosy was cleansed."

9. We have also a proof of the tender compassion of the Son of God for sinners, in his conduct towards the woman caught in adultery. The scribes and pharisees brought her before him, and said: "This woman was even now taken in adultery. Now Moses, in the law, commands us to stone such a one. But what sayest thou?" (John 8:4 and 5.) And this they did, as St. John says, tempting him. They intended to accuse him of transgressing the law of Moses, if he said that she ought to be liberated; and they expected to destroy his character for meekness, if he said that she should be stoned. "Si dicat lapidandam," says St. Augustine, "famam perdet mansuetudinis; sin dimmittendam, transgressæ legis accusabitur." (Tract. xxxiii. in Joan.) But what was the answer of our Lord? He neither said that she should be stoned nor dismissed; but, "bowing himself down, he wrote with his finger on the ground." The interpreters say that, probably, what he wrote on the ground was a text of Scripture admonishing the accusers of their own sins, which were, perhaps, greater than that of the woman charged with adultery. "He then lifted himself up, and said to them: 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her' " (v. 7). The scribes and pharisees went away one by one, and the woman stood alone. Jesus Christ, turning to her, said: "Hath no one condemned thee? neither will I condemn thee. Go, and now sin no more" (v. 11). Since no one has condemned you, fear not that you shall be condemned by me, who hath come on earth, not to condemn, but to pardon and save sinners: go in peace, and sin no more.

10. Jesus Christ has come, not to condemn, but to deliver sinners from hell, as soon as they resolve to amend their lives. And when he sees them obstinately bent on their own perdition, he addresses them with tears in the words of Ezechiel: "Why will you die, O house of Israel?" (18:31). My children, why will you die? Why do you voluntarily rush into hell, when I have come from heaven to deliver you from it by death? He adds: you are already dead to the grace of God. But I will not your death: return to me, and I will restore to you the life which you have lost. "For I desire not the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: return ye and live" (v. 32). But some sinners, who are immersed in the abyss of sin, may say: Perhaps, if we return to Jesus Christ, he will drive us away. No; for the Redeemer has said: "And him that cometh to me I will not cast out." (John 6:37.) No one that comes to me with sorrow for his past sins, however manifold and enormous they may have been, shall be rejected.

11. Behold how, in another place, the Redeemer encourages us to throw ourselves at his feet with a secure hope of consolation and pardon. "Come to me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you." (Matt. 11:28.) Come to me, all ye poor sinners, who labour for your own damnation, and groan under the weight of your crimes; come, and I will deliver you from all your troubles. Again, he says, "Come and accuse me, saith the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow; and if they be red as crimson, they shall be made white as wool." (Isa. 1:18.) Come with sorrow for the offences you committed against me, and if I do not give you pardon, accuse me. As if he said: upbraid me; rebuke me as a liar; for I promise that, though your sins were of scarlet—that is, of the most horrid enormity—your soul, by my blood, in which I shall wash it, will become white and beautiful as snow.

12. Let us then, O sinners, return instantly to Jesus Christ. If we have left him, let us immediately return, before death overtakes us in sin and sends us to hell, where the mercies and graces of the Lord shall, if we do not amend, be so many swords which shall lacerate the heart for all eternity.

Sermon XIX

PASSION SUNDAY

ON THE DANGER TO WHICH TEPIDITY EXPOSES THE SOUL

"But Jesus hid himself."—JOHN 8:59.

JESUS CHRIST "is the true light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world." (John 1:9.) He enlightens all; but he cannot enlighten those who voluntarily shut their eyes to the light; from them the Saviour hides himself. How then can they, walking in darkness, escape the many dangers of perdition to which we are exposed in this life, which God has given us as the road to eternal happiness? I will endeavour to-day to convince you of the great danger into which tepidity brings the soul, since it makes Jesus Christ hide his divine light from her, and makes him less liberal in bestowing upon her the graces and helps, without which she shall find it very difficult to complete the journey of this life without falling into an abyss—that is, into mortal sin.

1. A tepid soul is not one that lives in enmity with God, nor one that sometimes commits venial sins through mere frailty, and not with full deliberation. On account of the corruption of nature by original sin, no man can be exempt from such venial faults. This corruption of nature renders it impossible for us, without a most special grace, which has been given only to the mother of God, to avoid all venial sins during our whole lives. Hence St. John has said: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." (1 John 1:8.) God permits defects of this kind, even in the saints, to keep them humble, and to make them feel that, as they commit such faults in spite of all their good purposes and promises, so also, were they not supported by his divine hand, they would fall into mortal sins. Hence, when we find that we have committed these light faults, we must humble ourselves, and acknowledging our own weakness, we must be careful to recommend ourselves to God, and implore of him to preserve us, by his almighty hand, from more grievous transgressions, and to deliver us from those we have committed.

2. What then are we to understand by a tepid soul? A tepid soul is one that frequently falls into fully deliberate venial sins—such as deliberate lies, deliberate acts of impatience, deliberate imprecations, and the like. These faults may be easily avoided by those who are resolved to suffer death rather than commit a deliberate venial offence against God. St. Teresa used to say, that one venial sin does us more harm than all the devils in hell. Hence she would say to her nuns: "My children, from deliberate sin, however venial it may be, may the Lord deliver you." Some complain of being left in aridity and dryness, and without any spiritual sweetness. But how can we expect that God will be liberal of his favours to us, when we are ungenerous to him? We know that such a lie, such an imprecation, such an injury to our neighbour, and such detraction, though not mortal sins, are displeasing to God, and still we do not abstain from them. Why then should we expect that God will give us his divine consolations?

3. But some of you will say: Venial sins, however great they may be, do not deprive the soul of the grace of God: even though I commit them I will be saved; and for me it is enough to obtain eternal life. You say that, "for you it is enough to be saved." Remember that St. Augustine says that, "where you have said, 'It is enough,' there you have perished." To understand correctly the meaning of these words of St. Augustine, and to see the danger to which the state of tepidity exposes those who commit habitual and deliberate venial sins, without feeling remorse for them, and without endeavouring to avoid them, it is necessary to know that the habit of light faults leads the soul insensibly to mortal sins. For example: the habit of venial acts of aversion leads to mortal hatred; the habit of small thefts leads to grievous rapine; the habit of venial attachments leads to affections which are mortally sinful. "The soul," says St. Gregory, "never lies where it falls." (Moral., lib. xxxi.) No; it continues to sink still deeper. Mortal diseases do not generally proceed from serious indisposition, but from many slight and continued infirmities; so, likewise, the fall of many souls into mortal sin follows from habitual venial sins; for these render the soul so weak that, when a strong temptation assails her, she has not strength to resist it, and she falls.

4. Many are unwilling to be separated from God by mortal sins; they wish to follow him, but at a distance, and regardless of venial sins. But to them shall probably happen what befel St. Peter. When Jesus Christ was seized in the garden, St. Peter was unwilling to abandon the Lord, but "followed him afar off." (Matt. 26:58.) After entering the house of Caiphas, he was charged with being a disciple of Jesus Christ. He was instantly seized with fear, and three times denied his Master. The Holy Ghost says: "He that contemneth small things shall fall by little and little." (Eccl. 19:1.) They who despise small falls will probably one day fall into an abyss; for, being in the habit of committing light offences against God, they will feel but little repugnance to offer to him some grievous insult.

5. The Lord says: "Catch us the little foxes that destroy the vines." (Cant. 2:15.) He does not tell us to catch the lions or the bears, but the little foxes. Lions and bears strike terror, and therefore all are careful to keep at a distance through fear of being devoured by them; but the little foxes, though they do not excite dismay, destroy the vine by drying up its roots. Mortal sin terrifies the timorous soul; but, if she accustom herself to the commission of many venial sins with full deliberation, and without endeavouring to correct them, they, like the little foxes, shall destroy the roots—that is, the remorse of conscience, the fear of offending God, and the holy desires of advancing in divine love; and thus, being in a state of tepidity, and impelled to sin by some passion, the soul will easily abandon God and lose the divine grace.

6. Moreover, deliberate and habitual venial sins not only deprive us of strength to resist temptations, but also of the special helps without which we fall into grievous sins, Be attentive, brethren; for this is a point of great importance. It is certain, that of ourselves we have not sufficient strength to resist the temptations of the devil, of the flesh, and of the world. It is God that prevents our enemies from assailing us with temptations by which we would be conquered. Hence Jesus Christ has taught us the following prayer: "And lead us not into temptation." He teaches us to pray that God may deliver us from the temptations to which we would yield, and thus lose his grace. Now, venial sins, when they are deliberate and habitual, deprive us of the special helps of God which are necessary for preservation in his grace. I say necessary, because the Council of Trent anathematizes those who assert that we can persevere in grace without a special help from God. "Si quis dixerit, justificatum vel sine speciali auxilio Dei in accepta justitia perseverare posse, vel cum eo non posse; anathema sit." (Sess. 6, can. xxii.) Thus, with the ordinary assistance of God, we cannot avoid falling into some mortal sin: a special aid is necessary. But this special aid God will justly withhold from tepid souls who are regardless of committing, with full deliberation, many venial sins. Thus these unhappy souls shall not persevere in grace.

7. They who are ungenerous to God well deserve that God should not be liberal to them. "He who soweth sparingly, shall also reap sparingly." (2 Cor. 9:6.) To such souls the Lord will give the graces common to all, but will probably withhold his special assistance; and without this, as we have seen, they cannot persevere without falling into mortal sin. God himself revealed to B. Henry Suson, that, for tepid souls who are content with leading a life exempt from mortal sin, and continue to commit many deliberate venial sins, it is very difficult to preserve themselves in the state of grace. The venerable Lewis da Ponte used to say: "I commit many defects, but I never make peace with them." Woe to him who is at peace with his faults! St. Bernard teaches that, as long as a person who is guilty of defects detests his faults, there is reason to hope that he will one day correct them and amend his life: but when he commits faults without endeavouring to amend, he will continually go from bad to worse, till he loses the grace of God. St. Augustine says that, like a certain disease of the skin which makes the body an object of disgust, habitual faults, when committed without any effort of amendment, render the soul so disgusting to God, that he deprives her of his embraces. "Sunt velut scabies, et nostrum decus ita exterminant ut a sponsi amplexibus separent." (Hom. 1., cap. iii.) Hence the soul, finding no more nourishment and consolation in her devout exercises, in her prayers, communions, or visits to the blessed sacrament, will soon neglect them, and thus neglecting the means of eternal salvation, she shall be in great danger of being lost.

8. This danger will be still greater for those who commit many venial sins through attachment to any passion, such as pride, ambition, aversion to a neighbour, or an inordinate affection for any person. St. Francis of Assisium says that, in endeavouring to draw to sin a soul that is afraid of being in enmity with God, the devil does not seek in the beginning to bind her with the chain of a slave, by tempting her to commit mortal sin, because she would have a horror of yielding to mortal sin, and would guard herself against it. He first endeavours to bind her by a single hair; then by a slender thread; next by a cord; afterwards by a rope; and in the end by a chain of hell—that is, by mortal sin; and thus he makes her his slave. For example: A person cherishes an affection for a female through a motive of courtesy or of gratitude, or from an esteem for her good qualities. This affection is followed by mutual presents; to these succeed words of tenderness; and after the first violent assault of the devil, the miserable man shall find that he has fallen into mortal sin. He meets with the fate of gamesters, who, after frequently losing large sums of money, yield to an impulse of passion, risk their all, and, in the end, lose their entire property.

9. Miserable the soul that allows herself to be the slave of any passion. "Behold, how small a fire what a great wood it kindleth." (St. James 3:5.) A small spark, if it be not extinguished, will set fire to an entire wood; that is, an unmortified passion shall bring the soul to ruin. Passion blinds us; and the blind often fall into an abyss when they least expect it. According to St. Ambrose, the devil is constantly endeavouring to find out the passion which rules in our heart, and the pleasures which have the greatest attraction for us. When he discovers them, he presents occasions of indulging them: he then excites concupiscence, and prepares a chain to make us the slaves of hell. "Tune maxime insidiatur adversarius quando videt in nobis passiones aliquas generari: tunc fomites movet, laqueos parat."

10. St. Chrysostom asserts, that he himself knew many persons who were gifted with great virtues, and who, because they disregarded light faults, fell into an abyss of crime. When the devil cannot gain much from us, he is in the beginning content with the little; by many trifling victories he will make a great conquest. No one, says St. Bernard, suddenly falls from the state of grace into the abyss of wickedness. They who rush into the most grievous irregularities, begin by committing light faults. "Nemo repente fit turpissimus: a minimis incipiunt qui in maxima proruunt." (Tract de Ord. vitæ.) It is necessary also to understand that, when a soul that has been favoured by God with special lights and graces, consents to mortal sin, her fall shall not be a simple fall, from which she will easily rise again, but it will be a precipitous one, from which she will find it very difficult to return to God.

11. Addressing a person in the state of tepidity, our Lord said: "I would that thou wert cold or hot; but because thou art luke-warm, and neither hot nor cold, I will begin to vomit thee out of my mouth." (Apoc. 3:15, 16.) "I would thou wert cold"—that is, it would be better for thee to be deprived of my grace, because there should then be greater hopes of thy amendment; but, because thou livest in tepidity, without any desire of improvement, "I will begin to vomit thee out of my mouth." By these words he means, that he will begin to abandon the soul; for, what is vomited, is taken back only with great horror.

12. A certain author says, that tepidity is a hectic fever, which does not excite alarm, because it is not perceived; but it is, at the same time, so malignant that it is rarely cured. The comparison is very just; for tepidity makes the soul insensible to remorses of conscience; and, as she is accustomed to feel no remorse for venial faults, she will by degrees become insensible to the stings of remorse which arise from mortal sins.

13. Let us come to the remedy. The amendment of a tepid soul is difficult; but there are remedies for those who wish to adopt them. First, the tepid must sincerely desire to be delivered from a state which, as we have seen, is so miserable and dangerous; for, without this desire, they shall not take pains to employ the proper means. Secondly, they must resolve to remove the occasions of their faults; otherwise they will always relapse into the same defects. Thirdly, they must earnestly beg of the Lord to raise them from so wretched a state. By their own strength they can do nothing; but they can do all things with the assistance of God, who has promised to hear the prayers of all. "Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and you shall find." (Luke 11:9.) We must pray, and continue to pray without interruption. If we cease to pray we shall be defeated; but if we persevere in prayer we shall conquer.

Sermon XX

PALM SUNDAY

ON THE EVIL EFFECTS OF BAD HABITS

"Go ye into the village that is over against you, and immediately you shall find an ass tied."—MATT. 21:2.

WISHING to enter Jerusalem, to be there acknowledged as the promised Messiah sent by God for the salvation of the world, the Saviour said to his disciples: "Go to a certain village, and you will find an ass tied, and a colt with her; loose them, and bring them to me." "The ass which was tied," says St. Bonaventure, "denotes a sinner." This exposition is conformable to the doctrine of the Wise Man, who says, that the wicked are bound by the chains of their own sins. "His own iniquities catch the wicked, and he is fast bound with the rope of his own sins." (Prov. 5:22.) But, as Jesus Christ could not sit on the ass before she was loosed, so he cannot dwell in a soul bound with her own iniquities. If, then, brethren, there be among you a soul bound by any bad habit, let her attend to the admonition which the Lord addresses to her this morning. "Loose the bond from off thy neck, O captive daughter of Sion." (Isa. 52:2.) Loose the bonds of your sins, which make you the slave of Satan. Loose the bonds before the habit of sin gains such power over you, as to render your conversion morally impossible, and thus to bring you to eternal perdition. This morning I will show, in three points, the evil effects of bad habits.

FIRST POINT. A BAD HABIT BLINDS THE UNDERSTANDING.

Second Point.—It hardens the heart.

Third Point.—It diminishes our strength.

First Point.—A bad habit blinds the understanding.

1. Of those who live in the habit of sin, St. Augustine says: "Ipsa consuetudo non sinit videre malum, quod faciunt." The habit of sin blinds sinners, so that they no longer see the evil which they do, nor the ruin which they bring upon themselves; hence they live in blindness, as if there was neither God, nor heaven, nor hell, nor eternity. "Sins," adds the saint, "however enormous, when habitual, appear to be small, or not to be sins at all." How then can the soul guard against them, when she is no longer sensible of their deformity, or the evil which they bring upon her?

2. St. Jerome says, that habitual sinners "are not even ashamed of their crimes." Bad actions naturally produce a certain shame; but this feeling is destroyed by the habit of sin. St. Peter compares habitual sinners to swine wallowing in mire. "The sow that was washed is returned to her wallowing in the mire." (2 Pet. 2:22.) The very mire of sin blinds them; and, therefore, instead of feeling sorrow and shame at their uncleanness, they revel and exult in it. "A fool worketh mischief as it were for sport." (Prov. 10:23.) "Who are glad when they have done evil." (Prov. 2:14.) Hence the saints continually seek light from God; for they know that, should he withdraw his light, they may become the greatest of sinners. How, then, do so many Christians, who know by faith that there is a hell, and a just God, who cannot but chastise the wicked, how, I say, do they continue to live in sin till death, and thus bring themselves to perdition? "Their own malice blinded them." (Wis. 2:21.) Sin blinds them, and thus they are lost.

3. Job says, that habitual sinners are full of iniquities. "His bones shall be filled with the vices of his youth." (20:11.) Every sin produces darkness in the understanding. Hence, the more sins are multiplied by a bad habit, the greater the blindness they cause. The light of the sun cannot enter a vessel filled with clay; and a heart full of vices cannot admit the light of God, which would make visible to the soul the abyss into which she is running. Bereft of light, the habitual sinner goes on from sin to sin, without ever thinking of repentance. "The wicked walk round about." (Ps. 11:9.) Fallen into the dark pit of evil habits, he thinks only of sinning, he speaks only of sins, and no longer sees the evil of sin. In fine, he becomes like a brute devoid of reason, and seeks and desires only what pleases the senses. "And man, when he was in honour, did not understand: he is compared to senseless beasts, and is become like to them." (Ps. 48:13.) Hence the words of the Wise Man are fulfilled with regard to habitual sinners. "The wicked man when he comes into the depth of sin, contemneth." (Prov. 18:3.) This passage St. Chrysostom applies to habitual sinners, who, shut up in a pit of darkness, despise sermons, calls of God, admonitions, censures, hell, and God, and become like the vulture that waits to be killed by the fowler, rather than abandon the corrupt carcass on which it feeds.

4. Brethren, let us tremble, as David did when he said: "Let not the tempests of water drown me, nor the deep swallow me up; and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me." (Ps. 68:16.) Should a person fall into a pit, there is hope of deliverance as long as the mouth of the pit is not closed; but as soon as it is shut, he is lost. When a sinner falls into a bad habit, the mouth of the pit is gradually closed as his sins are multiplied; the moment the mouth of the pit is shut, he is abandoned by God. Dearly beloved sinners, if you have contracted a habit of any sin, endeavour instantly to go out of that pit of hell, before God shall deprive you entirely of his light, and abandon you; for, as soon as he abandons you by the total withdrawal of his light, all is over, and you are lost.

SECOND POINT. A BAD HABIT HARDENS THE HEART.

5.The habit of sin not only blinds the understanding, but also hardens the heart of the sinner. "His heart shall be as hard as a stone, and as firm as a smith's anvil." (Job 41:15.) By the habit of sin the heart becomes like a stone; and, as the anvil is hardened by repeated strokes of the hammer, so, instead of being softened by divine inspirations or by instructions, the soul of the habitual sinner is rendered more obdurate by sermons on the judgment of God, on the torments of the damned, and on the passion of Jesus Christ: "his heart shall be firm as a smith's anvil." "Their heart," says St. Augustine, "is hardened against the dew of grace, so as to produce no fruit." Divine calls, remorses of conscience, terrors of Divine justice, are showers of divine grace; but when, instead of drawing fruit from these divine blessings, the habitual sinner continues to commit sin, he hardens his heart, and thus, according to St. Thomas of Villanova, he gives a sign of his certain damnation—"Induratio damnationis indicium;"—for, from the loss of God's light, and the hardness of his heart, the sinner will, according to the terrible threat of the Holy Ghost, remain obstinate till death. "A hard heart shall fare evil at the end." (Eccl. 3:27.)

6. Of what use are confessions, when, in a short time after them, the sinner returns to the same vices? "He who strikes his breast," says St. Augustine, "and does not amend, confirms, but does not take away sins." When you strike your breast in the tribunal of penance, but do not amend and remove the occasions of sin, you then, according to the saint, do not take away your sins, but you make them more firm and permanent; that is, you render yourself more obstinate in sin. "The wicked walk round about." (Ps. 11:9.) Such is the unhappy life of habitual sinners. They go round about from sin to sin; and if they abstain for a little, they immediately, at the first occasion of temptation, return to their former iniquities. St. Bernard regards as certain the damnation of such sinners: "Væ homini, qui sequitur hunc circuitum." (Serm. xii. sup. Psalmos.)

7. But some young persons may say: I will hereafter amend, and sincerely give myself to God. But, if a habit of sin takes possession of you, when will you amend? The Holy Ghost declares, that a young man who contracts an evil habit will not relinquish it even in his old age. A young man, according to his way, even when he is old, he will not depart from it. (Prov. 22:6.) Habitual sinners have been known to yield, even at the hour of death, to the sins which they have been in the habit of committing. Father Recupito relates, that a person condemned to death, even while he was going to the place of execution, raised his eyes, saw a young female, and consented to a bad thought. We read in a work of Father Gisolfo, that a certain blasphemer, who had been likewise condemned to death, when thrown off the scaffold, broke out into a blasphemy, and died in that miserable state.

8. "He hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth." (Rom. 9:18.) God shows mercy for a certain time, and then he hardens the heart of the sinner. How does God harden the hearts of sinners? St. Augustine answers: "Obduratio Dei est non misereri." The Lord does not directly harden the hearts of habitual sinners; but, in punishment of their ingratitude for his benefits, he withdraws from them his graces, and thus their hearts are hardened, and become like a stone. "God does not harden the heart by imparting malice, but by withholding mercy." God does not render sinners obdurate by infusing the malice of obstinacy, but by not giving them the efficacious graces by which they would be converted. By the withdrawal of the sun's heat from the earth, water is hardened into ice.

9. St. Bernard teaches, that hardness or obstinacy of heart does not take place suddenly; but, by degrees the soul becomes insensible to the divine threats, and more obstinate by divine chastisements. "Paulatim in cordis dulitiam itur; cor durum non minis cedit, flagellis duratur." In habitual sinners are verified the words of David, "And thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, they have slumbered." (Ps. 75:7.) Even earthquakes, thunders, and sudden deaths do not terrify an habitual sinner. Instead of awakening him to a sense of his miserable state, they rather bring on that deadly sleep in which he slumbers and is lost.

THIRD POINT. A BAD HABIT DIMINISHES OUR STRENGTH.

10. "He hath torn me with wound upon wound; he hath rushed in upon me like a giant." (Job 16:15.) On this text St. Gregory reasons thus: A person assailed by an enemy, is rendered unable to defend himself by the first wound which he receives; but, should he receive a second and third, his strength will be so much exhausted, that death will be the consequence. It is so with sin: after the first and second wound which it inflicts on the soul, she shall still have some strength, but only through the divine grace. But, if she continue to indulge in vice, sin, becoming habitual, rushes upon her like a giant and leaves her without any power to resist it. St. Bernard compares the habitual sinner to a person who has fallen under a large stone, which he is unable to remove. A person in such a case will rise only with difficulty. "The man on whom the weight of a bad habit presses, rises with difficulty." St. Gregory says: "Lapis superpesitus, cum consuetudine mens in peccato demoratur ut esti velit exsurgere, jam non possit quia moles desuper premit." (Moral, lib. 26, c. xxiv.)

11. St. Thomas of Villanova teaches, that a soul which is deprived of the grace of God, cannot long abstain from new sins. "Anima a gratia destituta diu evadere ulteriora peccata non potest." (Conc. 4 in Dom. 4 quadrages.) In expounding the words of David, "O my God, make them like a wheel, and as a stubble before the wind," (Ps. 82:14.) St. Gregory says, that the man who struggled for a time before he fell into the habit of tin, as soon as he contracts the habit, yields and yields again to every temptation, with as much facility as a straw is moved by the slightest blast of wind. Habitual sinners, according to St. Chrysostom, become so weak in resisting the attacks of the devil, that, dragged to sin by their evil habit, they are sometimes driven to sin against their inclination. "Dura res est consuetudo, quæ nonnunquam nolentes committere cogit illicita," Yes; because, as St. Augustine says, a bad habit in the course of time brings on a certain necessity of falling into sin. "Dum consuetudini non resistitur, facta est necessitas."

12. St. Bernardine of Sienna says, that evil habits are changed into one's nature. "Usus veritur in natura." Hence, as it is necessary for men to breathe, so it appears that it becomes necessary for habitual sinners to commit sins. They are thus made the slave of sin. I say, the slaves. In society there are servants, who serve for wages, and there are slaves, who serve by force, and without remuneration. Having sold themselves as slaves to the devil, habitual sinners are reduced to such a degree of slavery, that they sometimes sin without pleasure, and sometimes even without being in the occasion of sin. St. Bernardine compares them to the wings of a windmill, which continue to turn the mill even when there is no corn to be ground; that is, they continue to commit sin, at least by indulging bad thoughts, even when there is no occasion of sin presented to them. The unhappy beings, as St. Chrysostom says, having lost the divine aid, no longer do what they wish themselves, but what the devil wishes. "Homo perdito Dei auxilio, non quod vult agit, sed quod diabolus."

13. Listen to what happened in a city in Italy. A certain young man, who had contracted a vicious habit, though frequently called by God, and admonished by friends to amend his life, continued to live in sin. One day he saw his sister suddenly struck dead. He was terrified for a short time; but she was scarcely buried, when he forgot her death and returned to the vomit. In two months after he was confined to bed by a slow fever. He then sent for a confessor, and made his confession. But after all this, on a certain day, he exclaimed: Alas! how late have I known the rigour of divine justice! And turning to his physician, he said: Do not torment me any longer by medicines; for my disease is incurable. I know for certain that it will bring me to the grave. And to his friends, who stood around, he said: As for the life of this body of mine there is no remedy, so for the life of my poor soul there is no hope. I expect eternal death. God has abandoned me; this I see in the hardness of my heart. Friends and religious came to encourage him to hope in the mercy of God; but his answer to all their exhortations was, God has abandoned me. The writer who relates this fact says, that, being alone with the young man, he said to him: Have courage; unite yourself with God; receive the viaticum. Friend, replied the young man, speak to a stone. The confession which I have made has been null for want of sorrow. I do not wish for a confessor, nor for the sacraments. Do not bring me the viaticum; for, should you bring it, I will do that which must excite horror. He then went away quite disconsolate; and returning to see the young man, learned from his relatives that he expired during the night without the aid of a priest, and that near his room frightful howlings were heard.

14. Behold the end of habitual sinners! Brethren, if you have the misfortune of having contracted a habit of sin, make, as soon as possible, a general confession; for your past confessions can scarcely have been valid. Go forth instantly from the slavery of the devil. Attend to the advice of the Holy Ghost. "Give not thy ears to the cruel." (Prov. 5:9.) Why will you serve the devil, your enemy, who is so cruel a master—who makes you lead a life of misery here, to bring you to a life of still greater misery in hell for all eternity? "Lazarus, come forth." Go out of the pit of sin; give yourself immediately to God, who calls you, and is ready to receive you if you turn to him. Tremble! this may be for you the last call, to which if you do not correspond, you shall be lost.

Sermon XXI

EASTER SUNDAY

ON THE MISERABLE STATE OF RELAPSING SINNERS

"Be not affrighted: you seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified. He is risen; he is not here."—MARK 16:6.

I HOPE, my dear Christians, that, as Christ is risen, you have in this holy paschal time, gone to confession, and have risen from your sins. But, attend to what St. Jerome teaches—that many begin well, but few persevere. "Incipere multorem est, perseverare paucorum." Now the Holy Ghost declares, that he who perseveres in holiness to death, and not they who begin a good life, shall be saved." "But he that shall persevere to the end, he shall be saved." (Matt. 26:13.) The crown of Paradise, says St. Bernard, is promised to those who commence, but it is given only to those who persevere. "Inchoantibus præmium promittitur, perseverantibus datur." (Ser. vi. Demodo bene viv.) Since, then, brethren, you have resolved to give yourselves to God, listen to the admonition of the Holy Ghost: "Son, when thou comest to the service of God, stand in justice and in fear, and prepare thyself for temptation." (Eccl. 2:1.) Do not imagine that you shall have no more temptations, but prepare yourself for the combat, and guard against a relapse into the sins you have confessed; for, if you lose the grace of God again, you shall find it difficult to recover it. I intend this day to show you the miserable state of relapsing sinners; that is, of those who, after confession, miserably fall back into the sins which they confessed.

1. Since, then, dearly beloved Christians, you have made a sincere confession of your sins, Jesus Christ says to you what he says to the paralytic: "Behold, thou art made whole. Sin no more, lest some worse thing happen to thee." (John 5:14.) By the confessions which you have made your souls are healed, but not as yet saved; for, if you return to sin, you shall be again condemned to hell, and the injury caused by the relapse shall be far greater than that which you sustained from your former sins. "Audis," says St. Bernard, "recidere quam incidere, esse deterius." If a man recover from a mortal disease, and afterwards fall back into it, he shall have lost so much of his natural strength, that his recovery from the relapse will be impossible. This is precisely what will happen to relaxing sinners; returning to the vomit—that is, taking back into the soul the sins vomited forth in confession—they shall be so weak, that they will become objects of amusement to the devil. St. Anselm says, that the devil acquires a certain dominion over them, so that he makes them fall, and fall again as he wishes. Hence the miserable beings become like birds with which a child amuses himself. He allows them, from time to time, to fly to a certain height, and then draws them back again when he pleases, by means of a cord made fast to them. Such is the manner in which the devil treats relapsing sinners. "Sed quia ab hoste tenentur, volantes in eadem vitia dejiciuntur."

2. St. Paul tells us, that we have to contend not with men like ourselves, made of flesh and blood, but with the princes of hell. "Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers." (Ephes. 6:12.) By these words he wishes to admonish us that we have not strength to resist the powers of hell, and that, to resist them, the divine aid is absolutely necessary: without it, we shall be always defeated; but, with the assistance of God's grace, we shall, according to the same apostle, be able to do all things and shall conquer all enemies. "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me." (Phil. 4:13.) But this assistance God gives only to those who pray for it. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find." (Matt. 7:7.) They who neglect to ask, do not receive. Let us, then, be careful not to trust in our resolutions: if we place our confidence in them, we shall be lost. When we are tempted to relapse into sin, we must put our whole trust in the assistance of God, who infallibly hears all who invoke his aid.

3. "He that thinketh himself to stand, let him take heed lest he fall." (1 Cor. 10:12.) They who are in the state of grace should, according to St. Paul, be careful not to fall into sin, particularly if they have been ever guilty of mortal sins; for a relapse into sin brings greater evil on the soul. "And the last state of that man becomes worse than the first." (Luke 11:26.)

4. We are told in the Holy Scriptures, that the enemy "will offer victims to his drag, and will sacrifice to his net; because through them his meat is made dainty." (Habac. 1:16.) In explaining this passage St. Jerome says, that the devil seeks to catch in his nets all men, in order to sacrifice them to the divine justice by their damnation. Sinners, who are already in the net, he endeavours to bind with new chains; but the friends of God are his "dainty meats." To make them his slaves, and to rob them of all they have acquired, he prepares stronger snares. "The more fervently," says Denis the Carthusian, "a soul endeavours to serve God, the more fiercely does the adversary rage against her." The closer the union of a Christian with God, and the greater his efforts to serve God, the more the enemy is aimed with rage, and the more strenuously he labours to enter into the soul from which he has been expelled. "When," says the Redeemer, "the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, seeking rest, and not finding, he saith: I will return into my house, whence I came out." (Luke 11:24.) Should he succeed in re-entering, he will not enter alone, but will bring with him associates to fortify himself in the soul of which he has again got possession. Thus, the second destruction of that miserable soul shall be greater than the first. "And the last state of that man becomes worse than the first." (Luke 11:26.)

5. To God, the relapse of ungrateful Christians is very displeasing. Because, after he had called and pardoned them with so much love, he sees that, forgetful of his mercies to them, they again turn their back upon him and renounce his grace. "If my enemy had reviled me, I would verily have borne with it. But thou, a man of one mind, my guide and familiar, who didst take sweet meats together with me." (Ps. 54:13, etc.) Had my enemy, says the Lord, insulted me, I would have felt less pain; but to see you rebel against me, after I had restored my friendship to you, and after I had made you sit at my table, to eat my own flesh, grieves me to the heart, and impels me to take vengeance on you. Miserable the man who, after having received so many graces from God, becomes the enemy, from being the friend of God. He shall find the sword of divine vengeance prepared to chastise him. "And he that passes over from justice to sin, God hath prepared such an one for the sword." (Eccl. 26:27.)

6. Some of you may say: If I relapse, I will soon rise again; for I will immediately prepare myself for confession. To those who speak in this manner shall happen what befell Samson. He allowed himself to be deluded by Dalila: while he was asleep she cut off his hair, and his strength departed from him. Awaking from sleep, he said: "I will go out as I did before, and shake myself, not knowing that the Lord was departed from him." (Judges 16:20.) He expected to deliver himself as on former occasions, from the hands of the Philistines. But, because his strength had departed from him, he was made their slave. They pulled out his eyes, and binding him in chains, shut him up in prison. After relapsing into sin, a Christian loses the strength necessary to resist temptations, because "the Lord departs from him." He abandons him by withholding the efficacious aid necessary to overcome temptations; and the miserable man remains blind and abandoned in his sin.

7. "No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back is fit for the Kingdom of God." (Luke 9:62.) Behold a faithful picture of a relapsing sinner. Mark the words no man: no one, says Jesus Christ, who begins to serve me, and looks back, is fit to enter heaven. According to Origen, the addition of a new sin to one committed before, is like the addition of a new wound to a wound just inflicted. "Cum peccatum peccato adjicitur, sicut vulnus vulneri." (Hom. i. in Ps.) If a wound be inflicted on any member of the body, that member certainly loses its original vigour. But, if it receives a second wound, it shall lose all strength and motion, without hope of recovery. The great evil of a relapse into sin is, that it renders the soul so weak that she has but little strength to resist temptation. For St. Thomas says, "After a fault has been remitted, the dispositions produced by the preceding acts remain." (1 p., qu. 86, art. 5.) Every sin, though pardoned, always leaves a wound on the soul. When to this wound a new one is added, the soul becomes so weak that, without a special and extraordinary grace from God, it is impossible for her to conquer temptations.

8. Let us, then, brethren, tremble at the thought of relapsing into sin, and let us beware of availing ourselves of the mercy of God to continue to offend him. "He," says St. Augustine, "who has promised pardon to penitents, has promised repentance to no one." God has indeed promised pardon to all who repent of their sins, but he has not promised to any one the grace to repent of the faults which he has committed. Sorrow for sin is a pure gift of God; if he withholds it, how will you repent? And without repentance, how can you obtain pardon? Ah! the Lord will not allow himself to be mocked. "Be not deceived," says St. Paul, "God is not mocked." (Gal. 6:7.) St. Isidore tells us, that the man who repeats the sin which he before detested, is not a penitent, but a scoffer of God's majesty. "Irrisor, et non pœnitens est, pui adhuc agit, quod pœnitet." (De Sum. Bono.) And Tertullian teaches, that where there is no amendment, repentance is not sincere. "Ubi emendatio nulla, pœnitentia nulla." (De Pænit.)

9. "Be penitent," said St. Peter in a discourse to the Jews, "and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." (Acts 3:19.) Many repent, but are not converted. They feel a certain sorrow for the irregularities of their lives, but do not sincerely return to God. They go to confession, strike their breasts, and promise to amend; but they do not make a firm resolution to change their lives. They who resolve firmly on a change of life, persevere, or at least preserve themselves for a considerable time in the grace of God. But they who relapse into sin soon after confession, show, as St. Peter says, that they repent, but are not converted; and such persons shall in the end die an unhappy death. "Plerumque," says St. Gregory, "mali sic compunguntur ad justitiam, sicut plerumque boni tentantur ad culpam." (Pastor., p. 3, admon. 31.) As the just have frequent temptations to sin, but yield not to them, because their will abhors them, so sinners feel certain impulses to virtue; but these are not sufficient to produce a true conversion. The Wise Man tells us that mercy shall be shown to him who confesses his sins and abandons them, but not to those who merely confess their transgressions. "He that shall confess 'his sins,' and forsake them, shall obtain mercy." (Prov 28:13.) He, then, who does not give up, but returns to sin after confession, shall not obtain mercy from God, but shall die a victim of divine justice. He may expect to die the death of a certain young Englishman, who, as is related in the history of England, was in the habit of relapsing into sins against purity. He always fell back into these sins after confession. At the hour of death he confessed his sins, and died in a manner which gave reason to hope for his salvation. But, while a holy priest was celebrating or preparing to celebrate Mass for his departed soul, the miserable young man appeared to him, and said that he was damned. He added that, at the point of death, being tempted to indulge a bad thought, he felt himself as it were forced to consent, and, as he was accustomed to do in the former part of his life, he yielded to the temptation, and thus was lost.

10. Is there then no means of salvation for relapsing sinners? I do not say this; but I adopt the maxim of physicians. "In magnis morbis a magnis initium. medendi sumere oportet." In malignant diseases, powerful remedies are necessary. To return to the way of salvation, the relapsing sinner must do great violence to himself. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent bear it away." (Matt. 11:12.) In the beginning of a new life, the relapsing sinner must do violence to himself in order to root out the bad habits which he has contracted, and to acquire habits of virtue; for when he has acquired habits of virtue, the observance of the divine commands shall become easy and even sweet. The Lord once said to St. Bridget, that, to those who bear with fortitude the first punctures of the thorns which they experience in the attacks of the senses, in avoiding occasions of sin, and in withdrawing from dangerous conversations, these thorns are by degrees changed into roses.

11. But, to use the necessary violence, and to lead a life of regularity, you must adopt the proper means; otherwise you shall do nothing. After rising in the morning, you must make acts of thanksgiving, of the love of God, and of oblation of the actions of the day. You must also renew your resolution never to offend God, and beg of Jesus Christ and his holy mother to preserve you from sin during the day. Afterwards make your meditation and hear Mass. During the day make a spiritual lecture and a visit to the most holy sacrament. In the evening, say the Rosary and make an examination of conscience. Receive the holy communion at least once a week, or more frequently if your directors advise you. Be careful to choose a confessor, to whom you will regularly go to confession. It is also very useful to make a spiritual retreat every year in some religious house. Honour the mother of God every day by some particular devotion, and by fasting on every Saturday. She is the mother of perseverance, and promises to obtain it for all who serve her. "They that work by me shall not sin." (Eccl. 24:30.) Above all, it is necessary to ask of God every morning the gift of perseverance, and to beg of the Blessed Virgin to obtain it for you, and particularly in the time of temptation, by invoking the name of Jesus and Mary as long as the temptation lasts. Happy the man who will continue to act in this manner, and shall be found so doing when Jesus Christ shall come to judge him. "Blessed is that servant, whom, when his Lord shall come, he shall find so doing." (Matt. 24:46.)

Sermon XXII

FIRST SUNDAY AFTER EASTER

ON AVOIDING THE OCCASIONS OF SIN

"When the doors were shut, where the disciples were gathered together for fear of the Jews, Jesus came and stood in the midst."—JOHN 20:19.

WE find in this day's gospel that after his resurrection Jesus Christ entered, though the doors were closed, into the house in which the apostles were assembled, and stood in the midst of them. St. Thomas says, that the mystic meaning of this miracle is, that the Lord does not enter into our souls unless we keep the door of the senses shut. "Mistice per hoc datur intelligi, quod Christus nobit apparet quando fores, id est sensus sunt clausi." If, then, we wish Jesus Christ to dwell within us, we must keep the doors of our senses closed against dangerous occasions, otherwise the devil will make us his slaves. I will show to-day the great danger of perdition to which they who do not avoid the occasions of sin expose themselves.

1. We read in the Scriptures that Christ and Lazarus arose from the dead. Christ rose to die no more—"Christ rising from the dead, dieth no more" (Rom. 6:9); but Lazarus arose and died again. The Abbot Guerric remarks that Christ arose free and unbound; "but Lazarus came forth bound feet and hands." (John 11:44.) Miserable the man, adds this author, who rises from sin bound by any dangerous occasion: he will die again by losing the divine grace. He, then, who wishes to save his soul, must not only abandon sin, but also the occasions of sin: that is, he must renounce such an intimacy, such a house; he must renounce those wicked companions, and all similar occasions that incite him to sin.

2. In consequence of original sin, we all have an inclination to do what is forbidden. Hence St. Paul complained that he experienced in himself a law opposed to reason: "But I see another law in my members, fighting against the law of my mind, and captivating me in the law of sin." (Rom. 7:23.) Now, when a dangerous occasion is present, it violently excites our corrupt desires, so that it is then very difficult to resist them: because God withholds efficacious helps from those who voluntarily expose themselves to the occasion of sin. "He that loveth danger shall perish in it." (Eccl. 3:27.) "When," says St. Thomas, in his comment on this passage, "we expose ourselves to danger, God abandons us in it." St. Bernardine of Sienna teaches that the counsel of avoiding the occasions of sin is the best of all counsel, and as it were the foundation of religion. "Inter consilia Christi unum celeberrimum, et quasi religionis fundamentum est, fugere peccatorum occasiones."

3. St. Peter says that "the devil goeth about seeking whom he may devour." (1 Pet. 5:8.) He is constantly going about our souls, endeavouring to enter and take possession of them. Hence, he seeks to place before us the occasions of sin, by which he enters the soul. "Explorat," says St. Cyprian, "an sit pars cujus aditu penetret." When the soul yields to the suggestions of the devil, and exposes herself to the occasions of sin, he easily enters and devours her. The ruin of our first parents arose from their not flying from the occasions of sin. God had prohibited them not only to eat, but even to touch the forbidden apple. In answer to the serpent tempting her, Eve said: "God hath commanded us that we should not eat, and that we should not touch it." (Gen. 3:3.) But "she saw, took, and eat" the forbidden fruit: she first looked at it, she then took it into her hands, and afterwards eat it. This is what ordinarily happens to all who expose themselves to the occasions of sin. Hence, being once compelled by exorcisms to tell the sermon which displeased him most, the devil confessed that it was the sermon on avoiding the occasions of sin. As long as we expose ourselves to the occasions of sin, the devil laughs at all our good purposes and promises made to God. The greatest care of the enemy is to induce us not to avoid evil occasions; for these occasions, like a veil placed before the eyes, prevent us from seeing either the lights received from God, or the eternal truths, or the resolutions we have made: in a word, they make us forget all, and as it were force us into sin.

4. "Know it to be a communication with death; for thou art going in the midst of snares." (Eccl. 9:20.) Everyone born in this world enters into the midst of snares. Hence, the Wise Man advises those who wish to be secure to guard themselves against the snares of the world, and to withdraw from them. "He that is aware of the snares shall be secure." (Prov. 11:15.) But if, instead of withdrawing from them, a Christian approaches to them, how can he avoid being caught by them? Hence, after having with so much loss learned the danger of exposing himself to the danger of sin, David said that, to continue faithful to God, he kept at a distance from every occasion which could lead him to relapse. "I have restrained my feet from every evil way, that I may keep thy words." (Ps. 118:101.) He does not say from every sin, but from every evil way which conducts to sin. The devil is careful to find pretexts to make us believe that certain occasions to which we expose ourselves are not voluntary, but necessary. When the occasion in which we are placed is really necessary, the Lord always helps us to avoid sin; but we sometimes imagine certain necessities which are not sufficient to excuse us. "A treasure is never safe," says St. Cyprian, "as long as a robber is harboured within; nor is a lamb secure while it dwells in the same den with a wolf." (Lib. de Sing. Cler.) The saint speaks against those who do not wish to remove the occasions of sin, and still say: "I am not afraid that I shall fall." As no one can be secure of his treasure if he keeps a thief in his house, and as a lamb cannot be sure of its life if it remain in the den of a wolf, so likewise no one can be secure of the treasure of divine grace if he is resolved to continue in the occasion of sin. St. James teaches that every man has within himself a powerful enemy, that is, his own evil inclinations, which tempt him to sin. "Every man is tempted by his own concupiscence, drawn away, and allured." (St. James 1:14.) If, then, we do not fly from the external occasions, how can we resist temptation and avoid sin? Let us, therefore, place before our eyes the general remedy which Jesus has prescribed for conquering temptations and saving our souls. "If thy right eye scandalize thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee." (Matt. 5:29.) If you find that your right eye is to you a cause of damnation, you must pull it out and cast it far from you; that is, when there is danger of losing your soul, you must fly from all evil occasions. St. Francis of Assisium used to say, as I have stated in another sermon, that the devil does not seek, in the beginning, to bind timorous souls with the chain of mortal sin; because they would be alarmed at the thought of committing mortal sin, and would fly from it with horror: he endeavours to bind them by a single hair, which does not excite much fear; because by this means he will succeed more easily in strengthening their bonds, till he makes them his slaves. Hence he who wishes to be free from the danger of being the slave of hell must break all the hairs by which the enemy attempts to bind him; that is, he must avoid all occasions of sin, such as certain salutations, billets, little presents, and words of affection. With regard to those who have had a habit of impurity, it will not be sufficient to avoid proximate occasions; if they do not fly from remote occasions, they will very easily relapse into their former sins.

5. Impurity, says St. Augustine, is a vice which makes war on all, and which few conquer. "The fight is common, but the victory rare." How many miserable souls have entered the contest with this vice, and have been defeated! But to induce you to expose yourselves to occasions of this sin, the devil will tell you not to be afraid of being overcome by the temptation. "I do not wish," says St. Jerome, "to fight with the hope of victory, lest I should sometimes lose the victory." I will not expose myself to the combat with the hope of conquering; because, by voluntarily engaging in the fight, I shall lose my soul and my God. To escape defeat in this struggle, a great grace of God is necessary; and to render ourselves worthy of this grace, we must, on our part, avoid the occasions of sin. To practise the virtue of chastity, it is necessary to recommend ourselves continually to God: we have not strength to preserve it; that strength must be the gift of God. "And as I knew," says the Wise Man, "that I could not otherwise be continent, except God gave it, . . . I went to the Lord, and besought him." (Wis. 8:21.) But if we expose ourselves to the occasions of sin, we ourselves shall provide our rebellious flesh with arms to make war against the soul. "Neither," says the Apostle, "yield ye your members as instruments of sin unto iniquity." (Rom. 6:13.) In explaining this passage, St. Cyril of Alexandria says: "You stimulate the flesh; you arm it, and make it powerful against the spirit." St. Philip Neri used to say, that in the war against the vice of impurity, the victory is gained by cowards—that is, by those who fly from the occasions of this sin. But the man who exposes himself to it, arms his flesh, and renders it so powerful, that it will be morally impossible for him to resist its attacks.

6. "Cry," says the Lord to Isaias, "all flesh is grass." (Isa. 40:6.) Now, says St. John Chrysostom, if all flesh is grass, it is as foolish for a man who exposes himself to the occasion of sin to hope to preserve the virtue of purity, as to expect that hay, into which a torch has been thrown, will not take fire. "Put a torch into hay, and then dare to deny that the hay will burn." No, says St. Cyprian; it is impossible to stand in the midst of flames, and not to burn. "Impossibile est flammis circumdari et non ardere." (De Sing. Cler.) "Can a man," says the Holy Ghost, "hide fire in his bosom, and his garments not burn? or can he walk upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt?" (Prov. 6:27, 28.) Not to be burnt in such circumstances would be a miracle. St. Bernard teaches, that to preserve chastity, and, at the same time, to expose oneself to the proximate occasion of sin, "is a greater miracle than to raise a dead man to life."

7. In explaining the fifth Psalm, St. Augustine says, that "he who is unwilling to fly from danger, wishes to perish in it." Hence, in another place, he exhorts those who wish to conquer, and not to perish, to avoid dangerous occasions. "In the occasion of falling into sin, take flight, if you desire to gain the victory." (Serm. ccl. de temp.) Some foolishly trust in their own strength, and do not see that their strength is like that of tow placed in the fire. "And your strength shall be as the ashes of tow." (Isa. 1:31.) Others, trusting in the change which has taken place in their life, in their confessions, and in the promises they have made to God, say: Through the grace of the Lord, I have now no bad motive in seeking the company of such a person; her presence is not even an occasion of temptations: Listen, all you who speak in this manner. In Mauritania there are bears that go in quest of the apes, to feed upon them: as soon as a bear appears, the apes run up the trees, and thus save themselves. But what does the bear do? He stretches himself on the ground as if dead, and waits till the apes descend from the trees. The moment he sees that they have descended, he springs up, seizes on them, and devours them. It is thus the devil acts: he makes the temptation appear to be dead; but when a soul descends, and exposes herself to the occasion of sin, he stirs up temptation, and devours her. Oh! how many miserable souls, devoted to spiritual things, to mental prayer, to frequent communion, and to a life of holiness, have, by exposing themselves to the occasion of sin, become the slaves of the devil! We find in ecclesiastical history that a holy woman, who employed herself in the pious office of burying the martyrs, once found among them one who was not as yet dead. She brought him into her own house, and procured a physician and medicine for him, till he recovered. But, what happened? These two saints (as they might be called—one of them on the point of being a martyr, the other devoting her time to works of mercy with so much risk of being persecuted by the tyrants) first fell into sin and lost the grace of God, and, becoming weaker by sin, afterwards denied the faith. St. Macarius relates a similar fact regarding an old man who suffered to be half-burned in defence of the faith; but, being brought back into prison, he, unfortunately for himself, formed an intimacy with a devout woman who served the martyrs, and fell into sin.

8. The Holy Ghost tells us, that we must fly from sin as from a serpent. "Flee from sin as from the face of a serpent." (Eccl. 21:2.) Hence, as we not only avoid the bite of a serpent, but are careful neither to touch nor approach it, so we must fly not only from sin, but also from the occasion of sin—that is, from the house, the conversation, the person that would lead us to sin. St. Isidore says, that he who wishes to remain near a serpent, will not remain long unhurt. "Juxta serpentem positus non erit diu illæsus." (Lib. 2, Solit.) Hence, if any person is likely to prove an occasion of your ruin, the admonition of the Wise Man is, "Remove thy way far from her, and come not nigh the doors of her house." (Prov. 5:8.) He not only tells you not to enter the house which has been to you a road to hell ("Her house is the way to hell." Prov. 7:27); but he also cautions you not to approach it, and even to keep at a distance from it. "Remove thy way far from her." But, you will say, if I abandon that house, my temporal affairs shall suffer. It is better that you should suffer a temporal loss, than that you should lose your soul and your God. You must be persuaded that, in whatever regards chastity, there cannot be too great caution. If we wish to save our souls from sin and hell, we must always fear and tremble. "With fear and trembling work out your salvation." (Phil. 2:12.) He who is not fearful, but exposes himself to occasions of sin, shall scarcely be saved. Hence, in our prayers we ought to say every day, and several times in the day, that petition of the OUR FATHER—"and lead us not into temptation." Lord, do not permit me to be attacked by those temptations which would deprive me of your grace. We cannot merit the grace of perseverance; but, according to St. Augustine, God grants it to every one that asks it, because he has promised to hear all who pray to him. Hence, the holy doctor says, that the Lord, "by his promises has made himself a debtor."

Sermon XXIII

SECOND SUNDAY AFTER EASTER

ON SCANDAL

"The wolf catcheth and scattereth the sheep."—JOHN 10:12.

THE wolves that catch and scatter the sheep of Jesus Christ are the authors of scandal, who, not content with their own destruction, labour to destroy others. But the Lord says: "Woe to that man by whom the scandal cometh." (Matt. 18:7.) Woe to him who gives scandal, and causes others to lose the grace of God. Origen says, that "a person who impels another to sin, sins more grievously than the other." If, brethren, there be any among you who has given scandal, I will endeavour this day to convince him of the evil he has done, that he may bewail it and guard against it for the future. I will show, in the first point, the great displeasure which the sin of scandal gives to God; and, in the second, the great punishment which God threatens to inflict on the authors of scandal.

FIRST POINT. ON THE GREAT DISPLEASURE WHICH THE SIN OF SCANDAL GIVES TO GOD.

1. It is, in the first place, necessary to explain what is meant by scandal. Behold how St. Thomas defines it: "Scandal is a word or act which gives occasion to the ruin of one's neighbour."—(2 ii., q. 45, art. 1.) Scandal, then, is a word or act by which you are to your neighbour the cause or occasion of losing his soul. It may be direct or indirect. It is direct, when you directly tempt or induce another to commit sin. It is indirect, when, although you foresee that sinful words or actions will be the cause of sin to another, you do not abstain from them. But, scandal, whether it be direct or indirect, if it be in a matter of great moment, is always a mortal sin.

2. Let us now see the great displeasure which the destruction of a neighbour's soul gives to God. To understand it, we must consider how dear every soul is to God. He has created the souls of all men to his own image. "Let us make man to our image and likeness." (Gen. 1:26.) Other creatures God has made by a fiat—by an act of his will; but the soul of man he has created by his own breath. "And the Lord breathed into his face the breath of life." (Gen. 2:7.) The soul of your neighbour God has loved for eternity. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." (Jer. 31:3.) He has, moreover, created every soul to be a queen in Paradise, and to be a partner in his glory. "That by these you may be made partakers of the divine nature." (2 Peter 1:4.) In heaven he will make the souls of the saints partakers of his own joy. "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matt. 25:21.) To them he shall give himself as their reward. "I am thy reward exceeding great." (Gen. 15:1.)

3. But nothing can show the value which God sets on the souls of men more clearly than what the Incarnate Word has done for their redemption from sin and hell. "If," says St. Eucharius, "you do not believe your Creator, ask your Redeemer, how precious you are." Speaking of the care which we ought to have of our brethren, St. Ambrose says: "The great value of the salvation of a brother is known from the death of Christ." We judge of the value of everything by the price paid for it by an intelligent purchaser. Now, Jesus Christ has, according to the Apostle, purchased the souls of men with his own blood. "You are bought with a great price." (1 Cor. 6:20.) We can, then, say, that the soul is of as much value as the blood of a God. Such, indeed, is the language of St. Hilary. "Tam copioso munere redemptio agitur, ut homo Deum valere videatur." Hence, the Saviour tells us, that whatsoever good or evil we do to the least of his brethren, we do to himself. "So long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me." (Matt. 25:40.)

4. From all this we may infer how great is the displeasure given to God by scandalizing a brother, and destroying his soul. It is enough to say, that they who give scandal rob God of a child, and murder a soul, for whose salvation he has spent his blood and his life. Hence, St. Leo calls the authors of scandals murderers. "Quisquis scandalizat, mortem infert animæ proximi." They are the most impious of murderers; because they kill not the body, but the soul of a brother, and rob Jesus Christ of all his tears, of his sorrows, and of all that he has done and suffered to gain that soul. Hence the Apostle says: "Now, when you sin thus against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, you sin against Christ." (1 Cor. 8:12.) They who scandalize a brother, sin against Christ; because, as St. Ambrose says, they deprive him of a soul for which he has spent so many years, and submitted to so many toils and labours. It is related, that B. Albertus Magnus spent thirty years in making a head, which resembled the human head, and uttered words: and that St. Thomas, fearing that it was done by the agency of the devil, took the head and broke it. B. Albertus complained of the act of St. Thomas, saying: "You have broken on me the work of thirty years." I do not assert that this is true; but it is certain that, when Jesus Christ sees a soul destroyed by scandal, he can reprove the author of it, and say to him: Wicked wretch, what have you done? You have deprived me of this soul, for which I ha ve laboured thirty-three years.

5. We read in the Scriptures, that the sons of Jacob, after having sold their brother Joseph to certain merchants, told his father that wild beasts had devoured him. "Fera pessima devoravit eum." (Gen. 37:20.) To convince their father of the truth of what they said, they dipped the coat of Joseph in the blood of a goat, and presented it to him, saying: "See whether this be thy son's coat or not" (v. 32). In reply, the afflicted father said with tears: "It is my son's coat: an evil wild beast hath eaten him" (v. 33). Thus, we may imagine that, when a soul is brought into sin by scandal, the devils present to God the garment of that soul dipped in the blood of the Immaculate Lamb, Jesus Christ—that is, the grace lost by that scandalized soul, which Jesus Christ had purchased with his blood—and that they say to the Lord: "See whether this be thy son's coat or not." If God were capable of shedding tears, he would weep more bitterly than Jacob did, at the sight of that lost soul—his murdered child—and would say: "It is my son's coat: an evil wild beast hath eaten him." The Lord will go in search of this wild beast, saying: "Where is the beast? where is the beast that has devoured my child?" When he finds the wild beast, what shall he do with him?

6. "I will," says the Lord by his prophet Osee, "meet them as a bear that is robbed of her whelps." (Osee 13:8.) When the bear comes to her den, and finds not her whelps, she goes about the wood in search of the person who took them away. When she discovers the person, oh! with what fury does she rush upon him! It is thus the Lord shall rush upon the authors of scandal, who have robbed him of his children. Those who have given scandal, will say: My neighbour is already damned; how can I repair the evil that has been done? The Lord shall answer: Since you have been the cause of his perdition, you must pay me for the loss of his soul. "I will require his blood at thy hands." (Ezec. 3:20.) It is written in Deuteronomy, "Thou shalt not pity him, but shalt require life for life" (19:21). You have destroyed a soul; you must suffer the loss of your own. Let us pass to the second point.

SECOND POINT. THE GREAT PUNISHMENT WHICH GOD THREATENS TO THOSE WHO GIVE SCANDAL.

7. "Woe to that man by whom the scandal cometh." (Matt. 18:7.) If the displeasure given to God by scandal be great, the chastisement which awaits the authors of it must be frightful. Behold how Jesus Christ speaks of this chastisement: "But he that shall scandalize one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be drowned in the depth of the sea." (Matt. 18:6.) If a malefactor dies on the scaffold, he excites the compassion of the spectators, who, at least, pray for him, if they cannot deliver him from death. But, were he cast into the depths of the sea, there should be no one present to pity his fate. A certain author says, that Jesus Christ threatens the person who scandalizes a brother with this sort of punishment, to signify that he is so hateful to the angels and saints, that they do not wish to recommend to God the man who has brought a soul to perdition. "He is declared unworthy not only to be assisted, but even to be seen." (Mansi. cap. iii. num. 4.)

8. St. John Chrysostom says, that scandal is so abominable in the eyes of God, that though he overlooks very grievous sins, he cannot allow the sin of scandal to pass without condign punishment. "Tam Deo horribile est scandalum, ut peccata graviora dissimulet non autem peccata ubi frater scandalizatur." God himself says the same by the prophet Ezechiel: "Every man of the house of Israel, if he . . . set up the stumbling block of his iniquity . . . I will make him an example and a proverb, and will cut him off from the midst of my people." (Ezec. 14:7, 8.) And, in reality, scandal is one of the sins which we find in the sacred Scriptures punished by God with the greatest rigour. Of Heli, because he did not correct his sons, who gave scandal by stealing the flesh offered in sacrifice (for parents give scandal, not only by giving bad example, but also by not correcting their children as they ought), the Lord said: "Behold, I do a thing in Israel: and whosoever shall hear it, both his ears shall tingle." (1 Kings, 3:11.) And speaking of the scandal given by the sons of Heli, the inspired writer says: "Wherefore the sin of the young men was exceeding great before the Lord." (Ibid. 2:17.) What was this sin exceeding great? It was, says St. Gregory, in explaining this passage, drawing others to sin. "Quia ad pecandum alios pertrahebant." Why was Jeroboam chastised? Because he scandalized the people: he "hath sinned, and made Israel sin." (3 Kings, 14:16.) In the family of Achab, all the members of which were the enemies of God, Jezabel was the most severely chastised. She was thrown down from a window, and devoured by dogs, so that nothing remained but her "skull, and the feet, and the extremities of her hands." And why was she so severely punished? Because "she set Achab on to every evil."

9. For the sin of scandal hell was created. "In the beginning God created heaven and earth." (Gen. 1:1.) But, when did he create hell? It was then Lucifer began to seduce the angels into rebellion against God. Lest he should continue to pervert those who remained faithful to God, he was banished from heaven immediately after his sin. Hence Jesus Christ said to the Pharisees, who, by their bad example, scandalized the people, that they were children of the devil, who was from the beginning, a murderer of souls. "You are of your father, the devil: he was a murderer from the beginning." (John 8:44.) And when St. Peter gave scandal to Jesus Christ, by suggesting to him not to allow his life to be taken away by the Jews, and thus endeavouring to prevent the accomplishment of redemption, the Redeemer called him a devil. "Go behind me, Satan; thou art a scandal to me." (Matt. 16:23.) And, in reality, what other office do the authors of scandal perform, than that of a minister of the devil? If he were not assisted by such impious ministers, he certainly would not succeed in gaining so many souls. A scandalous companion does more injury than a hundred devils.

10. On the words of Ezechias, "Behold, in peace is my bitterness most bitter" (Isa. 38:17), St. Bernard, in the name of the Church, says: "Peace from pagans, peace from heretics, but no peace from children." At present the Church is not persecuted by idolators, or by heretics, but she is persecuted by scandalous Christians, who are her own children. In catching birds, we employ decoys, that is, certain birds that are blinded, and tied in such manner that they cannot fly away. It is thus the devil acts. "When," says St. Ephrem, "a soul has been taken, she becomes a snare to deceive others." After having made a young man fall into sin, the enemy first blinds him as his own slave, and then makes him his decoy to deceive others; and to draw them into the net of sin, he not only impels, but even forces him to deceive others. "The enemy," says St. Leo, "has many whom he compels to deceive others." (Serm. de Nativ.)

11. Miserable wretches! the authors of scandal must suffer in hell the punishment of all the sins they have made others commit. Cesarius relates (1. 2, c. vi.) that, after the death of a certain person who had given scandal, a holy man witnessed his judgment and condemnation, and saw that, at his arrival at the gate of hell, all the souls whom he had scandalized came to meet him, and said to him: Come, accursed wretch, and atone for all the sins which you have made us commit. They then rushed in upon him, and like so many wild beasts, began to tear him in pieces. St. Bernard says, that, in speaking of other sinners, the Scriptures hold out hopes of amendment and pardon; but they speak of those who give scandal as persons separated from God, of whose salvation there is very little hope. "Loquitur tanquam a Deo separati, unde hisce nulla spes vitæ esse poterit."

12. Behold, then, the miserable state of those who give scandal by their bad example, who utter immodest words before their companions, in the presence of young females, and even of innocent children, who, in consequence of hearing those words, commit a thousand sins. Considering how the angel-guardians of those little ones weep at seeing them in the state of sin, and how they call for vengeance from God against the sacrilegious tongues that have scandalized them. A great chastisement awaits all who ridicule those who practise virtue. For many, through fear of the contempt and ridicule of others, abandon virtue, and give themselves up to a wicked life. What shall be the punishment of those who bring messages to induce others to sin? or of those who boast of their own wicked actions? O God! instead of weeping and repenting for having offended the Lord, they rejoice and glory in their iniquities! Some advise others to commit sin; others induce them to it; and some, worse than the devils, teach others how to sin. What shall we say of fathers and mothers, who, though it is in their power to prevent the sins of their children, allow them to associate with bad companions, or to frequent certain dangerous houses, and permit their daughters to hold conversations with young men? Oh! with what scourges shall we see such persons chastised on the day of judgment!

13. Perhaps some father of a family among you will say: Then, I am lost because I have given scandal? Is there no hope of salvation for me? No: I will not say that you are past hope—the mercy of God is great. He has promised pardon to all who repent. But, if you wish to save your soul, you must repair the scandal you have given. "Let him," says Eusebius Emmissenus, "who has destroyed himself by the destruction of many, redeem himself by the edification of many." (Hom. x. ad Mon.) You have lost your soul, and have destroyed the souls of many by your scandals. You are now bound to repair the evil. As you have hitherto drawn others to sin, so you are bound to draw them to virtue by words of edification, by good example, by avoiding sinful occasions, by frequenting the sacraments, by going often to the church to pray, and by attending sermons. And from this day forward avoid, as you would death, every act and word which could scandalize others. "Let their own ruin," says St. Cyprian, "suffice for those who have fallen." (Lib. 1, epis. iii.) And St. Thomas of Villanova says: "Let your own sins be sufficient for you." What evil has Jesus Christ done to you that it is not enough for you to have offended him yourselves, but you wish to make others offend him? This is an excess of cruelty.

14. Be careful, then, never again to give the smallest scandal. And if you wish to save your soul, avoid as much as possible those who give scandal. These incarnate devils shall be damned; but, if you do not avoid them, you will bring yourself to perdition. "Woe to the world because of scandals," says the Lord (Matt. 18:7), that is, many are lost because they do not fly from occasions of scandal. But you may say: Such a person is my friend; I am under obligations to him; I expect many favours from him. But Jesus Christ says: "If thy right eye scandalize thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee. It is better for thee, having one eye, to enter into life, than, having two eyes, to be cast into hell fire." (Matt. 18:9.) Although a certain person was your right eye, you must withdraw for ever from her; it is better for you to lose an eye and save your soul, than to preserve it and be cast into hell.

Sermon XXIV

THIRD SUNDAY AFTER EASTER

ON THE VALUE OF TIME

"A little while, and now you shall not see me."—JOHN 16:16.

THERE is nothing shorter than time, but there is nothing more valuable. There is nothing shorter than time; because the past is no more, the future is uncertain, and the present is but a moment. This is what Jesus Christ meant when he said: "A little while, and now you shall not see me." We may say the same of our life, which, according to St. James is but a vapour, which is soon scattered for ever. "For what is your life? It is a vapour which appeareth for a little while." (James 4:14.) But the time of this life is as precious as it is short; for, in every moment, if we spend it well, we can acquire treasures of merits for heaven; but, if we employ time badly, we may in each moment commit sin, and merit hell. I mean this day to show you how precious is every moment of the time which God gives us, not to lose it, and much less to commit sin, but to perform good works and to save our souls.

1. "Thus saith the Lord: In an acceptable time I have heard thee, and in the day of salvation I have helped thee." (Isa. 49:8.) St. Paul explains this passage, and says, that the acceptable time is the time in which God has determined to confer his favours upon us. He then adds: "Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation." (2 Cor. 6:2.) The Apostle exhorts us not to spend unprofitably the present time, which he calls the day of salvation; because, perhaps, after this day of salvation, there shall be no salvation for us. "The time," says the same Apostle, "is short; it remaineth that . . . they that weep be as though they wept not; that they that rejoice, as if they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as if they used it not." (1 Cor. 7:29, 30, 31.) Since, then, the time which we have to remain on this earth is short, the Apostle tells those who weep, that they ought not to weep, because their sorrows shall soon pass away; and those who rejoice, not to fix their affections on their enjoyments, because they shall soon have an end. Hence he concludes, that we should use this world, not to enjoy its transitory goods, but to merit eternal life.

2. "Son," says the Holy Ghost, "observe the time." (Eccl. 4:23.) Son, learn to preserve time, which is the most precious and the greatest gift that God can bestow upon you. St. Bernardine of Sienna teaches that time is of as much value as God; because in every moment of time well spent the possession of God is merited. He adds that in every instant of this life a man may obtain the pardon of his sins, the grace of God, and the glory of Paradise. "Modico tempore potest homo lucrari gratiam et gloriam." Hence St. Bonaventure says that "no loss is of greater moment than the loss of time." (Ser. xxxvii. in Sept.)

3. But, in another place, St. Bernardine says that, though there is nothing more precious than time, there is nothing less valuable in the estimation of men. "Nil pretiosius tempore, nil vilius reputatur." (Ser. ii. ad Schol.) You will see some persons spending four or five hours in play. If you ask them why they lose so much time, they answer: To amuse ourselves. Others remain half the day standing in the street, or looking out from a window. If you ask them what they are doing, they shall say in reply, that they are passing the time. And why says the same saint, do you lose this time? Why should you lose even a single hour, which the mercy of God gives you to weep for your sins, and to acquire the divine grace? "Donec hora pertranseat, quam tibi ad agendam pœnitentiam, ad acquirendam gratiam, miseratio conditoris indulserit."

4. O time, despised by men during life, how much shall you be desired at the hour of death, and particularly in the other world! Time is a blessing which we enjoy only in this life; it is not enjoyed in the next; it is not found in heaven nor in hell. In hell, the damned exclaim with tears: "Oh! that an hour were given to us." They would pay any price for an hour or for a minute, in which they might repair their eternal ruin. But this hour or minute they never shall have. In heaven there is no weeping; but, were the saints capable of sorrow, all their wailing should arise from the thought of having lost in this life the time in which they could have acquired greater glory, and from the conviction that this time shall never more be given to them. A deceased Benedictine nun appeared in glory to a certain person, and said that she was in heaven, and in the enjoyment of perfect happiness; but that, if she could desire anything, it would be to return to life, and to suffer affliction, in order to merit an increase of glory. And she added that, to acquire the glory which corresponded to a single Ave Maria, she would be content to suffer till the day of judgment the long and painful sickness which brought on her death. Hence, St. Francis Borgia was careful to employ every moment of his time for God. When others spoke of useless things, he conversed with God by holy affections; and so recollected was he that, when asked his opinion on the subject of conversation, he knew not what answer to make. Being corrected for this, he said: I am content to be considered stupid, rather than lose my time in vanities.

5. Some of you will say: "What evil am I doing?" Is it not, I ask, an evil to spend your time in plays, in conversations, and useless occupations, which are unprofitable to the soul? Does God give you this time to lose it? "Let not," says the Holy Ghost, "the part of a good gift overpass thee." (Eccl. 14:14.) The workmen of whom St. Matthew speaks did no evil; they only lost time by remaining idle in the streets. But they were rebuked by the father of the family, saying: "Why stand you here all the day idle?" (Matt. 20:6.) On the day of judgment Jesus Christ shall demand an account, not only of every month and day that has been lost, but even of every idle word. "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall render an account for it on the day of judgment." (Matt. 12:36.) He shall likewise demand an account of every moment of the time which you shall lose. According to St. Bernard, all time which is not spent for God is lost time. "Omne tempus quo de Deo non cogitasti, cogita te perdisse." (Coll. 1, cap. viii.) Hence the Holy Ghost says: "Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it earnestly: for neither work nor reason . . . shall be in hell, whither thou art hastening." (Eccl. 9:10.) What you can do to-day defer not till to-morrow; for on to-morrow you may be dead, and may be gone into another world, where you shall have no more time to do good, and where you shall only enjoy the reward of your virtues, or suffer the punishment due to your sins. "To-day if you shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts." (Ps. 94:8.) God calls you to confess your sins, to restore ill-gotten goods, to be reconciled with your enemies. Obey his call to-day; for it may happen that on to-morrow time may be no more for you, or that God will call you no more. All our salvation depends on corresponding with the divine calls, and at the time that God calls us.

6. But some of you will perhaps say: I am young; after some time I will give myself to God. But, remember that the gospel tells us, that Jesus Christ cursed the fig tree which he found without fruit, although the season for figs had not yet arrived. "It was not the time for figs." (Mark 11:13.) By this the Saviour wished to signify, that man at all times, even in youth, should produce fruits of good works; and that otherwise, like the fig tree, he shall be cursed, and shall produce no fruit for the future. "May no man hereafter eat any more fruit of thee for ever." (Ibid., v. 14.) "Delay not to be converted to the Lord, and defer it not from day to day; for his wrath shall come on a sudden." (Eccl. 5:8, 9.) If you find your soul in the state of sin, delay not your repentance nor your confession; do not put them off even till to-morrow; for, if you do not obey the voice of God calling you to-day to confess your sins, death may this day overtake you in sin, and to-morrow there may be no hope of salvation for you. The devil regards the whole of our life as very short, and therefore he loses not a moment of time, but tempts us day and night. "The devil is come down unto you having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time." (Apoc. 12:12.) The enemy, then, never loses time in seeking to bring us to hell: and shall we squander the time which God has given us to save our souls?

7. You say: "I will hereafter give myself to God." But "why," answers St. Bernard, "do you, a miserable, sinner, presume on the future, as if the Father placed time in your power?" (Serm. xxxviii., de Part., etc.) Why do you presume that you will hereafter give yourself to God, as if he had given to you the time and opportunity of returning to him whenever you wish: Job said with trembling, that he knew not whether another moment of his life remained: "For I know not how long I shall continue, and whether after a while my Maker may take me away." (32:22.) And you say: I will not go to confession to-day; I will think of it to-morrow. "Diem tenes," says St. Augustine, "qui horam non tenes." How can you promise yourself another day, when you know not whether you shall live another hour? "If," says St. Teresa, " 'you are not prepared to die to-day,' tremble, lest you die an unhappy death."

8. St. Bernardine weeps over the blindness of those negligent Christians who squander the days of salvation, and never consider that a day once lost shall never return. "Transeunt dies, salutis et nemo recogitat sibi perire diem ut nunquam rediturum." (Serm. ad Scholar.) At the hour of death they shall wish for another year, or for another day; but they shall not have it: they shall then be told that "time shall be no more." What price would they not then give for another week, for a day, or even for an hour, to prepare the account which they must then render to God? St. Lawrence Justinian says, that for a single hour they would give all their property, all their honours, and all their delights. "Erogaret opes, honores delicias, pro una horula." (Vit. Solit., cap. x.) But this hour shall not be granted to them. The priest who attends them shall say: Depart, depart immediately from this earth; for your time is no more. "Go forth, Christian soul, from this world."

9. What will it profit the sinner who has led an irregular life, to exclaim at death: O! that I had led a life of sanctity! O! that I had spent my years in loving God! How great is the anguish of a traveller, who, when the night has fallen, perceives that he has missed the way, and that there is no more time to correct his mistake! Such shall be the anguish at death of those who have lived many years in the world, but have not spent them for God. "The night cometh when no man can work." (John 9:4.) Hence the Redeemer says to all: "Walk whilst you have light, that the darkness overtake you not." (John 12:35.) Walk in the way of salvation, now that you have the light, before you are surprised by the darkness of death, in which you can do nothing. You can then only weep over the time which you have lost.

10. He hath called against me the time." (Thren. 1:15.) At the hour of death, conscience will remind us of all the time which we have had to become saints, and which we have employed in multiplying our debts to God. It will remind us of all the calls and of all the graces which he has given us to make us love him, and which we have abused. At that awful moment we shall also see that the way of salvation is closed for ever. In the midst of these remorses, and of the torturing darkness of death, the dying sinner shall say: O fool that I have been! O life misspent! O lost years, in which I could have gained treasures of merits, and have become a saint! but I have neglected both, and now the time of saving my soul is gone for ever. But of what use shall these wailings and lamentations be, when the scene of this world is about to close, the lamp is on the point of being extinguished, and when the dying Christian has arrived at that great moment on which eternity depends?

11. "Be you then also ready; for, at what hour you think not, the Son of Man will come." (Luke 12:40.) The Lord says: "Be prepared." He does not tell us to prepare ourselves when death approaches, but to be ready for his coming; because when we think least of death, the Son of Man shall come and demand an account of our whole life. In the confusion of death, it will be most difficult to adjust our accounts, so as to appear guiltless before the tribunal of Jesus Christ. Perhaps death may not come upon us for twenty or thirty years; but it may also come very soon, perhaps in a year or in a month. If any one had reason to fear that a trial should take place, on which his life depended, he certainly would not wait for the day of the trial, but would as soon as possible employ an advocate to plead his cause. And what do we do? We know for certain that we must one day be judged, and that on the result of that judgment our eternal, not our temporal, life depends. We also know that that day may be very near at hand; and still we lose our time, and, instead of adjusting our accounts, we go on daily multiplying the crimes which will merit for us the sentence of eternal death.

12. If, then, we have hitherto employed our time in offending God, let us henceforth endeavour to bewail our misfortune for the remainder of our life, and say continually with the penitent King Ezechias: "I will recount to thee all my years in the bitterness of my soul." (Isa. 38:15.) The Lord gives us the remaining days of life, that we may compensate the time that has been badly spent. "Whilst we have time, let us work good." (Gal. 6:10.) Let us not provoke the Lord to punish us by an unhappy death; and if, during the years that are passed, we have been foolish, and have offended him, let us now attend to the Apostle exhorting us to be wise for the future, and to redeem the time we have lost. "See, therefore, brethren, now you walk circumspectly, not as unwise, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil, . . . understanding what is the will of God." (Eph. 5:15, 16, 17.) "The days are evil." According to St. Anselm, the meaning of these words is, that the days of this life are evil, because in them we are exposed to a thousand temptations and dangers of eternal misery; and therefore, to escape perdition, all possible care is necessary. "What," says St. Augustine, "is meant by redeeming the time, unless, when necessary, to submit to temporal loss in order to gain eternal goods?" (de hom. 50, hom, i.) We should live only to fulfil with all diligence the divine will; and, should it be necessary, it is better to suffer in temporal things, than to neglect our eternal interests. Oh! how well did St. Paul redeem the time which he had lost! St. Jerome says, that though the last of the apostles, he was, on account of his great labours, the first in merits. "Paul, the last in order, but the first in merits, because he laboured more than all." Let us consider that, in each moment, we may lay up greater treasures of eternal goods. If the possession of all the land round which you could walk, or of all the money which you could count in a day, were promised you, would you lose time? or would you not instantly begin to walk over the ground, or to reckon the money? You now have it in your power to acquire, in each moment, eternal treasures; and will you, notwithstanding, misspend your time? Do not say, that what you can do to-day you can also do to-morrow; because this day shall be then lost to you, and shall never return. You have this day; but perhaps to-morrow will not be given you.

Sermon XXV

FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER EASTER

ON OBEDIENCE TO YOUR CONFESSOR

"Whither goest thou?"—JOHN 13:16.

TO gain heaven we must walk in the path that leads to Paradise. Many Christians, who have faith, but not works, live in sin, intent only on the pleasures and goods of this world. If you say to one of them: you are a Christian; you believe that there is an eternity, a heaven, and a hell: tell me, do you wish to save your soul? If you do, I will ask you, in the words of this day's gospel, "whither goest thou?" He will answer: I do not know, but I hope to be saved. You know not whither you are going. How can you hope for salvation from God, if you live in a state of perdition? How can you expect heaven, if you walk in the way that leads to hell? It is necessary, then, to change the road; and for this purpose you must put yourself in the hands of a good confessor, who will point out to you the way to heaven, and you must obey him punctually. "My sheep," said Jesus Christ, "hear my voice." (John 10:27.) We have not Jesus Christ on earth to make us sensibly hear his voice; but, in his stead, he has left us his priests, and has told us, that he who hears them hears him, and he who despises them despises him. "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me." (Luke 10:16.) Happy they who are obedient to their spiritual father: unhappy they who do not obey him; for, by their disobedience, they give a proof that they are not among the sheep of Jesus Christ. I intend this day to show, in the first point, how secure of salvation are all who obey their confessor; and, in the second point, how great the danger of perdition to which they who do not obey him are exposed.

FIRST POINT. HOW SECURE OF SALVATION ARE THEY WHO OBEY THEIR CONFESSOR.

1. In leaving us spiritual fathers to guide us in the way of salvation Jesus Christ has bestowed upon us a great benefit. To obtain salvation we must follow the will of God in all things. What, I ask, is necessary in order to save our souls and to become saints? Some imagine that sanctity consists in performing many works of penance; but were a sick man to perform mortifications which would expose him to the proximate danger of death, he would, instead of becoming a saint, be guilty of a very grievous sin. Others think that perfection consists in long and frequent prayers; but should the father of a family neglect the education of his children and go into the desert to pray, he, too, would commit sin; because, although prayer is good, a parent is bound to take care of his children, and he can fulfil the precept of prayer and attention to their instruction without going into the desert. Others believe that holiness consists in frequent communion; but if, in spite of a just command of her husband, and to the injury of her family, a married woman wished to communicate every morning, she would act improperly, and would have to render an account of her conduct to God. In what, then, does sanctity consist? It consists in the perfect fulfilment of the will of God. All the sins which brings souls to hell proceed from self-will; let us, then, says St. Bernard, cease to do our own will; let us follow the will of God, and for us there shall be no hell. "Cesset propria voluntas, et infernus non erit." (St. Bern. serm. iii., de Resur.)

2. But some of you will ask: How shall we know what God wills us to do? This is a matter which, according to David, is involved in great doubts and obscurity. "Of the business that walketh about in the dark." (Ps. 90:6.) Many deceive themselves; for passion often makes them believe that they do the will of God, when, in reality, they do their own will. Let us thank without ceasing the goodness of Jesus Christ, who has taught us the secure means of ascertaining the will of God in our regard, by telling us that, if we obey our confessor, we obey himself. "He that heareth you, heareth me." In the book of the foundations, chapter x., St. Teresa says: "Let a soul take a confessor with a determination to think no more of herself, but to trust in the words of our Lord: 'He that heareth you, heareth me.' " She adds, that this is the secure way of finding the will of God. Hence the saint acknowledged that it was by obedience to the voice of her director that she attained to the knowledge and love of God. Hence, speaking of obedience to one's confessor, St. Francis de Sales adopts the words of Father M. Avila. How much soever you seek, you shall never find the will of God so securely, as by this way of humble obedience so much recommended and practised by the ancient saints. (Introd., etc., cap. iv.)

3. He that acts according to the advice of his confessor, always pleases God when, through obedience, he either practises or omits prayer, mortifications, or communions. He even merits a reward before God when, to obey his confessor, he takes recreation, when he eats or drinks, because he does the will of God. Hence the Scripture says that "much better is obedience than the victories of fools." (Eccl. 4:17.) Obedience is more pleasing to God than all the sacrifices of penitential works, or of alms-deeds, which we can offer to him. He that sacrifices to God his property by alms-deeds, his honour by bearing insults, or his body by mortifications, by fasts and penitential rigours, offers to him a part of himself and of what belongs to him; but he that sacrifices to God his will, by obedience, gives to him all that he has, and can say: Lord, having given you my will, I have nothing more to give you.

4. Thus, obedience to a confessor is the most acceptable offering which we can make to God, and the most secure way of doing the divine will. Blessed Henry Suson says, that God does not demand an account of what we do through obedience. Obey, says the Apostle, your spiritual fathers; and fear not anything which you do through obedience; for they, and not you, shall have to render an account of your conduct. "Obey your prelates, and be subject to them; for they watch, as being to render an account of your souls; that they may do this with joy and not with grief." (Heb. 13:17.) Mark the last words: they signify, that penitents should obey without reply, and without causing pain and sorrow to their confessor. Oh! what grief do confessors feel when penitents endeavour, by certain pretexts and unjust complaints, to excuse themselves from obedience! Let us, then, obey our spiritual father without reply, and let us fear not that we shall have to account for any act which we do through obedience. "They," says St. Philip Neri, "who desire to advance in the way of God, should place themselves under a learned confessor, whom they will obey in the place of God. They who do so may be assured that they shall not have to render to God an account of their actions." Hence, if you practice obedience, and if Jesus Christ should ask you on the day of judgment why you have chosen such a state of life? why you have communicated so frequently? why you have omitted certain works of penance? you will answer: O Lord, I have done all in obedience to my confessor: and Jesus Christ cannot but approve of what you have done.

5. Father Marchese relates, that St. Dominic once felt a scruple in obeying his confessor, and that our Lord said to him: "Why do you hesitate to obey your director? All that he directs will be useful to you." Hence St. Bernard says, that "whatever a man, holding the place of God commands, provided it be not certainly sinful, should be received as if the command came from God himself" (de Præcep. et Discep., cap. xi.). Gerson relates, that the same St. Bernard ordered one of his disciples, who, through scruples, was afraid to say Mass, to go, and trusting in his advice, to offer the holy sacrifices. The disciple obeyed, and was cured of scruples. Some, adds Gerson, will say: "Would to God that I had a St. Bernard for my director: my confessor is not a

St. Bernard. "Whosoever you are that speak in this manner, you err; for you have not put yourself under the care of man because he is learned, but because he is placed over you. Obey him, then, not as a man, but as God." (Tract. de Præp. ad Miss.) You have intrusted the care of your soul to a confessor, not because he is a man of learning, but because God has given him to you as a guide; and, therefore, you ought to obey him, not as a man, but as God.

6. "An obedient man shall speak of victory." (Prov. 21:28.) Justly, says St. Gregory, has the Wise Man asserted, that they who are obedient shall overcome the temptations of hell: because, as by their obedience, they subject their own will to men, so they make themselves superior to the devils, who fell through disobedience. "The obedient are conquerors; because, whilst they subject their will to others, they rule over the angels that have fallen through disobedience" (in lib. Reg., cap. x.) Cassian teaches, that he who mortifies self-will beats down all vices; because all vices proceed from self-will. "By the mortification of the will all vices are dried up." He who obeys his confessor, overcomes all the illusions of the devil, who sometimes makes us expose ourselves to dangerous occasions under pretext of doing good, and makes us engage in certain undertakings which appear holy, but which may prove very injurious to us. Thus, for example, the enemy induces certain devout persons to practise immoderate austerities, which impair their health; they then give up all mortifications, and return to their former irregularities. This happens to those who direct themselves; but they who are guided by their confessor are not in danger of falling into such an illusion.

7. The devil labours to make scrupulous persons afraid that they will commit sin if they follow the advice of their confessor. We must be careful to overcome these vain fears. All theologians and spiritual writers commonly teach, that it is our duty to obey the directions of our confessors, and conquer our scruples. Natalis Alexander says, that we must act against scruples; and in support of this doctrine, he adduces the doctrine of St. Antonine, who, along with Gerson, censures scrupulous persons for refusing, through vain fears, to obey their confessor, and to overcome scruples. "Beware, lest, while you seek security, you rush into a pit." Be careful not, through an excess of fear, to fall into the illusions of the devil, by disobeying your director. Hence all the spiritual masters exhort us to obey our confessors in everything which is not manifestly sinful. B. Hubert, of the order of St. Dominic, says that, "unless what is commanded is evidently bad, it ought to be received as if it were commanded by God" (lib. de Erud. Rel., cap. 1). Blessed Denis the Carthusian teaches, that "in doubtful matters we must obey the precept of a superior; because, though it may be against God, a subject is excused from sin on account of obedience" (in 2, dis. xxxix., qu. 3). According to Gerson (tr. de consc. et scrup.), to act against a conscience formed with deliberation, and to act against a fear of sinning in some doubtful matter, are very different things. He adds, that we should banish this fear, and obey our confessor. "Iste timor, quam fieri potest adjiciendus." In a word, he who obeys his spiritual father is always secure. St. Francis de Sales used to say, that "a truly obedient soul has never been lost;" and that we should be satisfied to know from our confessor that we are going on well in the way of God, without seeking further certainty of it.

SECOND POINT. HOW GREAT IS THE DANGER OF PERDITION TO WHICH THEY WHO DO NOT OBEY THEIR CONFESSOR ARE EXPOSED.

8. Jesus Christ has said, that he who hears his priest, hears him; and that he who despises them, despises him. "Qui vos spernit, me spernit." (Luc. 10:15.) When the Prophet Eliseus complained of the contempt which he had received from the people, after God had charged him with the direction of them, the Lord said to him: "They have not rejected thee, but me, that I should not reign over them." (1 Kings 8:7.) They, then, who despise the advice of their confessors, despise God himself, who has made confessors his own representatives.

9. "Obey your prelates," says St. Paul, "and be subject to them; for they watch, as being to render an account of your souls: that they may do this with joy and not with grief; for, this is not expedient for you." (Heb. 13:17.) Some penitents contend with their confessor, and endeavour to make him adopt their own opinion. This is the cause of grief to spiritual directors. But the apostle says, "this is not expedient for you;" because, when the confessor finds that you do not obey him, and that it is only with difficulty he can induce you to walk in the straight path, he will give up the direction of your soul. How deplorable the condition of a vessel which a pilot refuses to steer! How miserable the state of a sick man who is abandoned by his physician! When a patient refuses to obey, or to take the medicine which has been prescribed—when he eats and drinks what he pleases—the physician abandons him, and allows him to follow his own caprice. But, what hope can be entertained of the recovery of such a patient? "Woe to him that is alone, . . . he hath none to lift him up." (Eccl. 4:10.) Woe to the penitent who wishes to direct himself: he shall have no one to enlighten or correct him, he will therefore rush into an abyss.

10. To every one that comes into this world the Holy Ghost says: "Thou art going in the midst of snares." (Eccl. 9:20.) We all, on this earth, walk in the midst of a thousand snares; that is, in the midst of the temptations of the devil, dangerous occasions, bad companions, and our own passions, which frequently deceive us. Who shall be saved in the midst of so many dangers? The Wise Man says: "He that is aware of the snares shall be secure." (Prov. 11:15.) They only who avoid these snares shall be saved. How shall we avoid them? If you had to pass by night through a wood full of precipices, without a guide to give you light, and to point out to you the dangerous passages, you would certainly run a great risk of losing your life. You wish to direct yourself: "Take heed, therefore, that the light which is in thee be not darkness." (Luke 11:45.) The light which you think you possess will be your ruin; it will lead you into a pit.

11. God wills that, in the way of salvation, we all submit to the guidance of our director. Such has been the practice of even the most learned among the saints. In spiritual things the Lord wishes us to humble ourselves, and to put ourselves under a confessor, who will be our guide. Gerson teaches, that he who neglects the advice of his director, and directs himself, does not require a devil to tempt him: he becomes a devil to himself. "Qui spreto duce, sibi dux esse vult, non indiget dæmone tentante, quia factus est sibi ipse dæmon." (Cons. de Lib. Reg.) And when God sees that he will not obey his minister, he allows him to follow his own caprice. "So I let them go according to the desires of their own hearts." (Ps. 80:13.)

12. "It is like the sin of witchcraft to rebel: and like the crime of idolatry to refuse to obey." (1 Kings 15:23.) In explaining this text, St. Gregory says, that the sin of idolatry consists in abandoning God and adoring an idol. This a penitent does when he disobeys his confessor to do his own will: he refuses to do the will of God, who has spoken to him by means of his minister; he adores the idol of self-will, and does what he pleases. Hence St. John of the Cross says that, "not to follow the advice of our confessor is pride and a want of faith." (Tratt. delle spine, tom. iii., col. 4, § 2, n. 8); for it appears to proceed from a want of faith in the Gospel, in which Jesus Christ has said: "He that heareth you, heareth me."

13. If, then, you wish to save your souls, obey your confessor punctually. Be careful to have a fixed confessor, to whom you will ordinarily make your confession; and avoid going about from one confessor to another. Make choice of a learned priest; and, in the beginning, make to him a general confession, which, as we know by experience, is a great help to a true change of life. After having made choice of a confessor, you should not leave him without a just and manifest cause. "Every time," says St. Teresa, "That I resolved to leave my confessor, I felt within me a reproof more painful than that which I received from him."

Sermon XXVI

FIFTH SUNDAY AFTER EASTER

ON THE CONDITIONS OF PRAYER

"Ask, and ye shall receive."—JOHN 16:24.

IN the thirty-ninth Sermon I shall show the strict necessity of prayer, and its infallible efficacy to obtain for us all the graces which can be conducive to our eternal salvation. "Prayer," says St. Cyprian, "is omnipotent; it is one; it can do all things." We read in Ecclesiasticus that God has never refused to hear any one who invoked his aid. "Who hath called upon him, and he hath despised him?" (Eccl. 2:12.) This he never can do; for he has promised to hear all who pray to him. "Ask, and ye shall receive." But this promise extends only to prayer which has the necessary conditions. Many pray; but because they pray negligently, they do not obtain the graces they deserve. "You ask, and receive not, because you ask amiss." (St. James 4:3.) To pray as we ought, we must pray, first, with humility; secondly, with confidence; and thirdly, with perseverance.

FIRST POINT. WE MUST PRAY WITH HUMILITY.

1. St. James tells us, that God rejects the prayers of the proud: "God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble" (4:6). He cannot bear the proud; he rejects their petitions, and refuses to hear them. Let those proud Christians who trust in their own strength, and think themselves better than others, attend to this, and let them remember that their prayers shall be rejected by the Lord.

2. But he always hears the prayers of the humble: "The prayer of him that humbleth himself pierceth the clouds; and he will not depart till the Most High behold." (Eccl. 35:21.) David says, that "The Lord hath had regard to the prayer of the humble." (Ps. 101:18.) The cry of the humble man penetrates the heavens, and he will not depart till God hears his prayer. "You humble yourself," says St. Augustine, "and God comes to you; you exalt yourself, and he flies from you." If you humble yourself, God himself comes, of his own accord, to embrace you; but, if you exalt yourself, and boast of your wisdom and of your actions, he withdraws from you, and abandons you to your own nothingness.

3. The Lord cannot despise even the most obdurate sinners, when they repent from their hearts, and humble themselves before him, acknowledging that they are unworthy to receive any favour from him. "A contrite and humble heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." (Ps. 50:19.) Let us pass to the other points, in which there is a great deal to be said.

SECOND POINT. WE MUST PRAY WITH CONFIDENCE.

4. "No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded." (Eccl. 2:11.) Oh! how encouraging to sinners are these words! Though they may have committed the most enormous crimes, they are told by the Holy Ghost, that "no man hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded." No man hath ever placed his trust in God, and has been abandoned. He that prays with confidence obtains whatever he asks. "All things whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you." (Mark 11:24.) When we pray for spiritual favours, let us have a secure confidence of receiving them, and we shall infallibly obtain them. Hence the Saviour has taught us to call God, in our petitions for his graces, by no other name than that of Father (Our Father), that we may have recourse to him with the confidence with which a child seeks assistance from an affectionate parent.

5. Who, says St. Augustine, can fear that Jesus Christ, who is truth itself, can violate his promise to all who pray to him? "Who shall fear deception when truth promises?" Is God like men, who promise, and do not afterwards fulfil their promise, either because in making it they intend to deceive, or because, after having made it, they change their intention? "God is not as a man, that he should lie, nor as the son of man, that he should be changed. Hath he told, then, and will he not do?" (Num. 23:19.) Our God cannot tell a lie; because he is truth itself: he is not liable to change; because all his arrangements are just and holy.

6. And because he ardently desires our welfare, he earnestly exhausts and commands us to ask the graces we stand in need of. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you." (Matt. 7:7.) Why, says St. Augustine, should the Lord exhort us so strongly to ask his graces, if he did not wish to give them to us? "Non nos hortaretur, ut peteremus, nisi dare vellet" (de Verb. Dom., ser. v.) He has even bound himself by his promise to hear our prayers, and to bestow upon us all the graces which we ask with a confidence of obtaining them. "By his promises he has made himself a debtor." (S. Augus., ibid., ser. ii.)

7. But some will say: I have but little confidence in God, because I am a sinner. I have been too ungrateful to him, and therefore I see that I do not deserve to be heard. But St. Thomas tells us, that the efficacy of our prayers in obtaining graces from God, does not depend on our merits, but on the divine mercy. "Oratio in impetrando non innititur nostris meritis, sed soli divinæ misericordiæ" (2, 2, qu. 178, a. 2, ad. 1.) As often as we ask with confidence favours which are conducive to our eternal salvation, God hears our prayer. I have said, "favours conducive to our salvation;" for, if what we seek be injurious to the soul, God does not, and cannot hear us. For example: if a person asked help from God to be revenged of an enemy, or to accomplish what would be offensive to God, the Lord will not hear his prayers; because, says St. Chrysostom, such a person offends God in the very act of prayer; he does not pray, but, in a certain manner mocks God. "Qui orat et peccat, non rogat Deum, sed eludit." (Hom. xi., in Matt. vi.)

8. Moreover, if you wish to receive from God the aid which you ask, you must remove every obstacle which may render you unworthy of being heard. For example: if you ask of God strength to preserve you from relapsing into a certain sin, but will not avoid the occasions of the sin, nor keep at a distance from the house, from the object, or the bad company, which led to your fall, God will not hear your prayer. And why? Because "thou hast set a cloud before thee, that prayer may not pass through." (Thren. 3:44.) Should you relapse, do not complain of God, nor say: I have besought the Lord to preserve me from falling into sin, but he has not heard me. Do you not see that, by not taking away the occasions of sin, you have interposed a thick cloud, which has prevented your prayers from passing to the throne of divine mercy.

9. It is also necessary to remark that the promise of Jesus Christ to hear those who pray to him does not extend to all the temporal favours which we ask—such as a plentiful harvest, a victory in a law-suit, or a deliverance from sickness, or from certain persecutions. These favours God grants to those who pray for them; but only when they are conducive to their spiritual welfare. Otherwise he refuses them; and he refuses them because he loves us, and because he knows that they would be injurious to our souls. "A physician," says St. Augustine, "knows better than his patient what is useful for him" (tom. 3, cap. ccxii). The saint adds that God refuses to some, through mercy, what he grants to others as a chastisement. "Deus negat propitius, quæ concedit iratus." Hence St. John Damascene says that sometimes, when we do not obtain the graces which we ask, we receive, by not receiving them; because it is better for us not to receive than to receive them. "Etiam si non accipias, non accipendo accepisti, interdum enim non accipere quam accipendo satius est." (Paral., lib. 3, cap. xv.) We often ask poison which would cause our death. How many are there who, had they died in the sickness or poverty with which they had been afflicted, should be saved? But because they recovered their health, or because they were raised to wealth and honours, they became proud and forgot God, and thus have been damned. Hence St. Chrysostom exhorts us to ask in our prayers what he knows to be expedient for us. "Orantes in ejus potestate ponamus, ut nos illud petentes exaudiat, quod ipse nobis expendire cognoscit." (Hom. xv. in Matt.) We should, then, always ask from God temporal favours on the condition that they will be useful to the soul.

10. But spiritual favours, such as the pardon of our sins, perseverance in virtue, the gift of divine love, and resignation to the divine will, ought to be asked of God absolutely, and with a firm confidence of obtaining them. "If you, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father from Heaven give the good Spirit to them that ask him?" (Luke 11:13.) If you, says Jesus Christ, who are so much attached to earthly goods, cannot refuse your children the blessings which you have received from God, how much more will your Heavenly Father (who is in himself infinitely good, and who desires to give you his graces more ardently than you desire to receive them) give the good spirit—that is, a sincere contrition for their sins, the gift of divine love, and resignation to the will of God—to those who ask them? "Quando Deus negabit," says St. Bernard, "potentibus qui etiam non potentes hortatur ut petant?" (Ser. ii. de S. Andr.) How can God refuse graces conducive to salvation to those who seek them, when he exhorts even those who do not pray to ask them?

11. Nor does God inquire whether the person who prays to him is a just man or a sinner; for he has declared that "every one that asketh, receiveth." (Luke 11:10.) "Every one," says the author of the Imperfect Work, "whether he be a just man or a sinner." (Hom. xviii.) And, to encourage us to pray and to ask with confidence for spiritual favours, he has said: "Amen, amen, I say to you: If you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you." (John 16:23.) As if he said: Sinners, though you do not deserve to receive the divine graces, I have merited them for you from my Father: ask, then, in my name—that is, through my merits—and I promise that you shall obtain whatsoever you demand.

THIRD POINT. WE MUST PRAY WITH PERSEVERANCE.

12. It is, above all, necessary to persevere in prayer till death, and never to cease to pray. This is what is inculcated by the following passages of Scripture:—"We ought always to pray." (Luke 18:1.) "Watch ye, therefore, praying at all times" (21:36). "Pray without ceas ing." (1 Thess. 5:17.) Hence the Holy Ghost says: "Let nothing hinder thee from praying always." (Eccl. 18:22.) These words imply, not only that we should pray always, but also that we should endeavour to remove every occasion which may prevent us from praying; for, if we cease to pray, we shall be deprived of the divine aid, and shall be overcome by temptations. Perseverance in grace is a gratuitous gift, which, as the Council of Trent has declared, we cannot merit (Ses. 6, cap. xiii.); but St. Augustine says, that we may obtain it by prayer. "Hoe donum Dei suppliciter emereri, potest id est supplicando impetrari." (de Dono. Per., cap. vi.) Hence Cardinal Bellarmine teaches that "we must ask it daily, in order to obtain it every day." If we neglect to ask i t on any day, we may fall into sin on that day.

13. If, then, we wish to persevere and to be saved—for no one can be saved without perseverance—we must pray continually. Our perseverance depends; not on one grace, but on a thousand helps which we hope to obtain from God during our whole lives, that we may be preserved in his grace. Now, to this chain of graces a chain of prayers on our part must correspond; without these prayers, God ordinarily does not grant his graces. If we neglect to pray, and thus break the chain of prayers, the chain of graces shall also be broken, and we shall lose the grace of perseverance. If, says Jesus Christ to his disciples, one of you go during the night to a friend, and say to him: Lend me three loaves; an acquaintance has come to my house, and I have no refreshment for him. The friend will answer: I am in bed; the door is locked; I cannot get up. But, if the other continue to knock at the door, and will not depart, the friend will rise, and give him as many loaves as he wishes, not through friendship, but to be freed from his importunity. "Although he will not rise and give him because he is his friend; yet, because of his importunity, he will rise, and give him as many as he needeth." (Luke 11:8.) Now, if a man will give his loaves to a friend because of his importunity, "how much more," says St. Augustine, "will God give, who exhorts us to ask, and is displeased if we do not ask?" How much more will the Lord bestow on us his graces, if we persevere in praying for them, when he exhorts us to ask them, and is offended if we do not ask them?

14. Men feel annoyed at being frequently and importunately asked for a favour. But God exhorts us to pray frequently; and, instead of being dissatisfied, he is pleased with those who repeatedly ask his graces. Cornelius a Lapide says, that "God wishes us to persevere in prayer, even to importunity." (in Luc., cap. xi.) St. Jerome says: "This importunity with the Lord is seasonable." (in Luc. xi.) That God is pleased with frequent and persevering prayer, may be inferred from the words of Jesus Christ: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you." (Luke 11:9.) It was not enough to have said ask, but he added, seek, knock; in order to show, that, during our whole lives, we should be as importunate in supplicating the divine graces as beggars are in asking alms. Though they should be refused, they do not cease to cry out, or to knock at the door; they persist in asking relief till they obtain it.

15. If, then, we wish to obtain from God the gift of perseverance, we must ask it from him continually and with importunity. We must ask it when we rise in the morning, in our meditations, in hearing Mass, in our visits to the blessed sacrament, in going to bed at night, and particularly when we are tempted by the devil to commit any sin. Thus, we must always have our mouths open praying to God, and saying: Lord, assist me; give me light; give me strength; keep thy hand upon me, and do not abandon me. We must do violence to the Lord. "Such violence," says Tertullian, "is agreeable to God." The violence which we offer to God by repeated prayers does not offend him: on the contrary, it is pleasing and acceptable in his sight. "Prayer," according to St. John Climacus, "piously offers violence to God." Our supplications compel him, but in a manner grateful to him. He takes great complacency in seeing his mother honoured, and therefore wishes, as St. Bernard says, that all the graces we receive should pass through her hands. Hence the holy doctor exhorts us "to seek grace, and to seek it through Mary, because she is a mother, and her prayer cannot be fruitless." (de Aquæd.) When we ask her to obtain any grace for us, she graciously hears our petitions and prays for us: and the prayers of Mary are never rejected.

Sermon XXVII

SIXTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST, OR THE SUNDAY WITHIN THE OCTAVE OF THE ASCENSION

ON HUMAN RESPECT

"Whosoever killeth you, will think that he doeth a service to God." JOHN 16:2.

IN exhorting his disciples to be faithful to him under the persecution which they were to endure, the Saviour said: "Yea, the hour cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doeth a service to God." Thus, the enemies of the faith believed that in putting Christians to death they did a service to God. It is thus that many Christians of the present day act. They kill their own souls by losing the grace of God through human respect and to please worldly friends. Oh! how many souls has human respect—that great enemy of our salvation—sent to hell! I shall speak on this subject to-day, that, if you wish to serve God and save your souls, you may guard as much as possible against human respect. In the first point, I will show the importance of not being influenced by human respect; and in the second, I will point out the means by which this vice may be overcome.

FIRST POINT. ON THE IMPORTANCE OF NOT BEING INFLUENCED BY HUMAN RESPECT.

1. "Woe to the world because of scandals." (Matt. 18:7.) Jesus Christ has said, that through the scandals of the wicked, many souls fall into hell. But how is it possible to live in the midst of the world, and not to take scandal? This is impossible. To avoid taking scandal, St. Paul says, we should leave this world. "Otherwise you must needs go out of this world." (1 Cor. 5:10.) But it is in our power to avoid familiarity with scandalous sinners. Hence the Apostle adds: "But now I have written to you not to keep company . . . with such an one, not as much as to eat." (Ibid. 5:11.) We should bewar e of contracting intimacy with such sinners; for, should we be united with them in the bonds of friendship, we shall feel an unwillingness to oppose their bad practices and bad counsels. Thus, through human respect and the fear of contradicting them, we will imitate their example, and lose the friendship of God.

2. Such lovers of the world not only glory in their own iniquities ("They rejoice in most wicked things." Prov. 2:14); but, what is worse, they wish to have companions, and ridicule all who endeavour to live like true Christians and to avoid the dangers of offending God. This is a sin which is very displeasing to God, and which he forbids in a particular manner. "Despise not a man that turneth away from sin, nor reproach him therewith." (Eccl. 8:6.) Despise not those who keep at a distance from sin, and seek not to draw them to evil by your reproaches and irregularities. The Lord declares, that, for those who throw ridicule on the virtuous, chastisements are prepared in this and in the next life. "Judgments are prepared for scorners, and striking hammers for the bodies of fools." (Prov. 19:29.) They mock the servants of God, and he shall mock them for all eternity. "But the Lord shall laugh them to scorn. And they shall fall after this without honour, and be a reproach among the dead for ever." (Wis. 4:18.) They endeavour to make the saints contemptible in the eyes of the world, and God shall make them die without honour, and shall send them to hell to suffer eternal ignominy among the damned.

3. Not only to offend God, but also to endeavour to make others offend him, is truly an enormous excess of wickedness. This execrable intention arises from a conviction that there are many weak and pusillanimous souls, who, to escape derision and contempt, abandon the practice of virtue, and give themselves up to a life of sin. After his conversion to God, St. Augustine wept for having associated with those ministers of Lucifer, and confessed, that he felt ashamed not to be as wicked and as shameless as they were. "Pudebat me," says the saint, "esse pudentem." How many, to avoid the scoffs of wicked friends, have been induced to imitate their wickedness! "Behold the saint," these impious scoffers will say; "get me a piece of his garment; I will preserve it as a relic. Why does he not become a monk?" How many also when they receive an insult, resolve to take revenge, not so much through passion, as to escape the reputation of being cowards! How many are there who, after having inadvertently given expression to a scandalous maxim, neglect to retract it (as they are bound to do), through fear of losing the esteem of others! How many, because they are afraid of forfeiting the favour of a friend, sell their souls to the devil! They imitate the conduct of Pilate, who, through the apprehension of losing the friendship of Cæsar, condemned Jesus Christ to death.

4. Be attentive. Brethren, if we wish to save our souls, we must overcome human respect, and bear the little confusion which may arise from the scoffs of the enemies of the cross of Jesus Christ. "For there is a shame that bringeth sin, and there is a shame that bringeth glory and grace." (Eccl. 4:25.) If we do not suffer this confusion with patience, it will lead us into the pit of sin; but if we submit to it for God's sake, it will obtain for us the divine grace here, and great glory hereafter. "As," says St. Gregory, "bashfulness is laudable in evil, so it is reprehensible in good." (Hom. x. in Ezech.)

5. But some of you will say: I attend to my own affairs; I wish to save my soul; why then should I be persecuted? But there is no remedy; it is impossible to serve God, and not be persecuted. "The wicked loathe them that are in the right way." (Prov. 29:27.) Sinners cannot bear the sight of the man who lives according to the Gospel, because his life is a continual censure on their disorderly conduct; and therefore they say: "Let us lie in wait for the just; because he is not for our turn, and he is contrary to our doings, and upbraideth us with transgressions of the law." (Wis. 2:12.) The proud man, who seeks revenge for every insult which he receives, would wish that all should avenge the offences that may be offered to him. The avaricious, who grow rich by injustice, wish that all should imitate their fraudulent practices. The drunkard wishes to see others indulge like himself in intoxication. The immoral, who boast of their impurities, and can scarcely utter a word which does not savour of obscenity, desire that all should act and speak as they do; and those who do not imitate their conduct, they regard as mean, clownish, and intractable—as men without honour and education. "They are of the world, therefore of the world they speak." (1 John 4:5.) Worldlings can speak no other language than that of the world. Oh! how great is their poverty and blindness! She has blinded them, and therefore they speak so profanely. "These things they thought, and were deceived; for their own malice blinded them." (Wis. 2:21.)

6. But I say again, that there is no remedy. All, as St. Paul says, who wish to live in union with Jesus Christ must be persecuted by the world. "And all that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution." (2 Tim. 3:12.) All the saints have been persecuted. You say: I do not injure any one; why then am I not left in peace? What evil have the saints, and particularly the martyrs, done? They were full of charity; they loved all, and laboured to do good to all; and how have they been treated by the world? They have been flayed alive; they have been tortured with red-hot plates of iron; and have been put to death in the most cruel manner. And whom has Jesus Christ—the saint of saints—injured? He consoled all; he healed all. "Virtue went out from him, and healed all." (Luke 6:19.) And how has the world treated him? It has persecuted him, so as to make him die through pain on the infamous gibbet of the cross.

7. This happens because the maxims of the world are diametrically opposed to the maxims of Jesus Christ. What the world esteems, Jesus Christ regards as folly. "For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God." (1 Cor. 3:19.) And what is foolish in the eyes of the world—that is, crosses, sickness, contempt, and ignominies—Jesus Christ holds in great estimation. "For the word of the cross, to them indeed that perish, is foolishness." (1 Cor. 1:18.) How, says St. Cyprian, can a man think himself to be a Christian, when he is afraid to be a Christian? "Christianum se putat si Christianum esse veretur?" (Ser. v. de Lapsis.) If we are Christians, let us show that we are Christians in name and in truth; for, if we are ashamed of Jesus Christ, he will be ashamed of us, and cannot give us a place on his right hand on the last day. "For he that shall be ashamed of me and my words, of him the Son of Man shall be ashamed when he shall come in his majesty." (Luke 9:26.) On the day of judgment he shall say: You have been ashamed of me on earth: I am now ashamed to see you with me in Paradise. Begone, accursed souls; go into hell to meet your companions, who have been ashamed of me. But mark the words "he that shall be ashamed of me and of my words." St. Augustine says, that some are ashamed to deny Jesus Christ, but do not blush to deny the maxims of Jesus Christ. "Erubescunt negare Christum, et non erubescunt negare verba Christi." (Serm. xlviii.) But you may tell me, that, if you say you cannot do such an act, because it is contrary to the Gospel, your friends will turn you into ridicule, and will call you a hypocrite. Then, says St. John Chrysostom, you will not suffer to be treated with derision by a companion, and you are content to be hated by God! "Non vis a conservo derideri, sed odio haberi a Deo tuo?" (Hom. xci. in Act. xix.)

8. The Apostle, who gloried in being a follower of Christ, said: "The world is crucified to me, and I to the world." (Gal. 6:14.) As I am a person crucified to the world—an object of its scoffs and injustice, so the world is to me an object of contempt and abomination. It is necessary to be convinced, that if we do not trample on the world, the world will trample on our souls. But what is the world and all its goods? "All that is in the world is the concupiscence of the flesh, and the concupiscence of the eyes, and the pride of life." (1 John 2:16.) To what are all the goods of this earth reduced? To riches, which are but dung; to honours, which are only smoke; and to carnal pleasures. But what shall all these profit us, if we lose our souls? "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his soul?" (Matt. 16:26.)

9. He that loves God and wishes to save his soul must despise the world and all human respect; and to do this, everyone must offer violence to himself. St. Mary Magdalene had to do great violence to herself, in order to overcome human respect and the murmurings and scoffs of the world, when, in the presence of so many persons, she cast herself at the feet of Jesus Christ, to wash them with her tears, and dry them with her hair. But she thus became a saint, and merited from Jesus Christ pardon of her sins, and praise for her great love. "Many sins are forgiven her because she hath loved much." (Luke 7:47.) One day, as St. Francis Borgia carried to certain prisoners a vessel of broth under his cloak, he met his son mounted on a fine horse, and accompanied by certain noblemen. The saint felt ashamed to show what he carried under his cloak. But what did he do in order to conquer human respect? He took the vessel of broth, placed it on his head, and thus showed his contempt for the world. Jesus Christ, our Head and Master, when nailed to the cross, was mocked by the soldiers. "If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross." (Matt. 27:40.) He was mocked by the priests, saying: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." (Ibid., v. 42.) But he remained firm on the cross; he cheerfully died upon it, and thus conquered the world.

10. "I give thanks to God," says St. Jerome, "that I am worthy to be hated by the world." (Epis. ad Asellam.) The saint returns thanks to God for having made him worthy of the hatred of the world. Jesus Christ pronounced his disciples blessed when they should be hated by men. "Blessed shall you be when men shall hate you." (Luke 6:22.) Christians, let us rejoice; for, if worldlings curse and upbraid us, God at the same time praises and blesses us. "They will curse, and thou wilt bless." (Ps. 108:28.) Is it not enough for us to be praised by God, to be praised by the queen of heaven, by all the angels, by all the saints, and by all just men? Let worldlings say what they wish; but let us continue to please God, who will give us, in the next life, a reward proportioned to the violence we shall have done to ourselves in despising the contradictions of men. Each of you should figure to himself, that there is no one in the world but himself and God. When the wicked treat us with contempt, let us recommend to God these blind and miserable men, who run in the road to perdition; and let us thank the Lord for giving to us the light which he refuses to them. Let us continue in our own way: to obtain all, it is necessary to conquer all.

SECOND POINT. ON THE MEANS OF OVERCOMING HUMAN RESPECT.

11. To overcome human respect, it is necessary to fix in our hearts the holy resolution of preferring the grace of God to all the goods and favours of this world, and to say with St. Paul: "Neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, . . . nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God." (Rom. 8:38, 39.) Jesus Christ exhorts us not to be afraid of those who can take away the life of the body; but to fear him only who can condemn the soul and body to hell. "And fear you not them that kill the body; but rather fear him that can destroy both soul and body into hell." (Matt. 10:28.) We wish either to follow God or the world; if we wish to follow God we must give up the world. "How long do you halt between two sides?" said Elias to the people. "If the Lord be God, follow him." (3 Kings 18:21.) You cannot serve God and the world. He that seeks to please men cannot please God. "If," says the Apostle, "I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ." (Gal. 1:10.)

12. The true servants of God rejoice to see themselves despised and maltreated for the sake of Jesus Christ. The holy apostles "went from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus." (Acts 5:41.) Moses could have prevented the anger of Pharaoh by not contradicting the current report that he was the son of Pharaoh's daughter. But he denied that he was her son, preferring, as St. Paul says, the opprobrium of Christ to all the riches of the world. "Choosing rather to be afflicted with the people of God; . . . esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasure of the Egyptians." (Heb. 11:25, 26.)

13. Wicked friends come to you and say: What extravagances are those in which you indulge? Why do you not act like others? Say to them in answer: My conduct is not opposed to that of all men; there are others who lead a holy life. They are indeed few; but I will follow their example; for the Gospel says: "Many are called, but few are chosen." (Matt. 20:16.) "If," says St. John Climacus, "you wish to be saved with the few, live like the few." But, they will add, do you not see that all murmur against you, and condemn your manner of living? Let your answer be: It is enough for me that God does not censure my conduct. Is it not better to obey God than to obey men? Such was the answer of St. Peter and St. John to the Jewish priests: "If it be just in the sight of God to hear you rather than God, judge ye." (Acts 4:19.) If they ask you how can you bear an insult? or how, after submitting to it, can you appear among your equals? answer them by saying that you are a Christian, and that it is enough for you to appear well in the eyes of God. Such should be your answer to all those satellites of Satan: you must despise all their maxims and reproaches. And when it is necessary to reprove those who make little of God's law, you must take courage and correct them publicly. "Them that sin, reprove before all." (1 Tim. 5:20.) And when there is ques tion of the divine honour, we should not be frightened by the dignity of the man who offends God; let us say to him openly: This is sinful; it cannot be done. Let us imitate the Baptist, who reproved King Herod for living with his brother's wife, and said to him: "It is not lawful for thee to have her." (Matt. 14:4.) Men indeed shall regard us as fools, and turn us into derision; but, on the day of judgment they shall acknowledge that they have been foolish, and we shall have the glory of being numbered among the saints. They shall say: "These are they whom we had sometime in derision. . . . We fools esteemed their life madness, and their end without honour. Behold how they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the saints." (Wis. 5:3, 4, 5.)

Sermon XXVIII

PENTECOST SUNDAY

ON CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

"As the Father hath given me commandment, so do I."—JOHN 14:31.

JESUS CHRIST was given to us, by God, as a saviour and as a master. Hence he came on earth principally to teach us, not only by his words but also by his own example, how we are to love God—our supreme good: hence, as we read in this day's Gospel, he said to his disciples: "That the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father hath given me commandment, so do I." To show the world the love I bear to the Father, I will execute all his commands. In another place he said: "I came down from heaven not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me." (John 6:38.) Devout souls, if you love God and desire to become saints, you must seek his will, and wish what he wishes. St. Paul tells us, that the divine love is poured into our souls by means of the Holy Ghost. "The charity of God is poured into our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given to us." (Rom. 5:5.) If, then, we wish for the gift of divine love, we must constantly beseech the Holy Ghost to make us know and do the will of God. Let us continually implore his light to know, and his strength to fulfil the divine will. Many wish to love God, but they, at the same time, wish to follow their own, and not his will. Hence I shall show to-day, in the first point, that our sanctification consists entirely in conformity to the will of God; and in the second, I shall show how, and in what, we should in practice conform ourselves to the divine will.

FIRST POINT. OUR SANCTIFICATION CONSISTS ENTIRELY IN CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD.

1. It is certain that our salvation consists in loving God. A soul that does not love God is not living, but dead. "He that loveth not, abideth in death." (1 John 3:14.) The perfection of love consists in conforming our will to the will of God. "And life in his good will." (Ps. 29:6.) "Have charity, which is the bond of perfection." (Col. 3:14.) According to the Areopagite, the principal effect of love is to unite the wills of lovers, so that they may have but one heart and one will. Hence all our works, communions, prayers, penances, and alms, please God in proportion to their conformity to the divine will; and if they be contrary to the will of God, they are no longer acts of virtue, but defects deserving chastisement.

2. Whilst preaching one day, Jesus Christ was told that his mother and brethren were waiting for him; in answer he said: "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father that is in heaven, he is my brother and sister and mother." (Matt. 12:50.) By these words he gave us to understand that he acknowledged as friends and relatives those only who fulfil the will of his Father.

3. The saints in heaven love God perfectly. In what, I ask, does the perfection of their love consist? It consists in an entire conformity to the divine will. Hence Jesus Christ has taught us to pray for grace to do the will of God on earth, as the saints do it in heaven. "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." (Matt. 6:10.) Hence St. Teresa says, that "they who practise prayer, should seek in all things to conform their will to the will of God." In this, she adds, consists the highest perfection. He that practises it in the most perfect manner, shall receive from God the greatest gifts, and shall make the greatest progress in interior life. The accomplishment of the divine will has been the sole end of the saints in the practice of all virtues. Blessed Henry Suson used to say: "I would rather be the vilest man on earth with the will of God, than be a seraph with my own will."

4. A perfect act of conformity is sufficient to make a person a saint. Behold, Jesus Christ appeared to St. Paul while he was persecuting the Church, and converted him. What did the saint do? He did nothing more than offer to God his will, that he might dispose of it as he pleased. "Lord," he exclaimed, "what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts 9:6.) And instantly the Lord declared to Ananias, that Saul was a vessel of election, and apostle of the Gentiles. "This man is a vessel of election to carry my name before the Gentiles." (Acts 9:15.) He that gives his will to God, gives him all he has. He that mortifies himself by fasts and penitential austerities, or that gives alms to the poor for God's sake, gives to God a part of himself and of his goods; but he that gives his will to God, gives him all, and can say: Lord, having given thee my will, I have nothing more to give thee—I have given thee all. It is our heart—that is, our will—that God asks of us. "My son, give me thy heart." (Prov. 23:26.) Since, then, says the holy Abbot Nilus, our will is so acceptable to God, we ought, in our prayers, to ask of him the grace, not that we may do what he will, but that we may do all that he wishes us to do. Every one knows this truth, that our sanctification consists in doing the will of God; but there is some difficulty in reducing it to practice. Let us, then, come to the second point, in which I have to say many things of great practical utility.

SECOND POINT. HOW, AND IN WHAT, WE OUGHT TO PRACTISE CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD.

5. That we may feel a facility of doing on all occasions the divine will, we must beforehand offer ourselves continually to embrace in peace whatever God ordains or wills. Such was the practice of holy David. "My heart," he used to say, "is ready; O God! my heart is ready." (Ps. 107:2.) And he continually besought the Lord to teach him to do his divine will. "Teach me to do thy will." (Ps. 142:10.) He thus deserved to be called a man according to God's own heart. "I have found David, the son of Jesse, a man according to my own heart, who shall do all my wills." (Acts 13:22.) And why? Because the holy king was always ready to do whatever God wished him to do.

6. St. Teresa offered herself to God fifty times in the day, that he might dispose of her as he pleased, and declared her readiness to embrace either prosperity or adversity. The perfection of our oblation consists in our offering ourselves to God without reserve. All are prepared to unite themselves to the divine will in prosperity; but perfection consists in conforming to it, even in adversity. To thank God in all things that are agreeable to us, is acceptable to him; but to accept with cheerfulness what is repugnant to our inclinations, is still more pleasing to him. Father M. Avila used to say, that "a single blessed be God, in adversity, is better than six thousand thanksgivings in prosperity."

7. We should conform to the divine will, not only in misfortunes which come directly from God—such as sickness, loss of property, privation of friends and relatives—but also in crosses which come to us from men, but indirectly from God—such as acts of injustice, defamations, calumnies, injuries, and all other sorts of persecutions. But, you may ask, does God will that others commit sin, by injuring us in our property or in our reputation? No; God wills not their sin; but he wishes us to bear with such a loss and with such a humiliation; and he wishes us to conform, on all such occasions, to his divine will.

8. "Good things and evil . . . are from God." (Eccl. 11:14.) All blessings—such as riches and honours—and all misfortunes—such as sickness and persecutions—come from God. But mark that the Scripture calls them evils, only because we, through the want of conformity to the will of God, regard them as evils and misfortunes. But, in reality, if we accepted them from the hands of God with Christian resignation, they should be blessings and not evils. The jewels which give the greatest splendour to the crown of the saints in heaven, are the tribulations which they bore with patience, as coming from the hands of the Lord. On hearing that the Sabeans had taken away all his oxen and asses, holy Job said: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." (Job 1:21.) He did not say that the Lord gave, and that the Sabeans had taken away; but that the Lord gave, and that the Lord had taken away: and therefore he blessed the Lord, believing that all had happened through the divine will." As it has pleased the Lord, so it is done: blessed be the name of the Lord." (Ibid.) Being tormented with iron hooks and burning torches, the holy martyrs Epictetus and Atone said: "Lord, thy will be done in us." And their last words were: "Be blessed, O eternal God, for having given us the grace to accomplish thy will."

9. "Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad." (Prov. 12:21.) A soul that loves God is not disturbed by any misfortune that may happen to her. Cesarius relates (lib. x., c. vi.), that a certain monk who did not perform greater austerities than his companions, wrought many miracles. Being astonished at this, the abbot asked him one day what were the works of piety which he practised. He answered, that he was more imperfect than the other monks; but that his sole concern was to conform himself to the divine will. Were you displeased, said the abbot, with the person who injured us so grievously a few days ago? No, father, replied the monk; I, on the contrary, thanked God for it; because I know that he does or permits all things for our good. From this answer the abbot perceived the sanctity of the good religious. We should act in a similar manner under all the crosses that come upon us. Let us always say: "Yea, Father; for so hath it seemed good in thy sight." (Matt. 11:26.) Lord, this is pleasing to thee, let it be done.

10. He that acts in this manner enjoys that peace which the angels announced at the birth of Jesus Christ to men of good will—that is, to those whose wills are united to the will of God. These, as the Apostle says, enjoy that peace which exceeds all sensual delights. "The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding." (Phil. 4:7.) A great and solid peace, which is not liable to change. "A holy man continueth in wisdom like the sun; but a fool is changing like the moon." (Eccl. 27:12.) Fools—that is, sinners—are changed like the moon, which increases to-day, and grows less on to-morrow; to-day they are seen to laugh through folly, and to-morrow, to weep through despair; to-day they are humble and meek, to-morrow, proud and furious. In a word, sinners change with prosperity and adversity; but the just are like the sun, always the same, always serene in whatever happens to them. In the inferior part of the soul they cannot but feel some pain at the misfortunes which befall them; but, as long as the will remains united to the will of God, nothing can deprive them of that spiritual joy which is not subject to the vicissitudes of this life. "Your joy no man shall take from you." (John 16:22.)

11. He that reposes in the divine will, is like a man placed above the clouds: he sees the lightning, and hears the claps of thunder, and the raging of the tempest below, but he is not injured or disturbed by them. And how can he be ever disturbed, when whatever he desires always happens? He that desires only what pleases God, always obtains whatsoever he wishes, because all that happens to him, happens through the will of God. Salvian says, that Christians who are resigned, if they be in a low condition of life, wish to be in that state; if they be poor, they desire poverty; because they wish whatever God wills, and therefore they are always content. "Humiles sunt, hoc volunt, pauperes sunt, paupertate delectantur: itaque beati dicendi sunt." If cold, or heat, or rain, or wind come on, he that is united to the will of God says: I wish for this cold, this heat, this rain, and this wind, because God wills them. If loss of property, persecution, sickness, or even death come upon him, he says: I wish for this loss, this persecution, this sickness; I even wish for death, when it comes, because God wills it. And how can a person who seeks to please God, enjoy greater happiness than that which arises from cheerfully embracing the cross which God sends him, and from the conviction that, in embracing it, he pleases God in the highest degree? So great was the joy which St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to feel at the bare mention of the will of God, that she would fall into an ecstacy.

12. But, how great is the folly of those who resist the divine will, and, instead of receiving tribulations with patience, get into a rage, and accuse God of treating them with injustice and cruelty! Perhaps they expect that, in consequence of their opposition, what God wills shall not happen? "Who resisteth his will?" (Rom. 9:19.) Miserable men! instead of lightening the cross which God sends them, they make it more heavy and painful. "Who hath resisted him, and hath peace?" (Job 9:4.) Let us be resigned to the divine will, and we shall thus render our crosses light, and shall gain great treasures of merits for eternal life. In sending us tribulations, God intends to make us saints. "This is the will of God, your sanctification." (1 Thess. 4:3.) He sends us crosses, not because he wishes evil to us, but because he desires our welfare, and because he knows that they are conducive to our salvation. "All things work together unto good." (Rom. 8:28.) Even the chastisements which come from the Lord are not for our destruction, but for our good and for the correction of our faults. "Let us believe that these scourges of the Lord . . . have happened for our amendment, and not for our destruction." (Jud. 8:27.) God loves us so tenderly, that he not only desires, but is solicitous about our welfare. "The Lord," says David, "is careful for me." (Ps. 39:18.)

13. Let us, then, always throw ourselves into the hands of God, who so ardently desires and so anxiously watches over our eternal salvation. "Casting all your care upon him; for he hath care of you." (1 Peter 5:7.) He who, during life, casts himself into the hands of God, shall lead a happy life and shall die a holy death. He who dies resigned to the divine will, dies a saint; but they who shall not have been united to the divine will during life, shall not conform to it at death, and shall not be saved. The accomplishment of the divine will should be the sole object of all our thoughts during the remainder of our days. To this end we should direct all our devotions, our meditations, communions, visits to the blessed sacrament, and all our prayers. We should constantly beg of God to teach and help us to do his will. "Teach me to do thy will." (Ps. 142:10.) Let us, at the same time, offer ourselves to accept without reserve whatever he ordains, saying, with the Apostle: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts 9:6.) Lord, tell me what thou dost wish me to do; I desire to do thy will. And in all things, whether they be pleasing or painful, let us always have in our mouths that petition of the PATER NOSTER—"Thy will be done." Let us frequently repeat it in the day, with all the affection of our hearts. Happy we, if we live and die saying: "Thy will be done! thy will be done!"

Sermon XXIX

TRINITY SUNDAY

ON THE LOVE OF THE THREE DIVINE PERSONS FOR MAN

"Going, therefore, teach ye all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—MATT. 28:19.

ST. LEO has said, that the nature of God is, by its essence, goodness itself. "Deus cujus natura bonitas." Now, goodness naturally diffuses itself. "Bonum est sui diffusivum." And by experience we know that men of a good heart are full of love for all, and desire to share with all the goods which they enjoy. God being infinite goodness, is all love towards us his creatures. Hence St. John calls him pure love—pure charity. "God is charity." (1 John 4:8.) And therefore he ardently desires to make us partakers of his own happiness. Faith teaches us how much the Three Divine Persons have done through love to man, and to enrich him with heavenly gifts. In saying to his apostles, "Teach ye all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," Jesus Christ wished that they should not only instruct the Gentiles in the mystery of the Most Holy Trinity, but that they should also teach them the love which the adorable Trinity bears to man. I intend to propose this day for your consideration the love shown to us by the Father in our creation; secondly, the love of the Son, in our redemption; and thirdly, the love of the Holy Ghost, in our sanctification.

FIRST POINT. THE LOVE SHOWN TO US BY THE FATHER IN OUR CREATION.

1. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore have I drawn thee, taking pity on thee." (Jer. 31:3.) My son, says the Lord, I have loved you for eternity, and, through love for you, I have shown mercy to you by drawing you out of nothing. Hence, beloved Christians, of all those who love you, God has been your first lover. Your parents have been the first to love you on this earth; but they have loved you only after they had known you. But, before you had a being, God loved you. Before your father or mother was born, God loved you; yes, even before the creation of the world, he loved you. And how long before creation has God loved you? Perhaps for a thousand years, or for a thousand ages. It is needless to count years or ages; God loved you from eternity. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." As long as he has been God, he has loved you: as long as he has loved himself, he has loved you. The thought of this love made St. Agnes the Virgin exclaim: "I am prevented by another lover." When creatures asked her heart, she answered: No: I cannot prefer you to my God. He has been the first to love me; it is then but just that he should hold the first place in my affections.

2. Thus, brethren, God has loved you from eternity, and through pure love, he has selected you from among so many men whom he could have created in place of you; but he has left them in their nothingness, and has brought you into existence, and placed you in the world. For the love of you he has made so many other beautiful creatures, that they might serve you, and that they might remind you of the love which he has borne to you, and of the gratitude which you owe to him. "Heaven and Earth," says St. Augustine, "and all things tell me to love thee." When the saint beheld the sun, the stars, the mountains, the sea, the rains, they all appeared to him to speak, and to say: Augustine, love God; for he has created us that you might love him. When the Abbé de Raneé, the founder of La Trappe, looked at the hills, the fountains, or flowers, he said that all these creatures reminded him of the love which God had borne him. St. Teresa used to say, that these creatures reproached her with her ingratitude to God. Whilst she held a flower or fruit in her hand, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to feel her heart wounded with divine love, and would say within herself: Then, my God has thought from eternity of creating this flower and this fruit that I might love him.

3. Moreover, seeing us condemned to hell, in punishment of our sins, the Eternal Father, through love for us, has sent his Son on the earth to die on the cross, in order to redeem us from hell, and to bring us with himself into Paradise. "God so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son" (John 3:16), love, which the apostle calls an excess of love. "For his exceeding charity wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sin, has quickened us together in Christ." (Eph. 2:4, 5.)

4. See also the special love which God has shown you in bringing you into life in a Christian country, and in the bosom of the Catholic or true Church. How many are born among the pagans, among the Jews, among the Mahometans and heretics, and all are lost. Consider that, compared with these, only a few—not even the tenth part of the human race—have the happiness of being born in a country where the true faith reigns; and, among that small number, he has chosen you. Oh! what an invaluable benefit is the gift of faith! How many millions of souls, among infidels and heretics, are deprived of the sacraments, of sermons, of good example, and of the other helps to salvation which we possess in the true Church. And the Lord resolved to bestow on us all these great graces, without any merit on our part, and even with the foreknowledge of our demerits. For when he thought of creating us and of conferring these favours upon us, he foresaw our sins, and the injuries we would commit against him.

SECOND POINT. THE LOVE WHICH THE SON OF GOD HAS SHOWN TO US IN OUR REDEMPTION.

5. Adam, our first father, sins by eating the forbidden apple, and is condemned to eternal death, along with all his posterity. Seeing the whole human race doomed to perdition, God resolved to send a redeemer to save mankind. Who shall come to accomplish their redemption? Perhaps an angel or a seraph. No; the Son of God, the supreme and true God, equal to the Father, offers himself to come on earth, and there to take human flesh, and to die for the salvation of men. O prodigy of Divine love! Man, says St. Fulgentius, despises God, and separates himself from God, and through love for him, God comes on earth to seek after rebellious man. "Homo Deum contemnens, a Deo discessit: Deus hominem diligens, ad homines venit." (Serm. in Nativ. Christ.) Since, says St. Augustine, we could not go to the Redeemer, he has deigned to come to us. "Quia ad mediatorem venire non poteramus, ipse ad nos venire dignatus est." And why has Jesus Christ resolved to come to us? According to the same holy doctor, it is to convince us of his great love for us. "Christ came, that man might know how much God loves him."

6. Hence the Apostle writes: "The goodness and kindness of God our Saviour appeared." (Tit. 3:5.) In the Greek text, the words are: "Singularis Deierga homines apparuit amor:" "The singular love of God towards men appeared." In explaining this passage, St. Bernard says, that before God appeared on earth in human flesh, men could not arrive at a knowledge of the divine goodness; therefore the Eternal Word took human nature, that, appearing in the form of man, men might know the goodness of God. "Priusquam apparet humanitas, latebat benignitas, sed undetanta agnosci poterat? Venit in carne ut, apparante humanitate, cognosceretur benignitas." (Serm. i., in Eph.) And what greater love and goodness could the Son of God show to us, than to become man and to become a worm like us, in order to save us from perdition? What astonishment would we not feel, if we saw a prince become a worm to save the worms of his kingdom! And what shall we say at the sight of a God made man like us, to deliver us from eternal death? "The word was made flesh." (John 1:14.) A God made flesh! if faith did not assure us of it, who could ever believe it? Behold then, as St. Paul says, a God as it were annihilated. "He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant . . . and in habit found as a man." (Phil. 2:7.) By these words the Apostle gives us to understand, that the Son of God, who was filled with the divine majesty and power, humbled himself so as to assume the lowly and impotent condition of human nature, taking the form or nature of a servant, and becoming like men in his external appearance, although, as St. Chrysostom observes, he was not a mere man, but man and God. Hearing a deacon singing the words of St. John, "and the Word was made flesh," St. Peter of Alcantara fell into ecstasy, and flew through the air to the altar of the most holy sacrament.

7. But this God of love, the Incarnate Word, was not content with becoming flesh for the love of man; but, according to Isaias, he wished to live among us, as the last and lowest, and most afflicted of men. "There is no beauty in him, nor comeliness: and we have seen him . . . despised, and the most abject of men, a man of sorrows." (Isa. 3:2, 3.) He was a man of sorrows. Yes; for the life of Jesus Christ was full of sorrows. Virum dolorum. He was a man made on purpose to be tormented with sorrows. From his birth till his death, the life of our Redeemer was all full of sorrows.

8. And because he came on earth to gain our love, as he declared when he said—"I am come to cast fire on the earth; and what will I but that it be kindled?" (Luke 12:49), he wished at the close of his life to give us the strongest marks and proofs of the love which he bears to us. "Having loved his own who were in the world, he loved them unto the end." (John 13:1.) Hence he not only humbled himself to death for us, but he also chose to die the most painful and opprobrious of all deaths. "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even unto the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:8.) They who were crucified among the Jews, were objects of malediction and reproach to all. "He is accursed of God that hangeth on a tree." (Deut. 21:23.) Our Redeemer wished to die the shameful death of the cross, in the midst of a tempest of ignominies and sorrows. "I am come into the depths of the sea, and a tempest hath overwhelmed me." (Ps. 68:3.)

9. "In this," says St. John, "we have known the charity of God, because he hath laid down his life for us." (1 John 3:16.) And how could God give us a greater proof of his love than by laying down his life for us? Or, how is it possible for us to behold a God dead on the cross for our sake, and not love him? "For the charity of Christ presseth us." (2 Cor. 5:14.) By these words St. Paul tells us, that it is not so much what Jesus Christ has done and suffered for our salvation, as the love which he has shown in suffering and dying for us, that obliges and compels us to love him. He has, as the same Apostle adds, died for all, that each of us may live no longer for himself, but only for that God who has given his life for the love of us. "Christ died for all, that they also who live, may not live to themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again." (2 Cor. 5:15.) And, to captivate our love, he has, after having given his life for us, left himself for the food of our souls. "Take ye and eat: this is my body." (Matt. 26:26.) Had not faith taught that he left himself for our food, who could ever believe it? But of the prodigy of divine love manifested in the holy sacrament, I shall speak on the second Sunday after Pentecost. Let us pass to a brief consideration of the third point.

THIRD POINT. ON THE LOVE SHOWN TO US BY THE HOLY GHOST IN OUR SANCTIFICATION.

10. The Eternal Father was not content with giving us his Son Jesus Christ, that he might save us by his death; he has also given us the Holy Ghost, that he may dwell in our souls, and that he may keep them always inflamed with holy love. In spite of all the injuries which he received on earth from men, Jesus Christ, forgetful of their ingratitude, after having ascended into heaven, sent us the Holy Ghost, that, by his holy flames, this divine spirit might kindle in our hearts the fire of divine charity, and sanctify our souls. Hence, when he descended on the apostles, he appeared in the form of tongues of fire. "And there appeared to them parted tongues, as it were of fire." (Acts 2:3.) Hence the Church prescribes the following prayer:—"We beseech thee, O Lord, that the Spirit may inflame us with that fire which the Lord Jesus Christ sent on the earth, and vehemently wished to be enkindled." This is the holy fire which inflamed the saints with the desire of doing great things for God, which enabled them to love their most cruel enemies, to seek after contempt, to renounce all the riches and honours of the world, and even to embrace with joy torments and death.

11. The Holy Ghost is that divine bond which unites the Father with the Son; it is he that unites our souls, through love, with God. For, as St. Augustine says, an union with God is the effect of love. "Charity is a virtue which unites us with God." The chains of the world are chains of death, but the bonds of the Holy Ghost are bonds of eternal life, because they bind us to God, who is our true and only life.

12. Let us also remember that all the lights, inspirations, divine calls, all the good acts which we have performed during our life, all our acts of contrition, of confidence in the divine mercy, of love, of resignation, have been the gifts of the Holy Ghost. "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity; for we know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit himself asketh for us with unspeakable groanings." (Rom. 8:26.) Thus, it is the Holy Ghost that prays for us; for we know not what we ought to ask, but the Holy Spirit teaches us what we should pray for.

13. In a word, the Three Persons of the Most Holy Trinity have endeavoured to show the love which God has borne us, that we may love him through gratitude. "When," says St. Bernard, "God loves, he wishes only to be loved." It is, then, but just that we love that God who has been the first to love us, and to put us under so many obligations by so many proofs of tender love. "Let us, therefore, love God, because God first hath loved us." (1 John 4:19.) Oh! what a treasure is charity! it is an infinite treasure, because it makes us partakers of the friendship of God. "She is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God." (Wis. 7:14.) But, to acquire this treasure, it is necessary to detach the heart from earthly things. "Detach the heart from creatures," says St. Teresa, "and you shall find God." In a heart filled with earthly affections, there is no room for divine love. Let us therefore continually implore the Lord in our prayers, communions, and visits to the blessed sacrament, to give us his holy love; for this love will expel from our souls all affections for the things of this earth. "When," says St. Francis de Sales, "a house is on fire, all that is within is thrown out through the windows." By these words the saint meant, that when a soul is inflamed with divine love, she easily detaches herself from creatures: and Father Paul Segneri, the younger, used to say, that divine love is a thief that robs us of all earthly affections, and makes us exclaim: "What, O my Lord, but thee alone, do I desire?"

14. "Love is strong as death." (Cant. 8:6.) As no creature can resist death when the hour of dissolution arrives, so there is no difficulty which love, in a soul that loves God, does not overcome. When there is question of pleasing her beloved, love conquers all things: it conquers pains, losses, ignominies. "Nihil tam durum quod non amoris igne vincatur." This love made the martyrs, in the midst of torments, racks, and burning gridirons, rejoice, and thank God for enabling them to suffer for him: it made the other saints, when there was no tyrant to torment them, become, as it were, their own executioners, by fasts, disciplines, and penitential austerities. St. Augustine says, that in doing what one loves there is no labour, and if there be, the labour itself is loved. "In co quod amatur aut non laboratur, aut ipse labor amatur."

Sermon XXX

FIRST SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON CHARITY TO OUR NEIGHBOUR

"For with the same measure that you shall mete withal, it shall be measured to you again."—LUKE 6:38.

IN this day's gospel we find that Jesus Christ once said to his disciples: "Be ye merciful, as your Father also is merciful." (Luke 6:36.) As your heavenly Father is merciful towards you, so must you be merciful to others. He then proceeds to explain how, and in what, we should practise holy charity to our neighbour. "Judge not," he adds, "and you shall not be judged" (v. 37). Here he speaks against those who do not abstain from judging rashly of their neighbours. "Forgive, and you shall be forgiven" (ibid). He tells us that we cannot obtain pardon of the offences we have offered to God, unless we pardon those who have offended us. "Give, and it shall be given to you" (v. 38). By these words he condemns those who wish that God should grant whatsoever they desire, and are at the same time niggardly and avaricious towards the poor. In conclusion he declares, that the measure of charity which we use to our neighbour shall be the same that God will use towards us. Let us, then, see how we should practise charity to our neighbour: we ought to practise it, first, in our thoughts; secondly, in words; thirdly, by works.

FIRST POINT. HOW WE SHOULD PRACTISE CHARITY TO OUR NEIGHBOUR IN OUR THOUGHTS.

1. "And this commandment we have from God, that he who loveth God, love also his brother." (1 John 4:21.) The same precept, then, which obliges us to love God, commands us to love our neighbour. St. Catherine of Genoa said one day to the Lord: "My God, thou dost wish me to love my neighbour; but I can love no one but thee." The Lord said to her in answer: "My child, he that loves me loves whatsoever I love." Hence St. John says: "If any man say: I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." (1 John 4:20.) And Jesus Christ has declared that he will receive, as done to himself, the charity which we practise towards the least of his brethren.

2. Hence we must, in the first place, practise fraternal charity in our thoughts, by never judging evil of any one without certain foundation. "Judge not, and you shall not be judged." He who judges without certain grounds that another has committed a mortal sin, is guilty of a grievous fault; if he only rashly suspects another of a mortal sin, he commits at least a venial offence. But, to judge or suspect evil of another is not sinful when we have certain grounds for the judgment or suspicion. However, he that has true charity thinks well of all, and banishes from his mind both judgments and suspicions. "Charity thinketh no evil." (1 Cor. 13:5.) The heads of families are obliged to suspect the evil which may be done by those who are under their care. Certain fathers and foolish mothers knowingly allow their sons to frequent bad company and houses in which there are young females, and permit their daughters to be alone with men. They endeavour to justify the neglect of their children by saying: "I do not wish to entertain bad thoughts of others." O folly of parents! They are in such cases bound to suspect the evil which may happen; and, in order to prevent it, they should correct their children. But they that are not entrusted with the care of others, ought to abstain carefully from inquiring after the defects and conduct of others.

3. When sickness, loss of property, or any misfortune happens to a neighbour, charity requires that we regret, at least with the superior part of the soul, the evil that has befallen him. I say, "with the superior part of the soul;" for, when we hear of the misfortunes of an enemy, our inferior appetite appears to feel delight; but, as long as we do not consent to that delight, we are not guilty of sin. However, it is sometimes lawful to desire, or to be pleased at, the temporal evil of another, when we expect that it will be productive of spiritual good to himself or to others. For example: it is lawful, according to St. Gregory, to rejoice at the sickness or misfortune of an obstinate and scandalous sinner, and even to desire that he may fall into sickness or poverty, in order that he may cease to lead a wicked life, or at least to scandalize others. Behold the words of St. Gregory: "Evenire plerumque potest, ut non amissa charitate, et inimici nostri ruina lætificet, et ejus gloria sine invidiæ culpa contristet; cum et, ruente eo, quosdam bene erigi credimus, et proficiente illo plerosque injuste opprimi formidamus." (Lib. xxii., Moral., cap. ii.) But, except in such cases, it is unlawful to rejoice at the loss of a neighbour. It is also contrary to charity to feel regret at a neighbour's prosperity merely because it is useful to him. This is precisely the sin of envy. The envious are, according to the Wise Man, on the side of the devil, who, because he could not bear to see men in heaven, from which he had been banished, tempted Adam to rebel against God. "But by the envy of the devil death came into the world; and they follow him that are of his side." (Wis. 2:25.) Let us pass to the next point.

SECOND POINT. ON THE CHARITY WHICH WE OUGHT TO PRACTISE TOWARDS OUR NEIGHBOUR IN WORDS.

4. With regard to the practice of fraternal charity in words, we ought, in the first place, and above all, to abstain from all detraction. "The tale-bearer shall defile his own soul, and shall be hated by all." (Eccl. 21:31.) As they who always speak well of others are loved by all, so he who detracts his neighbour is hateful to all—to God—and to men, who, although they take delight in listening to detraction, hate the detractor, and are on their guard against him. St. Bernard says that the tongue of a detractor is a three-edged sword. "Gladius equidem anceps, immo triplex est lingua detractoris" (in Ps. lvi). With one of these edges it destroys the reputation of a neighbour; with the second it wounds the souls of those who listen to the detraction; and with the third it kills the soul of the detractor by depriving him of the divine grace. You will say: "I have spoken of my neighbour only in secret to my friends, and have made them promise not to mention to others what I told them." This excuse will not stand: no; you are, as the Lord says, the serpent that bites in silence. "If a serpent bite in silence, he is nothing better that backbiteth secretly." (Eccl. 10:11.) Your secret defamation bites and destroys the character of a neighbour. They who indulge in the vice of detraction are chastised not only in the next, but also in. this life, because their uncharitable tongues are the cause of a thousand sins, by creating discord in whole families and entire villages. Thomas Cantaprensis (Apum, etc., cap. xxxvii.) relates, that he knew a certain detractor, who at the end of life became raging mad, and died lacerating his tongue with his teeth. The tongue of another detractor, who was going to speak ill of St. Malachy, instantly swelled and was filled with worms. And, after seven days, the unhappy man died miserably.

5. Detraction is committed not only when we take away a neighbour's character, by imputing to him a sin which he has not committed, or exaggerating his guilt, but also when we make known to others any of his secret sins. Some persons, when they know anything injurious to a neighbour, appear to suffer, as it were, the pains of childbirth, until they tell it to others. When the sin of a neighbour is secret and grievous, it is a mortal sin to mention it to others without a just cause. I say, "without a just cause;" for, to make known to a parent the fault of a child, that he may correct him and prevent a repetition of the fault, is not sinful, but is an act of virtue; for according to St. Thomas (2, 2, qu. 2, art. 73), to let others know the sins of a neighbour is unlawful, when it is done to destroy his reputation, but not when it is done for his good, or for the good of others.

6. They who listen to detraction, and afterwards go and tell what was said to the person whose character had been injured, have to render a great account to God. These are called talebearers. Oh! how great is the evil produced by these talebearing tongues that are thus employed in sowing discord. They are objects of God's hatred. "The Lord hateth . . . him that soweth discord among brethren." (Prov. 6:16, 19.) Should the person who has been defamed speak of his defamer, the injury which he has received may, perhaps, give him some claim to compassion. But why should you relate what you have heard? Is it to create ill-will and hatred that shall be the cause of a thousand sins? If, from this day forward, you ever hear anything injurious to a neighbour, follow the advice of the Holy Ghost. "Hast thou heard a word against thy neighbour? let it die with thee." (Eccl. 19:10.) You should not only keep it shut up in your heart, but you must let it die within you. He that is only shut up may escape and be seen; but he that is dead cannot leave the grave. When, then, you know anything injurious to your neighbour, you ought to be careful not to give any intimation of it to others by words, by motions of the head, or by any other sign. Sometimes greater injury is done to others by certain singular signs and broken words than by a full statement of their guilt; because these hints make persons suspect that the evil is greater than it really is.

7. In your conversations be careful not to give pain to any companion, either present or absent, by turning him into ridicule. You may say: "I do it through jest;" but such jests are contrary to charity. "All things, therefore," says Jesus Christ, "that you will that men should do to you, do you also unto them." (Matt. 7:12.) Would you like to be treated with derision before others? Give up, then, the practice of ridiculing your neighbours. Abstain also from contending about useless trifles. Sometimes, certain contests about mere trifles grow so warm that they end in quarrels and injurious words. Some persons are so full of the spirit of contradiction, that they controvert what others say, without any necessity, and solely for the sake of contention, and thus violate charity. "Strive not," says the Holy Ghost, "in matters which do not concern thee." (Eccl. 11:9.) But they will say: "I only defend reason; I cannot bear these assertions which are contrary to reason." In answer to these defenders of reason, Cardinal Bellar-mine says, that an ounce of charity is better than an hundred loads of reason. In conversation, particularly when the subject of it is unimportant, state your opinion, if you wish to take part in the discourse, and then keep yourself in peace, and be on your guard against obstinacy in defending your own opinion. In such contests it is always better to yield. B. Egidius used to say, that he who gives up conquers; because he is superior in virtue, and preserves peace, which is far more valuable than a victory in such contests. St. Joseph Calasanctius was accustomed to say, that "he who loves peace never contradicts any one."

8. Thus, dearly beloved brethren, if you wish to be loved by God and by men, endeavour always to speak well of all. And, should you happen to hear a person speak ill of a neighbour, be careful not to encourage his uncharitableness, nor to show any curiosity to hear the faults of others. If you do, you will be guilty of the same sin which the detractor commits. "Hedge in thy ears with thorns," says Ecclesiasticus, "and hear not a wicked tongue." (Eccl. 28:28.) When you hear any one taking away the character of another, place around your ears a hedge of thorns, that detraction may not enter. For this purpose it is necessary, at least, to show that the discourse is not pleasing to you. This may be done by remaining silent, by putting on a sorrowful countenance, by casting down the eyes, or turning your face in another direction. In a word, act, says St. Jerome, in such a way that the detractor, seeing your unwillingness to listen to him, may learn to be more guarded for the future against the sin of detraction. "Discat detractor, dum te videt non libenter audire, non facile detrahere." (S. Hier. ep. ad Nepot.) And when it is in your power to do it, it will be a great act of charity to defend the character of the persons who have been defamed. The Divine Spouse wishes that the words of his beloved be a veil of scarlet. "Thy lips are as a scarlet lace." (Cant. 4:3.) That is, as Theodoret explains this passage, her words should be dictated by charity (a scarlet lace), that they may cover, as much as possible, the defects of others, at least by excusing their intentions, when their acts cannot be excused. "If," says St. Bernard, "you cannot excuse the act, excuse the intention." (Serm. xl. in Cant.) It was a proverb among the nuns of the convent of St. Teresa, that, in the presence of their holy mother, their reputation was secure, because they knew she would take the part of those of whom any fault might be mentioned.

9. Charity also requires that we be meek to all, and particularly to those who are opposed to us. When a person is angry with you, and uses injurious language, remember that a "mild answer breaketh wrath." (Prov. 15:1.) Reply to him with meekness, and you shall find that his anger will be instantly appeased. But, if you resent the injury, and use harsh language, you will increase the flame; the feeling of revenge will grow more violent, and you will expose yourself to the danger of losing your soul by yielding to an act of hatred, or by breaking out into expressions grievously injurious to your neighbour. Whenever you feel the soul agitated by passion, it is better to force yourself to remain silent, and to make no reply; for, as St. Bernard says, an eye clouded with anger cannot distinguish between right and wrong. "Turbatus præ ira oculus rectum non videt." (Lib. 2 de Consid., cap. xi.) Should it happen that in a fit of passion you have insulted a neighbour, charity requires that you use every means to allay his wounded feelings, and to remove from his heart all sentiments of rancour towards you. The best means of making reparation for the violation of charity is to humble yourself to the person whom you have offended. With regard to the meekness which we should practise towards others, I shall speak on that subject in the thirty-fourth Sermon, or the Sermon for the fifth Sunday after Pentecost.

10. It is also an act of charity to correct sinners. Do not say that you are not a superior. Were you a superior, you should be obliged by your office to correct all those who might be under your care; but, although you are not placed over others, you are, as a Christian, obliged to fulfil the duty of fraternal correction. "He gave to every one of them commandment concerning his neighbour." (Eccl. 17:12.) Would it not be great cruelty to see a blind man walking on the brink of a precipice, and not admonish him of his danger, in order to preserve him from temporal death? It would be far greater cruelty to neglect, for the sake of avoiding a little trouble, to deliver a brother from eternal death.

THIRD POINT. ON THE CHARITY WE OUGHT TO PRACTISE TOWARDS OUR NEIGHBOUR BY WORKS.

11. Some say that they love all, but will not put themselves to any inconvenience in order to relieve the wants of a neighbour. "My little children," says St. John, "let us not love in word, nor in tongue, but in deed and truth." (1 John 3:18) The Scripture tells us that alms deliver men from death, cleanse them from sin, and obtain for them the divine mercy and eternal life. "Alms delivereth from death, and the same is that which purgeth away sins, and maketh to find mercy and life everlasting." (Job 12:9.) God will relieve you in the same manner in which you give relief to your neighbour. "With what measure you shall mete, it shall be measured to you again." (Matt. 7:2.) Hence St. Chrysostom says, that the exercise of charity to others is the means of acquiring great gain with God. "Alms is, of all acts, the most lucrative." And St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that she felt more happy in relieving her neighbour than when she was wrapt up in contemplation. "Because," she would add, "when I am in contemplation God assists me; but in giving relief to a neighbour I assist God;" for, every act of charity which we exercise towards our neighbour, God accepts as if it were done to himself. But, on the other hand, how, as St. John says, can he who does not assist a brother in want, be said to love God? "He that hath the substance of this world, and shall see his brother in need, and shall shut up his bowels from him, how doth the charity of God abide in him?" (1 John 3:17.) By alms is understood, not only the distribution of money or other goods, but every succour that is given to a neighbour in order to relieve his wants.

12. If charity obliges us to assist all, it commands us still more strictly to relieve those who are in the greatest need; such as the souls in Purgatory. St.

Thomas teaches, that charity extends not only to the living, but also to the dead. Hence, as we ought to assist our neighbours who are in this life, so we are bound to give relief to those holy prisoners who are so severely tormented by fire, and who are incapable of relieving themselves. A deceased monk of the Cistercian order appeared to the sacristan of his monastery, and said to him: "Brother, assist me by your prayers; for I can do nothing for myself." (Cron. Cist.) Let us, then, assist, to the utmost of our power, these beloved spouses of Jesus Christ, by recommending them every day to God, and by sometimes getting Mass offered for their repose. There is nothing which gives so much relief to those holy souls as the sacrifice of the altar. They certainly will not be ungrateful; they will in return pray for you, and will obtain for you still greater graces, when they shall have entered into the kingdom of God.

13. To exercise a special charity towards the sick, is also very pleasing to God. They are afflicted by pains, by melancholy, by the fear of death, and are sometimes abandoned by others. Be careful to relieve them by alms, or by little presents, and to serve them as well as you can, at least by endeavouring to console them by your words, and by exhortations to practise resignation to the will of God, and to offer to him all their sufferings.

14. Above all, be careful to practise charity to those who are opposed to you. Some say: I am grateful to all who treat me with kindness; but I cannot exercise charity towards those who persecute me. Jesus Christ says that even pagans know how to be grateful to those who do them a service. "Do not also the heathens this?" (Matt. 5:47.) Christian charity consists in wishing well, and in doing good to those who hate and injure us. "But I say to you: Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you." (Matt. 5:44.) Some seek to injure you, but you must love them. Some have done evil to you, but you must return good for evil. Such the vengeance of the saints. This is the heavenly revenge which St. Paulinus exhorts us to inflict on our enemies. "To repay good for evil is heavenly revenge." (Epis. xvi.) St. Chrysostom teaches, that there is nothing which assimilates us so much to God as the granting of pardon to enemies. "Nothing makes men so like to God as to spare enemies." (Hom. xxvii. in Gen.) Such has been the practice of the saints. St. Catherine of Genoa continued for a long time to relieve a woman who had endeavoured to destroy the saint's reputation. On an assassin, who had made an attempt on his life, St. Ambrose settled a sum for his support. Venustanus, governor of Tuscany, ordered the hands of St. Sabinus to be cut off, because the holy bishop confessed the true faith. The tyrant, feeling a violent pain in his eyes, entreated the saint to assist him. The saint prayed for him, and raised his arm, from which the blood still continued to flow, blessed him, and obtained for him the cure of his eyes and of his soul; for the tyrant became a convert to the faith. Father Segneri relates, that the son of a certain lady in Bologna was murdered by an assassin, who by accident took refuge in her house. (Christ. Instr., part 1, disc. 20, n. 20.) What did she do? She first concealed him from the ministers of justice, and afterwards said to him: Since I have lost my son, you shall henceforth be my son and my heir. Take, for the present, this sum of money, and provide for your safety elsewhere, for here you are not secure. It is thus the saints resent injuries. With what face, says St. Cyril of Jerusalem, can he that does not pardon the affronts which he receives from his enemies, say to God: Lord, pardon me the many insults which I have offered to thee? "Qua fronte dices Domino: remitte mihi multa peccata mea, si tu pauca conservo tuo non remiseris?" (Catech. ii.) But he that forgives his enemies is sure of the pardon of the Lord, who says: "Forgive, and you shall be forgiven." (Luke 6:37.) And when you cannot serve them in any other way, recommend to God those who persecute and calumniate you. "Pray for them that persecute and calumniate you." This is the admonition of Jesus Christ, who is able to reward those who treat their enemies in this manner.

Sermon XXXI

SECOND SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON HOLY COMMUNION

"A certain man made a great supper."—LUKE 14:16.

IN the gospel of this day we read that a rich man prepared a great supper. He then ordered one of his servants to invite to it all those whom he should find in the highways, even though they were poor, blind, and lame, and to compel those who should refuse, to come to the supper. "Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled" (v. 23). And he added, that of all those who had been invited and had not come, not one should ever partake of his supper. "But I say unto you, that none of those men that were invited shall taste of my supper" (v. 24). This supper is the holy communion; it is a great supper, at which all the faithful are invited to eat the sacred flesh of Jesus Christ in the most holy sacrament of the altar. "Take ye and eat: this is my body." (Matt. 24: 26.) Let us then consider to-day, in the first point, the great love which Jesus Christ has shown us in giving us himself in this sacrament; and, in the second point, how we ought to receive him in order to draw great fruit from the holy communion.

FIRST POINT. ON THE GREAT LOVE WHICH JESUS CHRIST HAS SHOWN US IN GIVING US HIMSELF IN THIS SACRAMENT.

1. "Jesus, knowing that his hour was come that he should pass out of this world to the Father, having loved his own that were in the world, he loved them unto the end." (John 13:1.) Knowing that the hour of his death had arrived, Jesus Christ wished, before his departure from this world, to leave us the greatest proof which he could give of his love, by leaving us himself in the holy eucharist. "He loved them to the end." That is, according to St. Chrysostom, "with an extreme love." St. Bernardine of Sienna says that the tokens of love which are given at death make a more lasting impression on the mind, and are more highly esteemed. "Quæ in fine in signum amicitiæ celebrantur, firmius memoriæ imprimuntur et cariora tenentur." But, whilst others leave a ring, or a piece of money, as a mark of their affection, Jesus has left us himself entirely in this sacrament of love.

2. And when did Jesus Christ institute this sacrament? He instituted it, as the Apostle has remarked, on the night before his passion. "The Lord Jesus, the same night on which he was betrayed, took broad, and giving thanks, broke and said: "Take ye and eat: this is my body." (1 Cor. 11:23, 24.) Thus, at the very time that men were preparing to put him to death, our loving Redeemer resolved to bestow upon us this gift. Jesus Christ, then, was not content with giving his life for us on a cross: he wished also, before his death, to pour out, as the Council of Trent says, all the riches of his love, by leaving himself for our food in the holy communion. "He, as it were, poured out the riches of his love towards man." (Sess. 13, cap. ii.) If faith had not taught it, who could over imagine that a God would become man, and afterwards become the food of his own creatures? When Jesus Christ revealed to his followers this sacrament which he intended to leave us, St. John says, that they could not bring themselves to believe it, and departed from him saying: "How can this man give us his flesh to eat? . . . This saying is hard, and who can hear it?" (St. John 6:53, 61.) But what men could not imagine, the great love of Jesus Christ has invented and effected. "Take ye and cat: this is my body." These words he addressed to his apostles on the night before he suffered, and he now, after his death, addresses them to us.

3. How highly honoured, says St. Francis de Sales, would that man feel to whom the king sent from his table a portion of what he had on his own plate? But how should he feel if that portion were a part of the king's arm? In the holy communion Jesus gives us, not a part of his arm, but his entire body in the sacrament of the altar. "He gave you all," says St. Chrysostom, reproving our ingratitude, "he left nothing for himself." And St. Thomas teaches, that in the eucharist God has given us all that he is and all that he has. "Deus in eucharistia totum quod est et habet, deditnobis." (Opusc. 63, c. ii.) Justly then has the same saint called the eucharist "a sacrament of love; a pledge of love." "Sacramentum charitatis pignus charitatis." It is a sacrament of love, because it was pure love that induced Jesus Christ to give us this gift and pledge of love: for he wished that, should a doubt of his having loved us ever enter into our minds, we should have in this sacrament a pledge of his love. St. Bernard calls this sacrament "love of loves." "Amor amorum." By his incarnation, the Lord has given himself to all men in general; but, in this sacrament, he has given himself to each of us in particular, to make us understand the special love which he entertains for each of us.

4. Oh! how ardently does Jesus Christ desire to come to our souls in the holy communion! This vehement desire he expressed at the time of the institution of this sacrament, when he said to the apostles: "With desire I have desired to eat this Pasch with you." (Luke 22:15.) St. Laurence Justinian says that these words proceeded from the enamoured heart of Jesus Christ, who, by such tender expressions, wished to show us the ardent love with which he loved us. "This is the voice of the most burning charity. "Flagrantissimæ charitatis est vox hæc." And, to induce us to receive him frequently in the holy communion, he promises eternal life—that is, the kingdom of heaven—to those who eat his flesh. "He that eateth this bread shall live for ever." (John 6:59.) On the other hand, it threatens to deprive us of his grace and of Paradise, if we neglect communion. "Except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you." (John 6:54.) These promises and these threats all sprung from a burning desire to come to us in this sacrament.

5. And why does Jesus Christ so vehemently desire that we receive him in the holy communion? It is because he takes delight in being united with each of us. By the communion, Jesus is really united to our soul and to our body, and we are united to Jesus. "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, abideth in me and I in him." (John 6:57.) Thus, after communion, we are, says St. Chrysostom, one body and one flesh with Jesus Christ. "Huic nos unimur, et facti summus unum corpus ut una caro." (Hom. lxviii. ad Pop. Ant.) Hence St. Laurence Justinian exclaims: "Oh! how wonderful is thy love, O Lord Jesus, who hast wished to incorporate us in such a manner with thy body, that we should have one heart and one soul inseparably united with thee." Thus, to every soul that receives the eucharist, the Lord says what he once said to his beloved servant Margaret of Ipres—"Behold, my daughter, the close union made between me and thee; love me, then, and let us remain for ever united in love: let us never more be separated." This union between us and Jesus Christ is, according to St. Chrysostom, the effect of the love which Jesus Christ bears us. "Semetipsum nobis immiscuit, ut unum quid simus . . . ardentur enim amantium hoc est." (Hom. lxi.) But, O Lord, such intimate union with man is not suited to thy divine majesty. But love seeks not reason; it goes not where it ought to go, but where it is drawn. "Amor ratione caret, et vadit quo dicitur, non quo debeat." (Serm. cxliii.) St. Bernardine of Sienna says that, in giving himself for our food, Jesus Christ loved us to the last degree; because he united himself entirely to us, as food is united to those who eat it. "Ultimus gradus amoris est, cum se dedit nobis in cibum quia dedit se nobis ad omnimodam unionem, sicut cibus et cibans, invicem uniuntur." (Tom. 2, Serm. liv.) The same doctrine has been beautifully expressed by St. Francis de Sales. "No action of the Saviour can be more loving or more tender than the institution of the holy eucharist, in which he, as it were, annihilates himself, and takes the form of food, to unite himself to the souls and bodies of his faithful servants."

6. Hence, there is nothing from which we can draw so much fruit as from the holy communion. St. Denis teaches, that the most holy sacrament has greater efficacy to sanctify souls than all other spiritual means. "Eucharistia maximam vim habet perficiendæ sanctitatis." St. Vincent Ferrer says, that a soul derives more profit from one communion than from fasting a week on bread and wafer. The encharist is, according to the holy Council of Trent, a medicine which delivers us from venial, and preserves us from mortal sins. "Antidotum quo a culpis quotidianis liberemur, et a mortalibus præservemur." Jesus himself has said, that they who eat him, who is the fountain of life, shall receive permanently the life of grace. "He that cateth me, the same shall also live by me." (John 6:58.) Innocent the Third teaches, that by the passion Jesus Christ delivers us from the sins we have committed, and by the eucharist from the sins we may commit. According to St. Chrysostom, the holy communion inflames us with the fire of divine love, and makes us objects of terror to the devil. "The eucharist is a fire which inflames us, that, like lions breathing fire, we may retire from the altar, being made terrible to the devil." (Hom. lxi. ad Pop. Ant.) In explaining the words of the Spouse of the Canticles, "He brought me into the cellar of wine; he set in order charity in me" (2:4.) St. Gregory says, that the communion is this collar of wine, in which the soul is so inebriated with divine love, that she forgets and loses sight of all earthly things.

7. Some will say: "I do not communicate often; because I am cold in divine love." In answer to them Gerson asks, Will you then, because you feel cold, remove from the fire? When you are tepid you should more frequently approach this sacrament. St. Bonaventure says: "Trusting in the mercy of God, though you feel tepid, approach: let him who thinks himself unworthy reflect, that the more infirm he feels himself the more he requires a physician" (de Prof. Rel., cap. lxxviii). And, in. "The Devout Life," chapter 20, St. Francis de Sales writes: "Two sorts of persons ought to communicate often: the perfect, to preserve perfection; and the imperfect, to arrive at perfection." It cannot be doubted, that he who wishes to communicate should prepare himself with great diligence, that he may communicate well. Let us pass to the second point.

SECOND POINT. ON THE PREPARATION WE OUGHT TO MAKE IN ORDER TO DERIVE GREAT FRUIT FROM THE HOLY COMMUNION.

8. Two things are necessary in order to draw great fruit from communion—preparation for, and thanksgiving after communion. As to the preparation, it is certain that the saints derived great profit from their communions, only because they were careful to prepare themselves well for receiving the holy eucharist. It is easy then to understand why so many souls remain subject to the same imperfections, after all their communions. Cardinal Bona says, that the defect is not in the food, but in the want of preparation for it. "Defectus non in bibo est, sed in edentis dispositione." For frequent communion two principal dispositions are necessary. The first is detachment from creatures, and disengagement of the heart from everything that is not God. The more the heart is occupied with earthly concerns, the less room there is in it for divine love. Hence, to give full possession of the whole heart to God, it is necessary to purify it from worldly attachments. This is the preparation which Jesus himself recommends to St. Gertrude. "I ask nothing more of thee," said he to her, "than that thou come to receive me with a heart divested of thyself." Let us, then, withdraw our affections from creatures, and our hearts shall belong entirely to the Creator.

9. The second disposition necessary to draw great fruit from communion, is a desire of receiving Jesus Christ in order to advance in his love. "He," says St. Francis de Sales, "who gives himself through pure love, ought to be received only through love." Thus, the principal end of our communions must be to advance in the love of Jesus Christ. He once said to St. Matilda: "When you communicate, desire all the love that any soul has ever had for me, and I will accept your love in proportion to the fervour with which you wished for it."

10. Thanksgiving after communion is also necessary. The prayer we make after communion is the most acceptable to God, and the most profitable to us. After communion the soul should be employed in affections and petitions. The affections ought to consist not only in acts of thanksgiving, but also in acts of humility, of love, and of oblation of ourselves to God. Let us then humble ourselves as much as possible at the sight of a God made our food after we had offended him. A learned author says that, for a soul after communion, the most appropriate sentiment is one of astonishment at the thought of receiving a God. She should exclaim: "What! a God to me! a God to me!" Let us also make many acts of the love of Jesus Christ. He has come into our souls in order to be loved. Hence, he is greatly pleased with those who, after communion, say to him: "My Jesus, I love thee; I desire nothing but thee." Let us also offer ourselves and all that we have to Jesus Christ, that he may dispose of all as he pleases: and let us frequently say: "My Jesus, thou art all mine; thou hast given thyself entirely to me; I give myself entirely to thee.

11. After communion, we should not only make these affections, but we ought also to present to God with great confidence many petitions for his graces. The time after communion is a time in which we can gain treasures of divine graces. St. Teresa says, that at that time Jesus Christ remains in the soul as on a throne, saying to her what he said to the blind man: "What wilt thou that I should do to thee?" (Mark 10:51.) As if he said: "But me you have not always." (John 12:8.) Now that you possess me within you, ask me for graces: I have come down from heaven on purpose to dispense them to you; ask whatever you wish, and you shall obtain it. Oh! what great graces are lost by those who spend but little time in prayer after communion. Let us also turn to the Eternal Father, and, bearing in mind the promise of Jesus Christ—"Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you" (John 16:23)—let us say to him: My God, for the love of this thy Son, whom I have within my heart, give me thy love; make me all thine. And if we offer this prayer with confidence, the Lord will certainly hear us. He who acts thus may become a saint by a single communion.

Sermon XXXII

THIRD SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE MERCY OF GOD TOWARDS SINNERS

"There shall be joy in heaven upon one sinner that doth penance, more than ninety-nine just, who need not penance."—LUKE 15:7.

In this day's gospel it is related that the Pharisees murmured against Jesus Christ, because he received sinners and eat with them. "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them" (v. 2). In answer to their murmurings our Lord said: If any of you had a hundred sheep, and lost one of them, would he not leave the ninety-nine in the desert, and go in search of the lost sheep? would he not continue his search until he found it? and having found it, would he not carry it on his shoulders, and, rejoicing, say to his friends and neighbours: "Rejoice with me, because I have found my sheep that was lost?" (v. 6.) In conclusion, the Son of God said: "I say to you, there shall be joy in heaven upon one sinner that doth penance, more than upon ninety-nine just, that need not penance." There is more joy in heaven upon one sinner who returns to God, than upon many just who preserve the grace of God. Let us, then, speak to-day on the mercy which God shows to sinners, first, in calling them to repentance; secondly, in receiving them when they return.

FIRST POINT. MERCY OF GOD IN CALLING SINNERS TO REPENTANCE.

1. After having sinned by eating the forbidden apple, Adam fled from the face of the Lord through shame of the sin he had committed. What must have been the astonishment of the angels when they saw God seeking after him, and calling him as it were with tears, saying: "Adam, where art thou?" (Gen. 3:9.) My beloved Adam, where art thou? These words, says Father Pereyra, in his commentary on this passage, "are the words of a father in search of his lost son." Towards you, brethren, the Lord acts in a similar manner. You fled from him and he has so often invited you to repentance by means of confessors and preachers. Who was it that spoke to you when they exhorted you to penance? It was the Lord. Preachers are, as St. Paul says, his ambassadors. "For Christ, therefore, we are ambassadors; God, as it were, exhorting by us." (2 Cor. 5:20.) Hence he writes to the sinners of Corinth: "For Christ, we beseech you, be reconciled to God." (Ibid.) In explaining these words St. Chrysostom says: "Ipse Christus vos obsecrat: quid autem obsecrat? Reconciliamini Deo." Then, says the holy doctor, Jesus Christ himself entreats you, O sinners: and what does he entreat you to do? To make peace with God. The saint adds: "Non enim ipse inimicus gerit, sed vos." It is not God that acts like an enemy, but you; that is, God does not refuse to make peace with sinners, but they are unwilling to be reconciled with him."

2. But notwithstanding the refusal of sinners to return to God, he does not cease to continue to call them by so many interior inspirations, remorses of conscience, and terrors of chastisements. Thus, beloved Christians, God has spoken to you, and, seeing that you disregarded his words, he has had recourse to scourges; he has called you to repentance by such a persecution, by temporal losses, by the death of a relative, by sickness which has brought you to the brink of the grave. He has, according to holy David, placed before your eyes the bow of your damnation, not that you might be condemned to eternal misery, but that you might be delivered from hell, which you deserved. "Thou hast given a warning to them that fear thee, that they may flee from before the bow, that thy beloved maybe delivered." (Ps. 59:6). You regarded certain afflictions as misfortunes; but they were mercies from God; they were the voices of God calling on you to renounce sin, that you might escape perdition. "My jaws are become hoarse." (Ps. 68:4.) My son, says the Lord, I have almost lost my voice in calling you to repentance. "I am weary of entreating thee." (Jer. 15:6.) I have become weary in imploring you to offend me no more.

3. By your ingratitude you deserved that he should call you no more; but he has continued to invite you to return to him. And who is it that has called you? It is a God of infinite majesty, who is to be one day your judge, and on whom your eternal happiness or misery depends. And what are you but miserable worms deserving hell? Why has he called you? To restore to you the life of grace which you have lost. "Return ye and live." (Ezec. 18:32) To acquire the grace of God, it would be but little to spend a hundred years in a desert in fasting and penitential austerities. But God offered it to you for a single act of sorrow; you refused that act, and after your refusal he has not abandoned you, but has sought after you, saying: "And why will you die, O house of Israel?" (Ez. 18:31.) Like a father weeping and following his son, who has voluntarily thrown himself into the sea, God has sought after you, saying, through compassion to each of you: My son, why dost thou bring thyself to eternal misery? "Why will you die, O house of Israel?"

4. As a pigeon that seeks to take shelter in a tower, seeing the entrance closed on every side, continues to fly round till she finds an opening through which she enters, so, says St. Augustine, did the divine mercy act towards me when I was in enmity with God. Circuibat super me fidelis a longe misericordia tua." The Lord treated you, brethren, in a similar manner. As often as you sinned you banished him from your souls. The wicked have said to God: "Depart from us." (Job 21:14.) And, instead of abandoning you, what has the Lord done? He has placed himself at the door of your ungrateful hearts, and, by his knocking, has made you feel that he was outside, and seeking for admission. "Behold I stand at the gate and knock." (Apoc. 3:20.) He, as it were, entreated you to have compassion on him, and to allow him to enter. "Open to me, my sister." (Cant. 5:2.) Open to me; I will deliver you from perdition; I will forget all the insults you have offered to me if you give up sin. Perhaps you are unwilling to open to me through fear of becoming poor by restoring ill-gotten goods, or by separating from a person who provided for you? Am not I, says the Lord, able to provide for you? Perhaps you think that, if you renounce a certain friendship which separates you from me, you shall lead a life of misery? Am I not able to content your soul and to make your life happy? Ask those who love me with their whole hearts, and they will tell you that my grace makes them content, and that they would not exchange their condition, though poor and humble, for all the delights and riches of the monarchs of the earth.

SECOND POINT. MERCY OF GOD IN WAITING FOR SINNERS TO RETURN TO HIM.

5. We have considered the divine mercy in calling sinners to repentance: let us now consider his patience in waiting for their return. That great servant of God, D. Sancia Carillo, a penitent of Father John Avila, used to say, that the consideration of God's patience with sinners made her desire to build a church, and entitle it "The Patience of God." Ah, sinners! who could ever bear with what God has borne from you? If the offences which you have committed against God had been offered to your best friends, or even to your parents, they surely would have sought revenge. When you insulted the Lord he was able to chastise you; you repeated the insult, and he did not punish your guilt, but preserved your life, and provided you with sustenance. He, as it were, pretended not to see the injuries you offered to him, that you might enter into yourselves, and cease to offend him. "Thou over-lookest the sins of men for the sake of repentance." (Wis. 11:24.) But how, O Lord, does it happen, that thou canst not behold a single sin, and that thou dost bear in silence with so many? "Thy eyes are too pure to behold evil, and thou canst not look on iniquity. Why lookest thou upon them that do unjust things, and holdest thy peace?" (Hab. 1:13.) Thou seest the vindictive prefer their own before thy honour; thou beholdest the unjust, instead of restoring what they have stolen, continuing to commit theft; the unchaste, instead of being ashamed of their impurities, boasting of them before others; the scandalous, not content with the sins which they themselves commit, but seeking to draw others into rebellion against thee; thou seest all this, and holdest thy peace, and dost not inflict vengeance.

6. "Omnis creatura," says St. Thomas, "tibi factori deserviens excandescit adversus injustos." All creatures—the earth, fire, air, water—because they all obey God, would, by a natural instinct, wish to punish the sinner, and to avenge the injuries which he does to the Creator; but God, through his mercy, restrains them. But, O Lord, thou waitest for the wicked that they may enter into themselves; and dost thou not see that they abuse thy mercy to offer new insults to thy majesty? "Thou hast been favourable to the nation, O Lord, thou hast been favourable to the nation: art thou glorified?" (Isa. 26:15.) Thou hast waited so long for sinners; thou hast abstained from inflicting punishment; but what glory have you reaped from thy forbearance? They have become more wicked. Why so much patience with such ungrateful souls? Why dost thou continue to wait for their repentance? Why dost thou not chastise their wickedness? The same Prophet answers: "The Lord waiteth that he may have mercy on you." (Isa. 30:18.) God waits for sinners that they may one day repent, and that after their repentance, he may pardon and save them. "As I live, saith the Lord, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live." (Ezech. 33:11.) St. Augustine goes so far as to say that the Lord, if he were not God, should be unjust on account of his excessive patience towards sinners. "Deus, Deus meus, pace tua dicam, nisi quia Deus esses, injustus esses." By waiting for those who abuse his patience to multiply their sins, God appears to do an injustice to the divine honour. "We," continues the saint, "sin; we adhere to sin (some of us become familiar and intimate with sin, and sleep for months and years in this miserable state); we rejoice at sin (some of us go so far as to boast of our wickedness); and thou art appeased! We provoke thee to anger—thou dost invite us to mercy." We and God appear to be, as it were, engaged in a contest, in which we labour to provoke him to chastise our guilt, and he invites us to pardon.

7. Lord, exclaimed holy Job, what is man, that thou dost entertain so great an esteem for him? Why dost thou love him so tenderly? "What is man that thou shouldst magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him?" (Job. 7:17.) St. Denis the Areopagite says, that God seeks after sinners like a despised lover, entreating them not to destroy themselves. "Deus etiam a se aversos amatorie sequitur, et deprecatur ne pereant." Why, O ungrateful souls, do you fly from me? I love you and desire nothing but your welfare. Ah, sinners! says St. Teresa, remember that he who now calls and seeks after you, is that God who shall one day be your judge. If you are lost, the great mercies which he now shows you, shall be the greatest torments which you shall suffer in hell.

THIRD POINT. MERCY OF GOD IN RECEIVING PENITENT SINNERS.

8. Should a subject who has rebelled against an earthly monarch go into the presence of his sovereign to ask pardon, the prince instantly banishes the rebel from his sight, and does not condescend even to look at him. But God does not treat us in this manner, when we go with humility before him to implore mercy and forgiveness. "The Lord your God is merciful, and will not turn away his face from you if you return to him." (2 Par. 30:9.) God cannot turn away his face from those who cast themselves at his feet with an humble and contrite heart. Jesus himself has protested that he will not reject any one who returns to him. "And him that cometh to me, I will not cast out." (John 6:37.) But how can he reject those whom he himself invites to return, and promises to embrace? "Return to me, saith the Lord, and I will receive thee." (Jer. 3:1.) In another place he says: Sinners, I ought to turn my back on you, because you first turned your. back on me; but be converted to me, and I will be converted to you. "Turn to me, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will turn to you, saith the Lord of hosts." (Zach. 1:3.)

9. Oh! with what tenderness does God embrace a sinner that returns to him! This tenderness Jesus Christ wished to declare to us when he said that he is the good pastor, who, as soon as he finds the lost sheep, embraces it and places it on his own shoulders. "And when he hath found it, doth he not lay it upon his shoulders rejoicing?" (Luke 15:5.) This tenderness also appears in the parable of the prodigal son, in which Jesus Christ tells us that he is the good father, who, when his lost son returns, goes to meet him, embraces and kisses him, and, as it were, swoons away through joy in receiving him. "And running to him, he fell upon his neck and kissed him." (Luke 15:20.)

10. God protests that when sinners repent of their iniquities, he will forget all their sins, as if they had never offended him. "But, if the wicked do penance for all the sins which he hath committed . . . living, he shall live, and shall not die. I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done." (Ezech. 18:21, 22.) By the Prophet Isaias, the Lord goes so far as to say: "Come and accuse me, saith the Lord. If your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow." (Isa. 1:18.) Mark the words, Come and accuse me. As if the Lord said: Sinners, come to me, and if I do not pardon and embrace you, reprove me, upbraid me with violating my promise. But no! God cannot despise an humble and contrite heart. "A contrite and humble heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." (Ps. 50:19.)

11. To show mercy and grant pardon to sinners, God regards as redounding to his own glory. "And therefore shall he be exalted sparing you." (Isa. 30:18.) The holy Church says, that God displays his omnipotence in granting pardon and mercy to sinners. "O God, who manifested thy omnipotence in sparing and showing mercy." Do not imagine, dearly beloved sinners, that God requires of you to labour for a long time before he grants you pardon: as soon as you wish for forgiveness, he is ready to give it. Behold what the Scripture says: "Weeping, thou shalt not weep, he will surely have pity on thee." (Isa. 30:19.) You shall not have to weep for a long time: as soon as you shall have shed the first tear through sorrow for your sins, God will have mercy on you. "At the voice of thy cry, as soon as he shall hear, he will answer thee." (Ibid.) The moment he shall hear you say: Forgive me, O my God, forgive me, he will instantly answer and grant your pardon.

Sermon XXXIII

FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

DEATH IS CERTAIN AND UNCERTAIN

"Let down your nets for a draught."—LUKE 5:4.

IN this day's gospel we find that, having gone up into one of the ships, and having heard from St. Peter, that he and his companions had laboured all the night and had taken nothing, Jesus Christ said: "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught." They obeyed; and having cast out their nets into the sea, they took such a multitude of fishes, that the nets were nearly broken, Brethren, God has placed us in the midst of the sea of this life, and has commanded us to cast out our nets, that we may catch fishes; that is, that we may perform good works, by which we can acquire merits for eternal life. Happy we, if we attain this end and save our souls! Unhappy we, if, instead of laying up treasures for heaven, we by our sins merit hell, and bring our souls to damnation! Our happiness or misery for eternity depends on the moment of our death, which is certain and uncertain. The Lord assures us that death is certain, that we may prepare for it; but, on the other hand, he leaves us uncertain as to the time of our death, that we may be always prepared for it—two points of the utmost importance.

First Point. It is certain that we shall die.

Second Point. It is uncertain when we shall die.

FIRST POINT. IT IS CERTAIN THAT WE SHALL DIE.

1. "It is appointed unto men once to die." (Heb. 9:27.) The decree has been passed for each of us: we must all die. St. Cyprian says, that we are all born with the halter on the neck: hence, every step we make brings us nearer to the gibbet. For each of us the gibbet shall be the last sickness, which will end in death. As then, brethren, your name has been inserted in the registry of baptism, so it shall be one day written in the record of the dead. As, in speaking of your ancestors, you say: God be merciful to my father, to my uncle, or to my brother; so others shall say the same of you when you shall be in the other world; and as you have often heard the death-bell toll for many, so others shall hoar it toll for you.

2. All things future, which regard men now living, are uncertain, but death is certain. "All other goods and evils," says St. Augustine, "are uncertain; death only is certain." It is uncertain whether such an infant shall be rich or poor, whether he shall enjoy good or ill health, whether he shall die at an early or at an advanced age. But it is certain that he shall die, though he be son of a peer or of a monarch. And, when the hour arrives, no one can resist the stroke of death. The same St. Augustine says: "Fires, waters, and the sword are resisted; kings are resisted: death comes; who resists it?" (in Ps. xii.) We may resist conflagrations, inundations, the sword of enemies, and the power of princes; but who can resist death? A certain king of France, as Belluacensis relates, said in his last moments: "Behold, with all my power, I cannot make death wait for a single hour." No; when the term of life has arrived, death does not wait even a moment—"Thou hast appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed." (Job. 14:5.)

3. We must all die. This truth we not only believe, but see with our eyes. In every age houses, streets, and cities are filled with new inhabitants: their former possessors are shut up in the grave. And, as for them the days of life are over, so a time shall come when not one of all who are now alive shall be among the living. "Days shall be formed, and no one in them." (Ps. 138:16.) "Who is the man that shall live, and shall not see death?" (Ps. 88:49) Should anyone flatter himself that he will not die, he would not only be a disbeliever—for it is of faith that we shall all die—but he would be regarded as a madman. We know that all men, even potentates and princes and emperors, have, after a certain time, fallen victims to death. And where are they now? "Tell me," says St. Bernard, "where are the lovers of the world? Nothing has remained of them but ashes and worms." Of so many great men of the world, though buried in marble mausoleums, nothing has remained but a little dust and a few withered bones. We know that our ancestors are no longer among the living: of their death we are constantly reminded by their pictures, their memorandum books, their beds, and by the clothes which they have left us. And can we entertain a hope or a doubt that we shall not die? Of all who lived in this town a hundred years ago how many are now alive? They are all in eternity—in an eternal day of delights, or in an eternal night of torments. Either the one or the other shall be our lot also.

4. But, O God! we all know that we shall die: the misfortune is, that we imagine death as distant as if it were never to come, and therefore we lose sight of it. But, sooner or later, whether we think or think not of death, it is certain, and of faith that we shall die, and that we are drawing nearer to it every day. "For we have not here a lasting city, but we seek one that is to come." (Heb. 13:14.) This is not our country: here we are pilgrims on a journey). "While we are in the body we are absent from the Lord." (2 Cor. 5:6.) Our country is Paradise, if we know how to acquire it by the grace of God and by our own good works. Our house is not that in which we live; we dwell in it only in passing; our dwelling is in eternity. "Man shall go into the house of his eternity." (Eccl. 12:5.) How great would be the folly of the man, who, in passing through a strange country, should lay out all his property in the purchase of houses and possessions in a foreign land, and reduce himself to the necessity of living miserably for the remainder of his days in his own country! And is not he, too, a fool, who seeks after happiness in this world, from which he must soon depart; and, by his sins, exposes himself to the danger of misery in the next, where he must live for eternity?

5. Tell me, beloved brethren, if, instead of preparing for his approaching death, a person condemned to die were, on his way to the place of execution, to employ the few remaining moments of his life in admiring the beauty of the houses as he passed along, in thinking of balls and comedies, in uttering immodest words, and detracting his neighbours, would you not say that the unhappy man had either lost his reason, or that he was abandoned by God? And are not you on the way to death? Why then do you seek only the gratification of the senses? Why do you not think of preparing the accounts which you shall one day, and perhaps very soon, have to render at the tribunal of Jesus Christ? Souls that have faith, leave to the fools of this world the care of realizing a fortune on this earth; seek you to make a fortune for the next life, which shall be eternal. The present life must end, and end very soon.

6. Go to the grave in which your relatives and friends are buried. Look at their dead bodies: each of them says to you: "Yesterday for me; to-day for thee." (Eccl. 38:23.) What has happened to me must one day happen to thee. Thou shalt become dust and ashes, as I am. And where shall thy soul be found, if, before death, thou hast not settled thy accounts with God? Ah, brethren! if you wish to live well, and to to have you accounts ready for that great day, on which your doom to eternal life or to eternal death must be decided, endeavour, during the remaining days of life, to live with death before your eyes. "O death, thy sentence is welcome." (Eccl. 41:3.) Oh! how correct are the judgments, how well directed the actions, of those who form their judgments, and perform their actions, with death before their view! The remembrance of death destroys all attachment to the goods of this earth. "Let the end of life be considered," says St. Lawrence Justinian, "and there will be nothing in this world to be loved." (de Ligno Vitæ, cap. v.) Yes; all the riches, honours, and pleasures of this world are easily despised by him who considers that he must soon leave them for ever, and that he shall be thrown into the grave to be the food of worms.

7. Some banish the thought of death, as if, by avoiding to think of death, they could escape it. But death cannot be avoided; and they who banish the thought of it, expose themselves to great danger of an unhappy death. By keeping death before their eyes, the saints have despised all the goods of this earth. Hence St. Charles Borromeo kept on his table a death's head, that he might have it continually in view. Cardinal Baronius had the words, Memento mori—"Remember death"—inscribed on his ring. The venerable P. Juvenal Anzia, Bishop of Saluzzo, had before him a skull, on which was written, "As I am, so thou shalt be." In retiring to deserts and caves the holy solitaries brought with them the head of a dead man; and for what purpose? To prepare themselves for death. Thus a certain hermit being asked at death, why he was so cheerful, answered: I have kept death always before my eyes; and therefore, now that it has arrived, I feel no terror. But, oh! how full of terror is death, when it comes to those who have thought of it but seldom.

SECOND POINT. IT IS UNCERTAIN WHEN WE SHALL DIE.

8. "Nothing," says the Idiota, "is more certain than death, but nothing is more uncertain than the hour of death." It is certain that we shall die. God has already determined the year, the month, the day, the hour, the moment, in which each of us shall leave this earth, and enter into eternity; but this moment he has resolved not to make known to us. And justly, says St. Augustine, has the Lord concealed it; for, had he manifested to all the day fixed for their death, many should be induced to continue in the habit of sin by the certainty of not dying before the appointed day. "Si statuisset viam omnibus, faceret abundare peccata de securitate" (in Ps. cxliv). Hence the holy doctor teaches that God has concealed from us the day of our death, that we may spend all our days well. "Latet ultimus dies, ut observentur omnes dies." (Hom. xii. inter 50.) Hence Jesus Christ says: "Be you also ready; for at what hour you think not the Son of Man will come." (Luke 12:40.) That we may be always prepared to die, he wishes us to be persuaded that death will come when we least expect it. "Of death," says St. Gregory, "we are uncertain, that we may be found always prepared for death." St. Paul likewise admonishes us that the day of the Lord—that is, the day on which the Lord shall judge us—shall come unexpectedly, like a thief in the night, "The day of the Lord shall so come as a thief in the night." (1 Thess. 5:2.) Since, then, says St. Bernard, death may assail you and take away your life in every place and at every time, you should, if you wish to die well and to save your soul, be at all times and places in expectation of death: "Mors ubique te expectat tu ubique eam expectabis:" and St. Augustine says: "Latet ultimus dies, ut observentur omnes dies." (Hom. xii.) The Lord conceals from us the last day of our life, that we may always have ready the account which we must render to God after death.

9. Many Christians are lost, because many, even among the old, who feel the approach of death, flatter themselves that it is at a distance, and that it will not come without giving them time to prepare for it. "Dura mente," says St. Gregory, "abesse longe mors crediturctiam cum sentitur." (Moral. lib. 8.) Death, even when it is felt, is believed to be far off. O brethren, are these your sentiments? How do you know that your death is near or distant? What reason have you to suppose that death will give you time to prepare for it? How many do we know who have died suddenly? Some have died walking; some sitting; and some during sleep. Did any one of these ever imagine that he should die in such a manner? But they have died in this way; and if they were in enmity with God, what has been the lot of their unhappy souls? Miserable the man who meets with an unprovided death! And I assert, that all who ordinarily neglect to unburthen their conscience, die without preparation, even though they should have seven or eight days to prepare for a good death; for as I shall show in the forty-fourth sermon, it is very difficult, during these days of confusion and terror, to settle accounts with God, and to return to him with sincerity. But I repeat that death may come upon you in such a manner, that you shall not have time even to receive the sacraments. And who knows whether, in another hour, you shall be among the living or the dead? The uncertainty of the time of his death made Job tremble. "For I know not how long I shall continue, or whether, after a while, my Maker may take me away." (Job 32:22.) Hence St. Basil exhorts us in going to bed at night, not to trust that we shall see the next day. "Cum in lectulum ad quiescendum membra tua posueris, noli confidere de lucis adventu." (Inst. ad fil. spirit.)

10. Whenever, then, the devil tempts you to sin, by holding out the hope that you will go to confession and repair the evil you have done, say to him in answer: How do I know that this shall not be the last day of my life? And should death overtake me in sin, and not give me time to make my confession, what shall become of me for all eternity? Alas! how many poor sinners have been struck dead in the very act of indulging in some sinful pleasure, and have been sent to hell! "As fishes are taken by the hook, and as birds are caught with the snare, so men are taken in the evil time." (Eccl. 9:12.) Fishes are taken with the hook while they eat the bait that conceals the hook, which is the instrument of their death. The evil time is precisely that in which sinners are actually offending God. In the act of sin, they calm their conscience by a security of afterwards making a good confession, and reversing the sentence of their damnation. But death comes suddenly upon them, and does not leave them time for repentance. "For, when they shall say peace and security, then shall sudden destruction come upon them." (1 Thess. 5:3.)

11. If a person lend a sum of money he is careful instantly to get a written acknowledgment, and to take all the other means necessary to secure the repayment of it. Who, he says, can know what shall happen? Death may come, and I may lose my money. And how does it happen that there are so many who neglect to use the same caution for the salvation of their souls, which is of far greater importance than all temporal interests? Why do they not also say: Who knows what may happen? death may come, and I may lose my soul? If you lose a sum of money, all is not lost; if you lose it one way you may recover the loss in another; but he that dies and loses his soul, loses all, and has no hope of ever recovering it. If we could die twice, we might, if we lost our soul the first time, save it the second. But we cannot die twice. "It is appointed unto men once to die." (Heb. 9:27.) Mark the word once: death happens to each of us but once: he who has erred the first time has erred for ever. Hence, to bring the soul to hell is an irreparable error. "Periisse semel æternum est."

12. The venerable Father John Avila was a man of great sanctity, and apostle of Spain. What was the answer of this great servant of God, who had led a holy life from his childhood, when he was told that his death was at hand, and that he had but a short time to live? "Oh!" replied the holy man with trembling, "that I had a little more time to prepare for death!" St. Agatho, abbot, after spending so many years in penance, trembled at the hour of death, and said: "What shall become of me? who can know the judgments of God?" And, O brethren, what will you say when the approach of death shall be announced to you, and when, from the priest who attends you, you shall hear these words: "Go forth, Christian soul, from this world?" You will, perhaps, say: Wait a little; allow me to prepare better. No; depart immediately; death does not wait. You should therefore prepare yourselves now. "With fear and trembling work out your salvation." (Phil. 2:12.) St. Paul admonishes us that, if we wish to save our souls, we must live in fear and trembling, lest death may find us in sin. Be attentive, brethren: there is question of eternity. "If a tree fall to the south or to the north, in what place soever it shall fall there shall it be." (Eccl. 11:3.) If, when the tree of your life is cut down, you fall to the south—that is, if you obtain eternal life—how great shall be your joy at being able to say: I shall be saved; I have secured all; I can never lose God; I shall be happy for ever. But, if you fall to the north—that is, into eternal damnation—how great shall be your despair! Alas! you shall say, I have erred, and my error is irremediable! Arise, then, from your tepidity, and, after this sermon, make a resolution to give yourselves sincerely to God. This resolution will insure you a good death, and will make you happy for eternity.

Sermon XXXIV

FIFTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE SIN OF ANGER

"Whosoever is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment."—MATT. 5:22.

ANGER resembles fire; hence, as fire is vehement in its action, and, by the smoke which it produces, obstructs the view, so anger makes men rush into a thousand excesses, and prevents them from seeing the sinfulness of their conduct, and thus exposes them to the danger of the judgment of eternal death. "Whosoever is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment." Anger is so pernicious to man that it even disfigures his countenance. No matter how comely and gentle he may be, he shall, as often as he yields to the passion of anger, appear to be a monster and a wild beast full of terror. "Iracundus," says St. Basil, "humanam quasi figuram amittit, feræ specimen indutus." Hom. xxi.) But, if anger disfigures us before men, how much more deformed will it render us in the eyes of God! In this discourse I will show, in the first point, the destruction which anger unrestrained brings on the soul; and, in the second, how we ought to restrain anger in all occasions of provocation which may occur to us.

FIRST POINT. THE RUIN WHICH ANGER UNRESTRAINED BRINGS ON THE SOUL.

1. St. Jerome says that anger is the door by which all vices enter the soul. "Omnium vitiorum janua est iracundia." (Inc. xxix. Prov.) Anger precipitates men into resentments, blasphemies, acts of injustice, detractions, scandals, and other iniquities; for the passion of anger darkens the understanding, and makes a man act like a beast and a madman. "Caligavit ab indignatione oculus meus." (Job 17:7.) My eye has lost its eight through indignation. David said: "My eye is troubled with wrath." (Ps. 30:10.) Hence, according to St. Bonaventure, an angry man is incapable of distinguishing between what is just and unjust. "Iratus non potest videre quod justum est vel injustum." In a word, St. Jerome says that anger deprives a man of prudence, reason, and understanding. "Ab omni concilio deturpat, ut donec irascitur, insanire credatur." Hence St. James says: "The anger of man worketh not the justice of God." (St. James 1:20.) The acts of it man under the influence of anger cannot be conformable to the divine justice, and consequently cannot be faultless.

2. A man who does not restrain the impulse of anger, easily falls into hatred towards the person who has been the occasion of his passion. According to St. Augustine, hatred is nothing else than persevering anger. "Odium est ira diuturno tempore perseverans." Hence St. Thomas says that "anger is sudden, but hatred is lasting." Opusc. v.) It appears, then, that in him in whom anger perseveres hatred also reigns. But some will say: I am the head of the house; I must correct my children and servants, and, when necessary, I must raise my voice against the disorders which I witness. I say in answer: It is one thing to be angry against a brother, and another to be displeased at the sin of a brother. To be angry against sin is not anger, but zeal; and therefore it is not only lawful, but is sometimes a duty. But our anger must be accompanied with prudence, and must appear to be directed against sin, but not against the sinner; for, if the person whom we correct perceive that we speak through passion and hatred towards him, the correction will be unprofitable and even mischievous. To be angry, then, against a brother's sin is certainly lawful. "He," says St. Augustine, "is not angry with a brother who is angry against a brother's sin." It is thus, as David said, we may be angry without sin. "Be ye angry, and sin not." (Ps. 4:5.) But, to be angry against a brother on account of the sin which he has committed is not lawful; because, according to St. Augustine, we are not allowed to hate others for their vices. "Nec propter vitia (licet) homines odisse" (in Ps. xcviii).

3. Hatred brings with it a desire of revenge; for, according to St. Thomas, anger, when fully voluntary, is accompanied with a desire of revenge. "Ira est appetitus vindictæ." But you will perhaps say: If I resent such an injury, God will have pity on me, because I have just grounds of resentment Who, I ask, has told you that you have just grounds for seeking revenge? It is you, whose understanding is clouded by passions, that so. I have already said that anger obscures the mind, and takes away our reason and understanding. As long as the passion of anger lasts, you will consider your neighbour's conduct very unjust and intolerable; but, when your anger shall have passed away, you shall see that his act was not so bad as it appeared to you. But, though the injury be grievous, or even more grievous, God will not have compassion on you if you seek revenge. No, he says: vengeance for sins belongs not to you, but to me; and when the time shall come I will chastise them as they deserve. "Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time." (Deut. 32:35.) If you resent an injury done to you by a neighbour, God will justly inflict vengeance on you for all the injuries you have offered to him, and particularly for taking revenge on a brother whom he commands you to pardon. "He that seeketh to revenge himself, shall find vengeance from the Lord . . . Man to man reserveth anger, and doth he seek remedy of God? . . . He that is but flesh nourisheth anger; and doth he ask forgiveness of God? Who shall obtain pardon for his sins?" (Eccl. 28:1, 3, 5.) Man, a worm of flesh, reserves anger, and takes revenge on a brother: does he afterwards dare to ask mercy of God? And who, adds the sacred writer, can obtain pardon for the iniquities of so daring a sinner? "Qua fronte," says St. Augustine, "indulgentiam peccatorem obtinere poterit, qui præcipienti dare veniam non acquiescit." How can he who will not obey the command of God to pardon his neighbour, expect to obtain from God the forgiveness of his own sins?

4. Let us implore the Lord to preserve us from yielding to any strong passion, and particularly to anger. "Give me not over to a shameful and foolish mind." (Eccl. 23:6.) For, he that submits to such a passion is exposed to great danger of falling into a grievous sin against God or his neighbour. How many, in consequence of not restraining anger, break out into horrible blasphemies against God or his saints! But, at the very time we are in a flame of indignation, God is armed with scourges. The Lord said one day to the Prophet Jeremias: "What seest thou, Jeremias? And I said: I see a rod watching." (Jer. 1:11.) Lord, I behold a rod watching to inflict punishment. "The Lord asked him again: "What seest thou? And I said: I see a boiling caldron." (Ibid., 1:13). The boiling chaldron is the figure of a man inflamed with wrath, and threatened with a rod, that is, with the vengeance of God. Behold, then, the ruin which anger unrestrained brings on man. It deprives him, first, of the grace of God, and afterwards of corporal life. "Envy and anger shortens a man's days." (Eccl. 30:26.) Job says: "Anger indeed killeth the foolish." (Job 5:2.) All the days of their life, persons addicted to anger are unhappy, because they are always in a tempest. But let us pass to the second point, in which I have to say many things which will assist you to overcome this vice.

SECOND POINT. HOW WE OUGHT TO RESTRAIN ANGER IN THE OCCASIONS OF PROVOCATION WHICH OCCUR TO US.

5. In the first place it is necessary to know that it is not possible for human weakness, in the midst of so many occasions, to be altogether free from every motion of anger. No one, as Seneca says, can be entirely exempt from this passion. "Iracundia nullum genus hominum excipit" (1. 3, c. 12). All our efforts must be directed to the moderation of the feelings of anger which spring up in the soul. How are they to be moderated? By meekness. This is called the virtue of the lamb—that is, the beloved virtue of Jesus Christ. Because, like a lamb, without anger or even complaint, he bore the sorrows of his passion and crucifixion. "He shall be led as a sheep to the slaughter, and dumb as a lamb before his shearer, and he shall not open his mouth." (Isa. 53:7.) Hence he has taught us to learn of him meekness and humility of heart. "Learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart." (Matt. 11:29.)

6. Oh! how pleasing in the sight of God are the meek, who submit in peace to all crosses, misfortunes, persecutions, and injuries! To the meek is promised the kingdom of heaven. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the land." (Matt. 5:4.) They are called the children of God. "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God." (Ibid., 5:9.) Some boast of their meekness, but without any grounds; for they are meek only towards those who praise and confer favours upon them: but to those who injure or censure them they are all fury and vengeance. The virtue of meekness consists in being meek and peaceful towards those who hate and maltreat us. "With them that hated peace I was peaceful." (Ps. 119:7.)

7. We must, as St. Paul says, put on the bowels of mercy towards all men, and bear one with another. "Put on ye the bowels of mercy, humility, modesty, patience, bearing with one another, and forgiving one another, if any have a complaint against another." (Col. 3:12, 13.) You wish others to bear with your defects, and to pardon your faults; you should act in the same manner towards them. Whenever, then, you receive an insult from a person enraged against you, remember that a "mild answer breaketh wrath." (Prov. 15:1.) A certain monk once passed through a cornfield: the owner of the field ran out, and spoke to him in very offensive and injurious language. The monk humbly replied: Brother, you are right; I have done wrong; pardon me. By this answer the husbandman was so much appeased that he instantly became calm, and even wished to follow the monk, and to enter into religion. The proud make use of the humiliations they receive to increase their pride; but the humble and the meek turn the contempt and insults offered to them into an occasion of advancing in humility. "He," says St. Bernard, "is humble who converts humiliation into humility." (Ser. xxiv. in Can.)

8. "A man of meekness," says St. Chrysostom, "is useful to himself and to others." The meek are useful to themselves, because, according to F. Alvares, the time of humiliation and contempt is for them the time of merit. Hence, Jesus Christ calls his disciples happy when they shall be reviled and persecuted. "Blessed are ye when they shall revile you and persecute you." (Matt. 5:11.) Hence, the saints have always desired to be despised as Jesus Christ has been despised. The meek are useful to others; because, as the same St. Chrysostom says, there is nothing better calculated to draw others to God, than to see a Christian meek and cheerful when he receives an injury or an insult. "Nihil ita conciliat Domino familiares ut quod illum vident mansuetudine jucundum." The reason is, because virtue is known by being tried; and, as gold is tried by fire, so the meekness of men is proved by humiliation. "Gold and silver are tried in the fire, but acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation. (Eccl. 2:5.) "My spikenard," says the spouse in the Canticles, "sent forth the odour thereof" (1:11.) The spikenard is an odoriferous plant, but diffuses its odours only when it is torn and bruised. In this passage the inspired writer gives us to understand, that a man cannot be said to be meek unless he is known to send forth the odour of his meekness by bearing injuries and insults in peace and without anger. God wishes us to be meek even towards ourselves. When a person commits a fault, God certainly wishes him to humble himself, to be sorry for his sin, and to purpose never to fall into it again; but he does not wish him to be indignant with himself, and give way to trouble and agitation of mind; for, while the soul is agitated, a man is incapable of doing good. "My heart is troubled; my strength hath left me." (Ps. 37:11.)

9. Thus, when we receive an insult, we must do violence to ourselves in order to restrain anger. Let us either answer with meekness, as recommended above, or let us remain silent; and thus, as St. Isidore says, we shall conquer. "Quamvis quis irritet, tu dissimula, quia tacendo vinces." But, if you answer through passion, you shall do harm to yourselves and others. It would be still worse to give an angry answer to a person who corrects you. "Medicanti irascitur," says St. Bernard, "qui non irascitur sagittanti." (Ser. vi. de Nativ.) Some are not angry, though they ought to be indignant with those who wound their souls by flattery; and are filled with indignation against the person who censures them in order to heal their irregularities. Against the man who abhors correction, the sentence of perdition has, according to the Wise Man, been pronounced. "Because they have despised all my reproofs, . . . the prosperity of fools shall destroy them." (Prov. 1:30, etc.) Fools regard as prosperity to be free from correction, or to despise the admonitions which they receive; but such prosperity is the cause of their ruin. When you meet with an occasion of anger, you must, in the first place, be on your guard not to allow anger to enter your heart. "Be not quickly angry." (Eccles. 7:10.) Some persons change colour, and get into a passion, at every contradiction: and when anger has got admission, God knows to what it shall lead them. Hence, it is necessary to foresee these occasions in our meditations and prayers; for, unless we are prepared for them, it will be as difficult to restrain anger as to put a bridle on a horse while running away.

10. Whenever we have the misfortune to permit anger to enter the soul, let us be careful not to allow it to remain. Jesus Christ tells all who remember that a brother is offended with them, not to offer the gift which they bring to the altar without being first reconciled to their neighbour. "Go first to be reconciled to thy brother, and then coming thou shalt offer thy gift." (Matt. 5:24.) And he who has received any offence, should endeavour to root out of his heart not only all anger, but also every feeling of bitterness towards the persons who have offended him. "Let all bitterness," says St. Paul, "and anger and indignation . . . be put away from you." (Eph. 4:31.) As long as anger continues, follow the advice of Seneca—"When you shall be angry do nothing, say nothing, which may be dictated by anger." Like David, be silent, and do not speak, when you feel that you are disturbed. "I was troubled, and I spoke not." (Ps. 76:5.) How many when inflamed with anger, say and do what they afterwards, in their cooler moments, regret, and excuse themselves by saying that they were in a passion? As long, then, as anger lasts we must be silent, and abstain from doing or resolving to do anything; for, what is done in the heat of passion will, according to the maxim of St. James, be unjust. "The anger of man worketh not the justice of God." (1:20.) It is also necessary to abstain altogether from consulting those who might foment our indignation. "Blessed," says David, "is the man who hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly." (Ps. 1:1.) To him who is asked for advice, Ecclesiasticus says: "If thou blow the spark, it shall burn as a fire; and if thou spit upon it, it shall be quenched." (Eccl. 28:14.) When a person is indignant at some injury which he has received, you may, by exhorting him to patience, extinguish the fire; but, if you encourage revenge, you may kindle a great flame. Let him, then, who feels himself in any way inflamed with anger, be on his guard against false friends, who, by an imprudent word, may be the cause of his perdition.

11. Let us follow the advice of the apostle: "Be not overcome by evil, but overcome evil by good." (Rom. 12:21.) "Be not overcome by evil:" do not allow yourself to be conquered by sin. If, through anger, you seek revenge or utter blasphemies, you are overcome by sin. But you will say: "I am naturally of a warm temper." By the grace of God, and by doing violence to yourself, you will be able to conquer your natural disposition. Do not consent to anger, and you shall subdue the warmth of your temper. But you say: "I cannot bear with unjust treatment." In answer I tell you, first, to remember that anger obscures reason, and prevents us from seeing things as they are. "Fire hath fallen on them, and they shall not see the sun." (Ps. 57:9.) Secondly, if you return evil for evil, your enemy shall gain a victory over you. "If," said David, "I have rendered to them that repaid me evils, let me deservedly fall empty before my enemies." (Ps. 7:5.) If I render evil for evil, I shall be defeated by my enemies. "Overcome evil by good." Render every foe good for evil. "Do good," says Jesus Christ, "to them that hate you." (Matt. 5:44.) This is the revenge of the saints, and is called by St. Paulinus, Heavenly revenge. It is by such revenge that you shall gain the victory. And should any of those, of whom the Prophet says, "The venom of asps is under their lips" (Ps. 139:4.), ask how you can submit to such an injury, let your answer be: "The chalice which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18:11.) And then turning to God you shall say: "I opened not my mouth, because thou hast done it" (Ps. 38:10), for it is certain that every cross which befalls you comes from the Lord. "Good things and evil are from God." (Eccl. 11:14.) Should any one take away your property, recover it if you can; but if you cannot, say with Job: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away" (1:21.) A certain philosopher, who lost some of his goods in a storm, said: "If I have lost my goods I will not lose my peace." And, do you say: If I have lost my property, I will not lose my soul.

12. In fine, when we meet with crosses, persecutions, and injuries, let us turn to God, who commands us to bear them with patience; and thus we shall always avoid anger. "Remember the fear of God, and be not angry with thy neighbour." (Eccl. 28:8.) Let us give a look at the will of God, which disposes things in this manner for our merit, and anger shall cease. Let us give a look at Jesus crucified, and we shall not have courage to complain. St. Eleazar being asked by his spouse how he bore so many injuries without yielding to anger, answered: I turn to Jesus Christ, and thus I preserve my peace. Finally, let us give a glance at our sins, for which we have deserved far greater contempt and chastisement, and we shall calmly submit to all evils. St. Augustine says, that though we are sometimes innocent of the crime for which we are persecuted, we are, nevertheless, guilty of other sins which merit greater punishment than that which we endure. "Esto non habemus peccatum, quod objicitur: habemus tamen, quod digne in nobis flagelletur." (in Ps. lxviii.)

Sermon XXXV

SIXTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE VANITY OF THE WORLD

"And have nothing to eat."—MARK 8:2.

1. SUCH were the attractions of our Divine Saviour, and such the sweetness with which he received all, that he drew after him thousands of the people. He one day saw himself surrounded by a great multitude of men, who followed him and remained with him three days, without eating anything. Touched with pity for them, Jesus Christ said to his disciples: "I have compassion on the multitude; for behold they have now been with me three days, and have nothing to eat." (Mark 8:2.) He, on this occasion, wrought the miracle of the multiplication of the seven loaves and a few fishes, so as to satisfy the whole multitude. This is the literal sense; but the mystic sense is, that in this world there is no food which can fill the desire of our souls. All the goods of this earth—riches, honours, and pleasures—delight the sense of the body, but cannot satiate the soul, which has been created for God, and which God alone can content. I will, therefore speak to-day on the vanity of the world, and will show how great is the illusion of the lovers of the world, who lead an unhappy life on this earth, and expose themselves to the imminent danger of a still more unhappy life in eternity.

2. "O ye sons of men," exclaims the Royal Prophet, against worldlings, "how long will you be dull at heart? Why do you love vanity and seek after lying?" (Ps. 4:3.) O men, O fools, how long will you fix the affections of your hearts on this earth? why do you love the goods of this world, which are all vanity and lies? Do you imagine that you shall find peace by the acquisition of these goods? But how can you expect to find peace, while you walk in the ways of affliction and misery? Behold how David describes the condition of worldlings. "Destruction and unhappiness in their ways; and the way of peace they have not known." (Ps. 13:3.) You hope to obtain peace from the world; but how can the world give you that peace which you seek, when St. John says, "that the whole world is seated in wickedness?" (1 John 5:19.) The world is full of iniquities; hence worldlings live under the despotism of the wicked one—that is, the Devil. The Lord has declared that there is no peace for the wicked who live without his grace. "There is no peace to the wicked." (Isa. 48:22.)

3. The goods of the world are but apparent goods, which cannot satisfy the heart of man. "You have eaten," says the Prophet Aggeus, "and have not had enough." (Ag. 1:6.) Instead of satisfying our hunger they increase it. "These," says St. Bernard, "provoke rather than extinguish hunger." If the goods of this world made men content, the rich and powerful should enjoy complete happiness; but experience shows the contrary. We see every day that they are the most unhappy of men; they appear always oppressed by fear, by jealousies and sadness. Listen to King Solomon, who abounded in these goods: "And behold all is vanity and vexation of spirit." (Eccl. 1:14.) He tells us, that all things in this world are vanity, lies, and illusion. They are not only vanity, but also affliction of spirit. They torture the poor soul, which finds in them a continual source, not of happiness, but of affliction and bitterness. This is a just punishment on those who instead of serving their God with joy, wish to serve their enemy—the world—which makes them endure the want of every good. "Because thou didst not serve the Lord thy God with joy and gladness of heart . . . thou shalt serve thy enemy in hunger, and thirst, and nakedness, and in want of all things." (Deut. 28:47, 48.) Man expects to content his heart with the goods of this earth; but, howsoever abundantly he may possess them, he is never satisfied. Hence, he always seeks after more of them, and is always unhappy. Oh! happy he who wishes for nothing but God; for God will satisfy all the desires of his heart. "Delight in the Lord, and he will give thee the requests of thy heart." (Ps. 36:4.) Hence St. Augustine asks: "What, O miserable man, dost thou seek in seeking after goods? Seek one good, in which are all goods." And, having dearly learned that the goods of this world do not content, but rather afflict the heart of man, the saint, turning to the Lord, said: "All things are hard, and thou alone repose." Hence in saying, "My God and my all," the seraphic St. Francis, though divested of all worldly goods, enjoyed greater riches and happiness than all the worldlings on this earth. Yes; for the peace which fills the soul that desires nothing but God, surpasses all the delights which creatures can give. They can only delight the senses, but cannot content the heart of man. "The peace of God which surpasseth all understanding." (Phil. 4:7.) According to St. Thomas, the difference between God, the sovereign good, and the goods of the earth, consists in this, that the more perfectly we possess God, the more ardently we love him, because the more perfectly we possess him, the better we comprehend his infinite greatness, and therefore the more we despise other things; but, when we possess temporal goods, we despise them, because we see their emptiness, and desire other things, which may make us content. "Summum bonum quanto perfectius possidetur, tanto magis amatur, et alia contemnuntur. Sed in appetitu temporalium bonorum, quando habentur, contemnentur, et alia appetuntur." (S. Thom. i. 2, qu. 2, art. 1, ad. 3.)

4. The Prophet Osee tells us that the world holds in its hand a deceitful balance. "He is like Chanaan" (that is the world); "there is a deceitful balance in his hand." (Osee 12:7.) We must, then, weigh things in the balance of God, and not in that of the world, which makes them appear different from what they are. What are the goods of this life? "My days," said Job, "have been swifter than a post: they have passed by as ships carrying fruits." (Job 9:25, 26.) The ships signify the lives of men, which soon pass away, and run speedily to death; and if men have laboured only to provide themselves with earthly goods, these fruits decay at the hour of death: we can bring none of them with us to the other world. We, says St. Ambrose, falsely call these things our property, which we cannot bring with us to eternity, where we must live for ever, and where virtue alone will accompany us. "Non nostra sunt, quæ non possumus auferre nobiscum: sola virtus nos comitatur." You, says St. Augustine, attend only to what a rich man possessed; but tell me , which of his possessions shall he, now that he is on the point of death, be able to take with him? "Quid hic habebat attendis, quid secum fert, attendo?" (Serm. xiii. de Adv. Dom.) The rich bring with them a miserable garment, which shall rot with them in the grave. And should they, during life, have acquired a great name, they shall be soon forgotten. "Their memory hath perished with a noise." (Ps. 9:7.)

5. Oh! that men would keep before their eyes that great maxim of Jesus Christ—"What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" (Matt. 16:26.) If they did, they should certainly cease to love the world. What shall it profit them at the hour of death to have acquired all the goods of this world, if their souls must go into hell to be in torments for all eternity? How many has this maxim sent into the cloister and into the desert? How many martyrs has it encouraged to embrace torments and death! In the history of England, we read of thirty kings and queens, who left the world and became religious, in order to secure a happy death. The consideration of the vanity of earthly goods made St. Francis Borgia retire from the world. At the sight of the Empress Isabella, who had died in the flower of youth, he came to the resolution of serving God alone. "Is such, then," he said, "the end of all the grandeur and crowns of this world? Henceforth I will serve a master who can never die." The day of death is called "the day of destruction" ("The day of destruction is at hand." Deut. 32:35), because on that day we shall lose and give up all the goods of the world—all its riches, honours, and pleasures. The shade of death obscures all the treasures and grandeurs of this earth; it obscures even the purple and the crown.

Sister Margaret of St. Anne, a Discalced Carmelite, and daughter of the Emperor Rodolph the Second, used to say: "What do kingdoms profit us at the hour of death?" "The affliction of an hour maketh one forget great delights." (Eccl. 11:29.) The melancholy hour of death puts an end to all the delights and pomps of this life. St. Gregory says, that all goods which cannot remain with us, or which are incapable of taking away our miseries, are deceitful. "Fallaces sunt que nobiscum permanere non possunt: fallaces sunt que mentis nostræ inopiam non expellunt." (Hom. xv., in Luc.) Behold a sinner whom the riches and honours which he had acquired made an object of envy to others. Death came upon him when he was at the summit of his glory, and he is no longer what he was. "I have seen the wicked highly exalted, and lifted up like the cedars of Libanus; and I passed by, and lo! he was not; and I sought him, and his place was not found." (Ps. 36:35, 36.)

6. These truths the unhappy damned fruitlessly confess in hell, where they exclaim with tears: "What hath pride profited us? or what advantage hath the boasting of riches brought us? All those things are passed away like a shadow." (Wis. 5:8, 9.) What, they say, have our pomps and riches profited us, now that they are all passed away like a shadow, and for us nothing remains but eternal torments and despair? Dearly beloved Christians, let us open our eyes, and now that we have it in our power, let us attend to the salvation of our souls; for, if we lose them, we shall not be able to save them in the next life. Aristippus, the philosopher, was once shipwrecked, and lost all his goods; but such was the esteem which the people entertained for him on account of his learning, that, as soon as he reached the shore, they presented him with an equivalent for all that he had lost. He then wrote to his friends, and exhorted them to attend to the acquisition of goods which cannot he lost by shipwreck. Our relatives and friends who have passed into eternity exhort us, from the other world, to labour in this life for the attainment of goods which are not lost at death. If at that awful moment we shall be found to have attended only to the accumulation of earthly goods, we shall be called fools, and shall receive the reproach addressed to the rich man in the gospel, who, after having reaped an abundant crop from his fields, said to himself: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thy rest, eat, drink, make good cheer. But God said to him: Thou fool, this night do they require thy soul of thee: and whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" (Luke 12:19, 20.) He said, "they require thy soul of thee," because to every man his soul is given, not with full power to dispose of it as he pleases, but it is given to him in trust, that he may preserve and return it to God in a state of innocence, when it shall be presented at the tribunal of the Sovereign Judge. The Redeemer concludes this parable by saying: "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God" (v. 21). This is what happens to those who seek to enrich themselves with the goods of this life, and not with the love of God. Hence St. Augustine asks: "What has the rich man if he has not charity? If the poor man has charity, what is there that he has not?" He that possesses all the treasures of this world, and has not charity, is the poorest of men; but the poor who have God possess all things, though they should be bereft of all earthly goods.

7. "The children of this world," says Jesus Christ, "are wiser in their generation than the children of light." (Luke 16:8.) O how wise in earthly affairs are worldlings, who live in the midst of the darkness of the world! "Behold," says St. Augustine, "how much men suffer for things for which they entertain a vicious love." What fatigue do they endure for the acquisition of property, or of a situation of emolument! With what care do they endeavour to preserve their bodily health! They consult the best physician, and procure the best medicine. And Christians, who are the children of light, will take no pains, will suffer nothing, to secure the salvation of their souls! O God! at the light of the candle which lights them to death, at that hour, at that time, which is called the time of truth, worldlings shall see and confess their folly. Then each of them shall exclaim: O that I had led the life of a saint! At the hour of death, Philip the Second, King of Spain, called in his son, and having shown him his breast devoured with worms, said to him: Son, behold how we die; behold the end of all worldly greatness. He then ordered a wooden cross to be fastened to his neck; and, having made arrangements for his death, he turned again to his son, and said: My son, I wished you to be present at this scene, that you might understand how the world in the end treats even monarchs. He died saying: Oh, that I had been a lay brother in some religious order, and that I had not been a king! Such is the language at the hour of death, even of the princes of the earth, whom worldlings regard as the most fortunate of men. But these desires and sights of regret serve only to increase the anguish and remorse of the lovers of the world at the hour of death, when the scene is about to close.

8. And what is the present life but a scene, which soon passes away for ever? It may end when we least expect it. Cassimir, King of Poland, while he sat at table with his grandees, died in the act of raising a cup to take a draught; thus the scene ended for him. The Emperor Celsus was put to death in seven days after his election; and the scene closed for him. Ladislaus, King of Bohemia, in his eighteenth year, while he was preparing for the reception of his spouse, the daughter of the King of France, was suddenly seized with a violent pain, which took away his life. Couriers were instantly despatched to announce to her that the scene was over for Ladislaus, that she might return to France. "The world," says Cornelius a Lapide, in his comment upon this passage, "is like a stage. One generation passes away, and a new generation comes. The king does not take with him the purple. Tell me, O villa, O house, how many masters had you?" In every age the inhabitants of this earth are changed. Cities and kingdoms are filled with new people. The first generation passes to the other world, a second comes on, and this is followed by another. He who, in the scene of this world, has acted the part of a king is no longer a king. The master of such a villa or palace is no longer its master. Hence the Apostle gives us the following advice: "The time is short; it remaineth that . . . they that use this world be as if they used it not; for the fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Cor. 7:29, 30.) Since the time of our dwelling on this earth is short, and since all must end with our death, let us make use of this world to despise it, as if it did not exist for us; and let us labour to acquire the eternal treasures of Paradise, where, as the Gospel says, there are no moths to consume, nor thieves to steal them. "But lay up to yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither the rust nor the moth doth consume, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." (Matt. 6:20.) St. Teresa used to say: "We should not set value on what ends with life; the true life consists in living in such a manner as not to be afraid of death." Death shall have no terror for him who, during life, is detached from the vanities of this world, and is careful to provide himself only with goods which shall accompany him to eternity, and make him happy for ever.

Sermon XXXVI

SEVENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE EDUCATION OF CHILDREN

"A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can an evil tree bring forth good fruit."—MATT. 7:18.

THEN the gospel of this day tells us, that a good plant cannot produce bad fruit, and that a bad one cannot produce good fruit. Learn from this, brethren, that a good father brings up good children. But, if parents be wicked, how can the children be virtuous? Have you ever, says the Redeemer, in the same gospel, seen grapes gathered from thorns, or figs from thistles? "Do men gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles?" (v. 16.) And, in like manner, it is impossible, or rather very difficult, to find children virtuous, who are brought up by immoral parents. Fathers and mothers, be attentive to this sermon, which is of great importance to the eternal salvation of yourselves and of your children. Be attentive, young men and young women, who have not as yet chosen a state of life. If you wish to marry, learn this day the obligations which you can contract with regard to the education of your children; and learn also that, if you do not fulfil them, you shall bring yourselves and all your children to damnation. I shall divide this sermon into two points. In the first, I shall show how important it is to bring up children in habits of virtue; and in the second, I shall show with what care and diligence a parent ought to labour to bring them up well.

FIRST POINT. HOW VERY IMPORTANT IT IS TO BRING UP CHILDREN IN HABITS OF VIRTUE.

1. A father owes two obligations to his children; he is bound to provide for their corporal wants, and to educate them in habits of virtue. It is not necessary at present to say more on the first obligation, than that there are some fathers more cruel than the most ferocious of wild beasts; for these do not forget to nourish their offspring; but certain parents squander away in eating and drinking, and gaming, all their property, or all the fruits of their industry, and allow their children to die of hunger. But let us come to the education, which is the subject of my discourse.

2. It is certain that a child's future good or ill conduct depends on his being brought up well or ill. Nature itself teaches every parent to attend to the education of his offspring. He who has given them being ought to endeavour to make life useful to them. God gives children to parents, not that they may assist the family, but that they may be brought up in the fear of God, and be directed in the way of eternal salvation. "We have," says St. Chrysostom, "a great deposit in children; let us attend to them with great care." (Hom. ix., in 1 ad Tit.) Children have not been given to parents as a present, which they may dispose of as they please, but as a trust, for which, if lost through their negligence, they must render an account to God. The Scripture tells us, that when a father observes the divine law, both he and his children shall prosper. "That it may be well with thee and thy children after thee, when thou shalt do that which is pleasing in the sight of God." (Deut. 12:25.) The good or ill conduct of a parent may be known, by those who have not witnessed it, from the life which his children lead. "For by the fruit the tree is known." (Matt. 12:33.) "A father," says Ecclesiasticus, "who leaves a family, when he departs this life, is as if he had not died; because his sons remain, and exhibit his habits and character. His father is dead, and he is as if he were not dead; for he hath left one behind him that is like himself." (Eccl. 30:4.) When we find a son addicted to blasphemies, to obscenities, and to theft, we have reason to suspect that such too was the character of the father. "For a man is known by his children." (Eccl. 11:30.)

3. Hence Origen says, that on the day of judgment parents shall have to render an account for all the sins of their children. "Omnia quæcumque delinquerint filii, a parentibus requiruntur." (Orig., Lib. 2, in Job.) Hence, he who teaches his son to live well, shall die a happy and tranquil death. "He that teacheth his son . . . when he died he was not sorrowful, neither was he confounded." (Eccl. 30:3, 5.) And he shall save his soul by means of his children; that is, by the virtuous education which he has given them. "She shall be saved through child-bearing." (1 Tim. 2:15.) But, on the other hand, a very uneasy and unhappy death shall be the lot of those who have laboured only to increase the possessions, or to multiply the honours of their family; or who have sought only to lead a life of case and pleasure, but have not watched over the morals of their children. St. Paul says, that such parents are worse than infidels. "But if any man have not care of his own, and especially of those of his house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." (1 Tim. 5:8.) Were fathers or mothers to lead a life of piety and continual prayer, and to communicate every day, they should be damned if they neglected the care of their children. Would to God that certain parents paid as much attention to their children as they do to their horses! How careful are they to see that their horses are fed and well trained! And they take no pains to make their children attend at catechism, hear mass, or go to confession. "We take more care," says St. Chrysostom, "of our asses and horses, than of the children." (Hom. x., in Matt.)

4. If all fathers fulfilled their duty of watching over the education of their children, we should have but few crimes and few executions. By the bad education which parents give to their offspring, they cause their children, says St. Chrysostom, to rush into many grievous vices; and thus they deliver them up to the hands of the executioner. "Majoribus illos malis involvimus, et carnificum manibus damus." (Serm. xx., de divers.) Hence, in Lacedemon, a parent, as being the cause of all the irregularities of his children, was justly punished for their crimes with greater severity than the children themselves. Great indeed is the misfortune of the child that has vicious parents, who are incapable of bringing up their children in the fear of God, and who, when they see their children engaged in dangerous friendships and in quarrels, instead of correcting and chastising them, rather take compassion on them, and say: "What can be done? They are young; they must take their course." Oh! what wicked maxims! what a cruel education! Do you hope that when your children grow up they shall become saints? Listen to what Solomon says: "A young man, according to his way, even when he is old, he will not depart from it." (Prov. 22:6.) A young man who has contracted a habit of sin will not abandon it even in his old age. "His bones," says Job, "shall be filled with the vices of his youth, and they shall sleep with him in the dust." (Job 20:11.) When a young person has lived in evil habits, his bones shall be filled with the vices of his youth, so that he will carry them with him to death; and the impurities, blasphemies, and hatred to which he was accustomed in his youth, shall accompany him to the grave, and shall sleep with him after his bones shall be reduced to dust and ashes. It is very easy, when they are small, to train up children to habits of virtue; but, when they have come to manhood, it is equally difficult to correct them, if they have learned habits of vice. But, let us come to the second point—that is, to the means of bringing up children in the practice of virtue. I entreat you, fathers and mothers, to remember what I now say to you; for on it depends the eternal salvation of your own souls, and of the souls of your children.

SECOND POINT. ON THE CARE AND DILIGENCE WITH WHICH PARENTS OUGHT TO ENDEAVOUR TO BRING UP THEIR CHILDREN IN HABITS OF VIRTUE.

5. St. Paul teaches sufficiently, in a few words, in what the proper education of children consists. He says that it consists in discipline and correction.

"And you, fathers, provoke not your children to anger; but bring them up in the discipline and correction of the Lord." (Ephes. 6:4) Discipline, which is the same as the religious regulation of the morals of children, implies an obligation of educating them in habits of virtue by word and example. First, by words: a good father should often assemble his children, and instil into them the holy fear of God. It was in this manner that Tobias brought up his little son. The father taught him from his childhood to fear the Lord and to fly from sin. "And from his infancy he taught him to fear God and to abstain from sin." (Tob. 1:10.) The Wise Man says that a well educated son is the support and consolation of his father. "Instruct thy son, and he shall refresh thee, and shall give delight to thy soul." (Prov. 29:17.) But, as a well instructed son is the delight of his father's soul, so an ignorant child is a source of sorrow to a father's heart; for the ignorance of his obligations as a Christian is always accompanied with a bad life. Cantipratensis relates (lib. 1, cap. 20) that, in the year 1248, an ignorant priest was commanded, in a certain synod, to make a discourse. But while he was greatly agitated by the command, the devil appeared to him, and instructed him to say: "The rectors of infernal darkness salute the rectors of parishes, and thank them for their negligence in instructing the people; because from ignorance proceed the misconduct and the damnation of many." The same is true of negligent parents. In the first place, a parent ought to instruct his children in the truths of faith, and particularly in the four principal mysteries. First, that there is but one God, the Creator, and Lord of all things; secondly, that this God is a remunerator, who, in the next life, shall reward the good with the eternal glory of Paradise, and shall punish the wicked with the everlasting torments of hell; thirdly, the mystery of the holy Trinity—that is, that in God there are Three Persons, who are only one God, because they have but one essence; fourthly, the mystery of the incarnation of the Divine Word—the Son of God, and true God, who became man in the womb of Mary, and suffered and died for our salvation. Should a father or a mother say: I myself do not know these mysteries, can such an excuse be admitted?—that is, can one sin excuse another? If you are ignorant of these mysteries you are obliged to learn them, and afterwards teach them to your children. At least, send your children to the catechism. Oh! what a misery to see so many fathers and mothers who are unable to instruct their children in the most necessary truths of faith, and who, instead of sending their sons and daughters to the Christian doctrine on festivals, employ them in messages, or other occupations of little moment; and when grown up they know not what is meant by mortal sin, by hell, or eternity. They do not even know the Creed, the Pater Noster, or the Hail Mary, which every Christian is bound to learn under pain of mortal sin.

6. Religious parents not only instruct their children in these things, which are the most important, but they also teach them the acts which ought to be made every morning after rising. They teach them, first, to thank God for having preserved their life during the night; secondly, to offer to God all the good actions which they will perform, and all the pains which they shall suffer during the day; thirdly, to implore of Jesus Christ and most holy Mary to preserve them from all sin during the day. They teach them to make every evening an examen of conscience and an act of contrition. They also teach them to make every day the acts of Faith, Hope, and Charity, to recite the Rosary, and to visit the blessed Sacrament. Some good fathers of families are careful to get a book of meditations read, and to have mental prayer in common for half an hour every day. This is what the Holy Ghost exhorts you to practise. "Hast thou children? Instruct them and bow down their neck from their childhood." (Eccl. 7:25.) Endeavour to train them from their infancy to these religious habits, and when they grow up they shall persevere in them. Accustom them also to go to confession and communion every week. Be careful to make them go to confession when they arrive at the age of seven, and to communion at the age of ten. This is the advice of St. Charles Borromeo. As soon as they attain the use of reason make them receive the sacrament of confirmation.

7. It is also very useful to infuse good maxims into the infant minds of children. Oh! what ruin is brought upon his children by the father who teaches them worldly maxims! "You must," some people say to their children, "seek the esteem and applause of the world. God is merciful; he takes compassion on certain sins." Miserable the young man who sins in obedience to such maxims. Good parents teach very different maxims to their children. Queen Blanche, the mother of St. Louis, King of France, used to say to him: "My son, I would rather see you dead in my arms than in the state of sin." Oh! brethren, let it be your practice also to infuse into your children certain maxims of salvation, such as, "What will it profit us to gain the whole world, if we lose our own souls? Every thing on this earth has an end; but eternity never ends. Let all be lost, provided God is not lost." One of these maxims well impressed on the mind of a young person will preserve him always in the grace of God.

8. But parents are obliged to instruct their children in the practice of virtue, not only by words, but still more by example. If you give your children bad example, how can you expect that they will lead a good life? When a dissolute young man is corrected for a fault, he answers: Why do you censure me, when my father does worse. "The children will complain of an ungodly father, because for his sake they are in reproach." (Eccl. 41:10.) How is it possible for a son to be moral and religious, when he has had the example of a father who was accustomed to utter blasphemies and obscenities; who spent the entire day in the tavern, in gaming and drunkenness; who was in the habit of frequenting houses of bad fame, and of defrauding his neighbour? Do you expect that your son will go frequently to confession, when you yourself approach the tribunal of penance scarcely once a year? Children are like apes; they do what they see their parents do. It is related in the fables, that a crab-fish one day rebuked its young for walking crookedly. They replied: Father, let us see you walk. The father walked before them more crookedly than they did. This is what happens to the parent who gives bad example. Hence, he has not even courage to correct his children for the sins which he himself commits.

9. But though he should correct them by words, of what use is his correction when he sets them a bad example by his acts? It has been said in the council of Bishops, that "men believe the eyes rather than the ears." And St. Ambrose says: "The eyes convince me of what they see more quickly than the ear can insinuate what is past." (Serm. xxiii, de S. S.) According to St. Thomas, scandalous parents compel, in a certain manner, their children to lead a bad life. "Eos ad peccatum, quantum in eis fuit obligaverunt" (in Ps. 16.). They are not, says St. Bernard, fathers, but murderers; they kill, not the bodies, but the souls of their children. "Non parentes, sed peremptores." It is useless for them to say: "My children have been born with bad dispositions." This is not true; for, as Seneca says, "you err, if you think that vices are born with us; they have been engrafted." (Ep. xciv.) Vices are not born with your children, but have been communicated to them by the bad example of the parents. If you had given good example to your sons, they should not be so vicious as they are. O brethren, frequent the sacraments, assist at sermons, recite the Rosary every day, abstain from all obscene language, from detraction, and from quarrels; and you shall see that your sons will go often to confession, will assist at sermons, will say the Rosary, will speak modestly, and will fly from detraction and disputes. It is particularly necessary to train up children to virtue in their infancy: "Bow down their neck from their childhood;" for when they have grown up and contracted bad habits, it will be very difficult for you to produce, by words, any amendment in their lives.

10. To bring up children in the discipline of the Lord, it is also necessary to take away from them the occasion of doing evil. Hence a father must, in the first place, forbid his children to go out at night, or to go to a house in which their virtue might be exposed to danger, or to keep bad company. "Cast out," said Sarah to Abraham, "this bondwoman and her son." (Gen. 21:10.) She wished to have Ishmael, the son of Agar the bondwoman, banished from her house, that her son Isaac might not learn his vicious habits. Bad companions are the ruin of young persons. A father should not only remove the evil which he witnesses, but he is also bound to inquire after the conduct of his children, and to seek information from domestics and from externs regarding the places which his sons frequent when they leave home, regarding their occupations and companions. Secondly, he should take from them every musical instrument which is to them an occasion of going out at night, and all forbidden weapons which may lead them into quarrels or disputes. Thirdly, he should dismiss all immoral servants; and, if his sons be grown up, he should not keep in his house any young female servant. Some parents pay little attention to this; and when the evil happens they complain of their children, as if they expected that tow thrown into the fire should not burn. Fourthly, a father ought to forbid his children ever to bring into his house stolen goods—such as fowl, fruit, and the like. When Tobias heard the bleating of a goat in his house, he said: "Take heed, lest perhaps it be stolen; restore ye it to its owners." (Tob. 2:21.) How often does it happen that, when a child steals something, the mother says to him: "Bring it to me, my son." Parents should prohibit to their children all games which bring destruction on their families and on their own souls, and also masks, scandalous comedies, and certain dangerous conversations and parties of pleasure. Fifthly, a father should remove from his house romances, which pervert young persons, and all bad books which contain pernicious maxims, tales of obscenity, or of profane love. Sixthly, he ought not to allow his children to sleep in his own bed, nor the males and females to sleep together. Seventhly, he should not permit his daughters to be alone with men, whether young or old. But some will say: "Such a man teaches my daughters to read and write, etc.; he is a saint." The saints are in heaven; but the saints that are on earth are flesh, and by proximate occasions they may become devils. Eighthly, if he has daughters, he should not permit young men to frequent his house. To get their daughters married, some mothers invite young men to their houses. They are anxious to see their daughters married; but they do not care to see them in sin. These are the mothers who, as David says, immolate their daughters to the devil. "They sacrifice their sons and their daughters to devils." (Ps. 105:37.) And to excuse themselves they will say: "Father, there is no harm in what I do." There is no harm! Oh! how many mothers shall we see condemned on the day of judgment on account of their daughters! The conduct of such mothers is at least a subject of conversation among their neighbours and equals; and, for all, the parents must render an account to God. O fathers and mothers! confess all the sins you have committed in this respect, before the day on which you shall be judged arrives.

11. Another obligation of parents is, to correct the faults of the family. "Bring them up in the discipline and correction of the Lord." There are fathers and mothers who witness faults in the family, and remain silent. A certain mother was in the habit of acting in this manner. Her husband one day took a stick and began to beat her severely. She cried out, and said: "I am doing nothing. Why do you beat me?" "I beat you," replied the husband, "because you see, and do not correct, the faults of the children—because you do nothing." Through fear of displeasing their children some fathers neglect to correct them; but, if you saw your son falling into a pool of water, and in danger of being drowned, would it not be savage cruelty not to catch him by the hair and save his life? "He that spareth the rod hateth his son." (Prov. 13:24.) If you love your sons correct them, and, while they are growing up chastise them, even with the rod, as often as it may be necessary. I say, "with the rod," but not with the stick; for you must correct them like a father, and not like a galley sergeant. You must be careful not to beat them when you are in a passion; for, you shall then be in danger of beating them with too much severity, and the correction will be without fruit; for they then believe that the chastisement is the effect of anger, and not of a desire on your part to see them amend their lives. I have also said that you should correct them "while they are growing up;" for, when they arrive at manhood, your correction will be of little use. You must then abstain from correcting them with the hand; otherwise, they shall become more perverse, and shall lose their respect for you. But of what use is it to correct children by so many injurious words and by so many imprecations? Deprive them of some part of their meals, of certain articles of dress, or shut them up in a room. But I have said enough. Dearly beloved brethren, draw from the discourse which you have heard the conclusion, that he who has brought up his children badly shall be severely punished; and that he who has trained them to habits of virtue shall receive a great reward.

Sermon XXXVII

EIGHTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE PARTICULAR JUDGMENT

"Give an account of thy stewardship."—LUKE 16:2.

BELOVED Christians, of all the goods of nature, of fortune, and of grace, which we have received from God, we are not the masters, neither can we dispose of them as we please; we are but the administrators of them; and therefore we should employ them according to the will of God, who is our Lord. Hence, at the hour of death, we must render a strict account of them to Jesus Christ, our Judge. "For we must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the proper things of the body as he hath done, whether it be good or evil." (2 Cor. 5:10.) This is the precise meaning of that "give an account of thy stewardship," in the gospel of this day. "You are not," says St. Bonaventure, in his comment on these words, "a master, but a steward over the things committed to you; and therefore you are to render an account of them." I will place before your eyes to-day the rigour of this judgment, which shall be passed on each of us on the last day of our life. Let us consider the terror of the soul, first, when we shall be presented to the Judge; secondly, when she shall be examined; and thirdly, when she shall be condemned.

FIRST POINT. TERROR OF THE SOUL WHEN SHE SHALL BE PRESENTED TO THE JUDGE.

1. "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment." (Heb. 9:27.) It is of faith that we shall die, and that after death a judgment shall be passed on all the actions of our life. Now, what shall be the terror of each of us when we shall be at the point of death, and shall have before our eyes the judgment which must take place the very moment the soul departs from the body? Then shall be decided our doom to eternal life, or to eternal death. At the time of the passage of their souls from this life to eternity, the sight of their past sins, the rigour of God's judgment, and the uncertainty of their eternal salvation, have made the saints tremble. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzia trembled in her sickness, through the fear of judgment; and to her confessor, when he endeavoured to give her courage, she said: "Ah! father, it is a terrible thing to appear before Christ in judgment." After spending so many years in penance in the desert, St. Agatho trembled at the hour of death, and said: "What shall become of me when I shall be judged?" The venerable Father Louis da Ponte was seized with such a fit of trembling at the thought of the account which he should render to God, that he shook the room in which he lay. The thought of judgment inspired the venerable Juvenal Ancina, Priest of the Oratory, and afterwards Bishop of Saluzzo, with the determination to leave the world. Hearing the Dies Iræ sung, and considering the terror of the soul when presented before Jesus Christ, the Judge, he took, and afterwards executed, the resolution of giving himself entirely to God.

2. It is the common opinion of theologians, that at the very moment and in the very place in which the soul departs from the body, the divine tribunal is erected, the accusation is read, and the sentence is passed by Jesus Christ, the Judge. At this terrible tribunal each of us shall be presented to give an account of all our thoughts, of all our words, and of all our actions. "For we must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he hath done, whether it be good or evil." (2 Cor. 5:10.) When presented before an earthly judge criminals have been seen to fall into a cold sweat through fear. It is related of Piso, that so great and insufferable was the confusion which he felt at the thought of appearing as a criminal before the senate that he killed himself. How great is the pain of a vassal, or of a son, in appearing before an angry prince or an enraged father, to account for some crime which he has committed! Oh! how much greater shall be the pain and confusion of the soul in standing before Jesus Christ enraged against her for having despised him during her life! Speaking of judgment, St. Luke says: "Then you shall see the Son of Man." (Luke 21:27.) They shall see Jesus Christ as man, with the same wounds with which he ascended into heaven. "Great joy of the beholders!" says Robert the Abbot, "a great terror of those who are in expectation!" These wounds shall console the just, and shall terrify the wicked. In them sinners shall see the Redeemer's love for themselves, and their ingratitude to him.

3. "Who," says the Prophet Nahum, "can stand before the face of his indignation?" (1:6.) How great, then, shall be the terror of a soul that finds herself in sin before this Judge, the first time she shall see him, and see him full of wrath! St. Basil says that she shall be tortured more by her shame and confusion than by the very fire of hell. "Horridior quam ignis, erit pudor." Philip the Second rebuked one of his domestics for having told him a lie. "Is it thus." said the king to him, "you deceive me?" The domestic, after having returned home, died of grief. The Scripture tells us, that when Joseph reproved his brethren, saying: "I am Joseph, whom you sold," they were unable to answer through fear, and remained silent. "His brethren could not answer him, being struck with exceeding great fear." (Gen. 45:3.) Now what answer shall sinners make to Jesus Christ when he shall say to them: I am your Redeemer and your Judge, whom you have so much despised. Where shall the miserable beings fly, says St. Augustine, when they shall see an angry Judge above, hell open below, on one side their own sins accusing them, and on the other the devils dragging them to punishment, and their conscience burning them within? "Above shall be an enraged Judge—below, a horrid chaos—on the right, sins accusing him—on the left, demons dragging him to punishment—within, a burning conscience! Whither shall a sinner, beset in this manner, fly?" Perhaps he will cry for mercy? But how, asks Eusebius Emissenus, can he dare to implore mercy, when he must first render an account of his contempt for the mercy which Jesus Christ has shown to him? "With what face will you, who are to be first judged for contempt of mercy, ask for mercy?" But let us come to the rendering of the accounts.

SECOND POINT. TERROR OF THE SOUL WHEN SHE SHALL BE EXAMINED.

4. As soon as the soul shall be presented before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, he will say to her: "Give an account of thy stewardship:" render instantly an account of thy entire life. The Apostle tells us, that to be worthy of eternal glory our lives must be found conformable to the life of Jesus Christ. "For whom he foreknew, he also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of his son; . . . them he also glorified." (Rom. 8:29, 30.) Hence St. Peter has said, that in the judgment of Jesus Christ, the just man who has observed the divine law, has pardoned enemies, has respected the saints, has practised chastity, meekness, and other virtues, shall scarcely be saved. "The just man shall scarcely be saved." The Apostle adds: "Where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" (1 Pet. 4:18.) What shall become of the vindictive and the unchaste, of blasphemers and slanderers? What shall become of those whose entire life is opposed to the life of Jesus Christ?

5. In the first place, the Judge shall demand of sinners an account of all the blessings and graces which he bestowed on them in order to bring them to salvation, and which they have rendered fruitless. He will demand and account of the years granted to them that they might serve God, and which they have spent in offending him. "He hath called against me the time." (Lam. 1:15.) He will then demand an account of their sins. Sinners commit sins, and afterwards forget them; but Jesus Christ does not forget them: he keeps, as Job says, all our iniquities numbered, as it were in a bag. "Thou hast sealed up my iniquities, as it were in a bag." (Job 14:17.) And he tells us that, on the day of accounts, he will take a lamp to scrutinize all the actions of our life. "And it shall come to pass at that time, that I will search Jerusalem with lamps." (Soph. 1:12.) The lamp, says Mendoza on this passage, penetrates all the corners of the house—that is, God will discover all the defects of our conscience, great and small. According to St. Anselm, an account shall be demanded of every glance of the eyes. "Exigitur usque ad ictum oculi." And, according to St. Matthew, of every idle word. "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall render an account for it on the day of judgment." (Matt. 12:36.)

6. The Prophet Malachy says, that as gold is refined by taking away the dross, so on the day of judgment all our actions shall be examined, and every defect which may be discovered shall be punished. "He shall purify the sons of Levi, and shall refine them as gold." (Mal. 3:3.) Even our justices—that is, our good works, confessions, communions, and prayers—shall be examined. "When I shall take a time, I will judge justices." (Ps. 74:3.) But if every glance, every idle word, and even good works, shall be judged, with what rigour shall immodest expressions, blasphemies, grievous detractions, thefts, and sacrileges be judged? Alas! on that day every soul shall, as St. Jerome says, see, to her own confusion, all the evils which she has done. "Videbit unusquisque quod fecit."

7. "Weight and balance are judgments of the Lord." (Prov. 16:11.) In the balance of the Lord a holy life and good works make the sca le descend; but nobility, wealth, and science have no weight. Hence, if found innocent, the peasant, the poor, and the ignorant shall be rewarded. But the man of rank, of wealth, or of learning, if found guilty, shall be condemned. "Thou art weighed in the balance," said Daniel to Belthassar, "and art found wanting." (Dan. 5:27.) "Neither his gold nor his wealth," says Father Alvares, "but the king alone was weighed."

8. At the divine tribunal the poor sinner shall see himself accused by the devil, who, according to St. Augustine, "will recite the words of our profession, and will charge us before our face with all that we have done, will state the day and hour in which we sinned." (Con. Jud., tom. 6.) "He will recite the words of our profession"—that is, he will enumerate the promises which, we have made to God, and which we afterwards violated. "He will charge us before our face;" he will upbraid us with all our wicked deeds, pointing to the day and hour in which they were committed. And he will, as the same saint says, conclude his accusation by saying: "I have suffered neither stripes nor scourges for this man." Lord, I have suffered nothing for this ungrateful sinner, and to make himself my slave he has turned his back on thee who has endured so much for his salvation. He, therefore, justly belongs to me. Even his angel-guardian will, according to Origen, come forward to accuse him, and will say: "I have laboured so many years for his salvation; but he has despised all my admonitions." "Unusquisque angelorum perhibet testimonium, quot annis circa eum laboraverit, sed ille monita sprevit." (Hom. lxvi.) Thus, even friends shall treat with contempt the guilty soul. "All her friends have despised her." (Lamen. 1:2.) Her very sins shall, says St. Bernard, accuse her. "And they shall say: You have made us; we are your work; we shall not desert you." (Lib. Medit, cap. ii.) We are your offspring; we shall not leave you: we shall be your companions in hell for all eternity.

9. Let us now examine the excuses which the sinner will be able to advance. He will say, that the evil inclinations of nature had drawn him into sin. But he shall be told that, if concupiscence impelled him to sins, it did not oblige him to commit them; and that, if he had recourse to God, he should have received from him grace to resist every temptation. For this purpose Jesus Christ has left us the sacraments: but when we do not make use of them, we can complain only of ourselves. "But," says the Redeemer, "now they have no excuse for their sin." (John 15:22.) To excuse himself, the sinner shall also say that the devil tempted him to sin. But, as St. Augustine says, "The enemy is bound like a dog in chains, and can bite only him who has united himself to him with a deadly security." The devil can bark, but cannot bite unless you adhere and listen to him. Hence the saint adds: "See how foolish, is the man whom a dog, loaded with, chains, bites." Perhaps he will advance his bad habits as an excuse; but this shall not stand; for the same St. Augustine says, that though it is difficult to resist the force of an evil habit, "if any one does not desert himself, he will conquer it with the divine assistance." If a man does not abandon himself to sin, and invokes God's aid, he will overcome evil habits. The Apostle tells us, that the Lord does not permit us to be tempted above our strength. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able." (1 Cor. 10:13.)

10. "For what shall I do," said Job, "when God shall rise to judge me? and when he shall examine, what shall I answer him?" (Job 31:14.) What answer shall the sinner give to Jesus Christ? How can he, who sees himself so clearly convicted, give an answer? He shall be covered with confusion, and shall remain silent, like the man found without the nuptial garment. "But he was silent." (Matt. 22:12.) His very sins shall shut the sinner's mouth. "And all iniquity shall stop her mouth." (Ps. 106:42.) There, says St. Thomas of Villanova, there shall be no intercessor to whom the sinner can have recourse. "There, there is no opportunity of sinning; there, no intercessor, no friend, no father shall assist." Who shall then save you? Is it God? But how, asks St. Basil, can you expect salvation from him whom you have despised? "Who shall deliver you? Is it God, whom you have insulted?" (S. Bas., Or. 4, de Fen.) Alas! the guilty soul that leaves this world in sin, is condemned by herself before the Judge pronounces sentence. Let us come to the sentence of the Judge.

THIRD POINT. TERROR OF THE SOUL WHEN SHE SHALL BE CONDEMNED.

11. How great shall be the joy of a soul when, at death, she hears from Jesus Christ these sweet words: "Well done, good and faithful servant; because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matt. 25:21.) Equally great shall be the anguish and despair of a guilty soul, that shall see herself driven away by the Judge with the following words: "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire" (verse 41). Oh! what a terrible thunderclap shall that sentence be to her! "Oh! how frightfully," says the Carthusian, "shall that thunder resound!" Eusebius writes, that the terror of sinners at hearing their condemnation shall be so great that, if they could, they would die again. "The wicked shall be seized with such terror at the sight of the Judge pronouncing sentence that, if they were not immortal, they should die a second time." But, brethren, let us, before the termination of this sermon, make some reflections which will be profitable to us. St. Thomas of Villanova says, that some listen to discourses on the judgment and condemnation of the wicked with as little concern as if they they themselves were secure against these things, or as if the day of judgment were never to arive for them. "Heu quam securi hæc dicimus et audimus, quasi nos non tangeret hæc sententia, aut quasi dies hæc nunquam esset venturus!" (Conc. i., de Jud.) The saint then asks: Is it not great folly to entertain security in so perilous an affair? "Quæ est ista stulta securitas in discrimine tanto?" There are some, says St. Augustine, who, though they live in sin, cannot imagine that God will send them to hell. "Will God," they say, "really condemn us?" Brethren, adds the saint, do not speak thus. So, many of the damned did not believe that they should be sent to hell; but the end came, and, according to the threat of Ezechiel, they have been cast into that place of darkness. "The end is come, the end is come . . . and I will send my wrath upon thee, and I will judge thee." (Ezec. 7:2, 3.) Sinners, perhaps vengeance is at hand for you, and still you laugh and sleep in sin. Who will not tremble at the words of the Baptist: "For now the axe is laid to the root of the trees. Every tree, therefore, that doth not yield good fruit shall be cut down and cast into the fire." (Matt. 3:10.) He says, that every tree that does not bring forth good fruit shall be cut down and cast into the fire; and he promises that, with regard to the trees, which represent sinners, the axe is already laid to the roots—that is, chastisement is at hand. Dearly beloved brethren, let us follow the counsel of the Holy Ghost—"Before judgment, prepare thee justice." (Eccl. 18:19.) Let us adjust our accounts before the day of accounts. Let us seek God, now that we can find him; for the time shall come when we will wish, but shall not be able to find him. "You shall seek me, and shall not find me." (John 7:36.) "Before judgment," says St. Augustine, "the Judge can be appeased, but not in judgment." By a change of life we can now appease the anger of Jesus Christ, and recover his grace; but when he shall judge, and find us in sin, he must execute justice, and we shall be lost.

Sermon XXXVIII

NINTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE DEATH OF THE SINNER

"Thy enemies shall cast a trench about thee."—LUKE 19:43.

SEEING from a distance the city of Jerusalem, in which the Jews were soon to put him to death, Jesus Christ wept over it. "Videns civitatem flevit super illam." Our merciful Redeemer wept at the consideration of the chastisement which was soon to be inflicted on the city, and which he foretold to her inhabitants. "Thy enemies shall cast a trench about thee." Unhappy city! thou shalt one day see thyself encompassed by enemies, who shall beat thee flat to the ground, and thy children in thee, and shall not leave in thee a stone upon a stone. Most beloved brethren, this unhappy city is a figure of the soul of a sinner, who, at the hour of death, shall find himself surrounded by his enemies—first, by remorse of conscience; secondly, by the assaults of the devils; and thirdly, by the fears of eternal death.

FIRST POINT. THE SINNER AT DEATH SHALL BE TORTURED BY REMORSES OF CONSCIENCE.

1. "Their soul shall die in a storm." (Job 36:14.) The unhappy sinners who remain in sin die in a tempest, with which God has beforehand threatened them. "A tempest shall break out and come upon the head of the wicked." (Jer. 23:19.) At the commencement of his illness the sinner is not troubled by remorse or fear; because his relatives, friends, physicians, and all tell him that his sickness is not dangerous; thus he is deceived and hopes to recover. But when his illness increases, and malignant symptoms, the harbingers of approaching death, begin to appear, then the storm with which the Lord has threatened the wicked shall commence. "When sudden calamity shall fall on you, and destruction as a tempest shall be at hand." (Prov. 1:27.) This tempest shall be formed as well by the pains of sickness as by the fear of being obliged to depart from this earth, and to leave all things; but still more by the remorses of conscience, which shall place before his eyes all the irregularities of his past life. "They shall come with fear at the thought of their sins, and their iniquities shall stand against them to convict them." (Wis. 4:20.) Then shall his sins rush upon his mind, and fill him with terror. His iniquities shall stand against him to convict him, and, without the aid of other testimony, shall assail him, and prove that he deserves hell.

2. The dying sinner will confess his sins; but, according to St. Augustine, "The repentance which is sought from a sick man is infirm." (Serm. xxxvii., de Temp.) And St. Jerome says, that of a hundred thousand sinners who continue till death in the state of sin, scarcely one shall be saved. "Vix de centum milibus, quorum mala vita fuit, meretur in morte a Deo indulgentiam, unus." (Epis. de Moil. Eus.) St. Vincent Ferrer writes, that it is a greater miracle to save such sinners, than to raise the dead to life. "Majus miraculum est, quod male viventes faciant bonum finem, quam suscitare mortuos." (Serm. i., de Nativ. Virgin.) They shall feel convinced of the evil they have done; they will wish, but shall not be able, to detest it. Antiochus understood the malice of his sins when he said: "Now I remember the evils that I have done in Jerusalem." (1 Mach. 6:12.) He remembered his sins, but did not detest them. He died in despair and oppressed with great sadness, saying: "Behold, I perish with great grief in a strange land" (v. 13). According to St. Fulgentius, the same happened to Saul at the hour of death: he remembered his sins; he dreaded the punishment which they deserved; but he did not detest them. "Non odit quid fecerat, sed timuit quod nolebat."

3. Oh! how difficult is it for a sinner, who has slept many years in sin, to repent sincerely at the hour of death, when his mind is darkened, and his heart hardened! "His heart shall be as hard as a stone, and as firm as a smith's anvil." (Job 41:15.) During life, instead of yielding to the graces and calls of God, he became more obdurate, as the anvil is hardened by repeated strokes of the hammer. "A hard heart shall fare evil at the last." (Eccl. 3:27.) By loving sin till death, he has loved the danger of his damnation, and therefore God will justly permit him to perish in the danger in which he wished to live till death.

4. St. Augustine says, that he who is abandoned by sin before he abandons it, will scarcely detest it as he ought at the hour of death; for he will then detest it, not through a hatred of sin, but through necessity. "Qui prius a peccato relinquitur, quam ipse relinquat, non libere, sed quasi ex necessitate condemnat." But how shall he be able to hate from his heart the sins which he has loved till death? He must love the enemy whom till then he has hated, and he must hate the person whom he has till that moment loved. Oh! what mountains must he pass! He shall probably meet with a fate similar to that of a certain person, who kept in confinement a great number of wild beasts in order to let them loose on the enemies who might assail him. But the wild beasts, as soon as he unchained them, instead of attacking his enemies, devoured himself. When the sinner will wish to drive away his iniquities, they shall cause his destruction, either by complacency in objects till then loved, or by despair of pardon at the sight of their numbers and enormity. "Evils shall catch the unjust man unto destruction." (Ps. 139:12.) St. Bernard says, that at death the sinner shall see himself chained and bound by his sins. "We are your works; we will not desert you." We will not leave you; we will accompany you to judgment, and will be your companions for all eternity in hell.

SECOND POINT. THE DYING SINNER SHALL BE TORTURED BY THE ASSAULTS OF THE DEVILS.

5. "The devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time." (Apoc. 12:12.) At death the devil exerts all his powers to secure the soul that is about to leave this world; for he knows, from the symptoms of the disease, that he has but little time to gain her for eternity. The Council of Trent teaches that Jesus Christ has left us the sacrament of Extreme Unction as a most powerful defence against the temptations of the devil at the hour of death. "Extremæ Unctionis sacramento finem vitæ tanquam firmissimo quodam præsidio munivit." And the holy council adds, that there is no time in which the enemy combats against us with so much violence in order to effect our damnation, and to make us despair of the divine mercy, as at the end of life. "Nullum tempus est, quo vehementius ille omnes suæ versutiæ nervos intendat at perendos, nos penitus, et a fiducia, etiam, si possit, divinæ misericordiæ deturbandos, quam cum impendere nobis exitum vitæ perspicet." (Sess. 14, cap. ix. Doctr. de Sacr. Extr. Unct.)

6. Oh! how terrible are the assaults and snares of the devil against the souls of dying persons, even though they have led a holy life! After his recovery from a most severe illness, the holy king Eleazar said, that the temptations by which the devil assails men at death, can be conceived only by him who has felt them. We read in the life of St. Andrew Avellino, that in his agony he had so fierce a combat with hell, that all the religious present were seized with trembling. They perceived that, in consequence of the agitation, his face swelled, and became black, all his members trembled, and a flood of tears gushed from his eyes. All began to weep through compassion, and were filled with terror at the sight of a saint dying in such a manner. But they were afterwards consoled, when they saw that as soon as an image of most holy Mary was held before him, he became perfectly calm, and breathed forth his blessed soul with great joy.

7. Now, if this happens to the saints, what shall become of poor sinners, who have lived in sin till death? At that awful moment the devil does not come alone to tempt them in a thousand ways, in order to bring them to eternal perdition, but he calls companions to his assistance. "Their house shall be filled with serpents." (Isa. 13:21.) When a Christian is about to leave this world, his house is filled with devils, who unite together in order to effect his ruin. "All her persecutors have taken her in the midst of straits." (Lamen. 1:3.) All his enemies will encompass him in the straits of death. One shall say: Be not afraid; you shall not die of this sickness! Another will say: You have been for so many years deaf to the calls of God, and can you now expect that he will save you? Another will ask: How can you repair the frauds of your past life, and the injuries you have done to your neighbour in his property and character? Another shall ask: What hope can there be for you? Do you not see that all your confessions have been null—that they have been made without true sorrow, and without a firm, purpose of amendment? How can you repair them with this heart, which you feel so hard? Do you not see that you are lost? And in the midst of these straits and attacks of despair, the dying sinner, full of agitation and confusion, must pass into eternity. "The people shall be troubled—and they shall pass." (Job 34:20.)

THIRD POINT. THE DYING SINNER SHALL BE TORTURED BY THE FEARS OF ETERNAL DEATH.

8. Miserable the sick man who takes to his bed in the state of mortal sin! He that lives in sin till death shall die in sin. "You shall die in your sin." (John 8:21.) It is true that, in whatsoever hour the sinner is converted, God promises to pardon him; but to no sinner has God promised the grace of conversion at the hour of death. "Seek the Lord while he may be found." (Isa. 55:6.) Then, there is for some sinners a time when they shall seek God and shall not find him. "You shall seek me, and shall not find me." (John 7:34.) The unhappy beings will go to confession at the hour of death; they will promise and weep, and ask mercy of God, but without knowing what they do. A man who sees himself under the feet of a foe pointing a dagger to his throat, will shed tears, ask pardon, and promise to serve his enemy as a slave during the remainder of his life. But, will the enemy believe him? No; he will feel convinced that his words are not sincere—that his object is to escape from his hands, and that, should he be pardoned, he will become more hostile than ever. In like manner, how can God pardon the dying sinner, when he sees that all his acts of sorrow, and all his promises, proceed not from the heart, but from a dread of death and of approaching damnation.

9. In the recommendation of the departing soul, the assisting priest prays to the Lord, saying: "Recognize, O Lord, thy creature." But God answers: I know that he is my creature; but, instead of regarding me as his Creator, he has treated me as an enemy. The priest continues his prayer, and says: "Remember not his past iniquities." I would, replies the Lord, pardon all the past sins of his youth; but he has continued to despise me till this moment—the very hour of his death. "They have turned their back upon me, and not their face: and, in the time of affliction, they will say: Arise, and deliver us. Where are the gods which thou hast made thee? let them rise and deliver thee." (Jer. 2:27, 28.) You, says the Lord, have turned your back upon me till death; and do you now want me to deliver you from vengeance? Invoke your own gods—the creatures, the riches, the friends you loved more than you loved me. Call them now to come to your assistance, and to save you from hell, which is open to receive you. It now justly belongs to me to take vengeance on the insults you have offered me. You have despised my threats against obstinate sinners, and have paid no regard to them. "Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time, that their foot may slide." (Deut. 32:35.) The time of my vengeance is now arrived; it is but just to execute it. This is precisely what happened to a certain person in Madrid, who led a wicked life, but, at the sight of the unhappy death of a companion, went to confession, and resolved to enter a strict religious order. But, in consequence of having neglected to put his resolution into immediate execution, he relapsed into his former irregularities. Being reduced to great want, he wandered about the world, and fell sick at Lima. From the hospital in which he took refuge he sent for a confessor, and promised again to change his life, and to enter religion. But, having recovered from his illness, he returned to his wickedness; and, behold! the vengeance of God fell upon him. One day, his confessor, who was a missionary, in passing over a mountain, heard a noise, which appeared to be the howling of a wild beast. He drew near the place from which the noise proceeded, and saw a dying man, half rotten, and howling through despair. He addressed to him some words of consolation. The sick man, opening his eyes, recognized the missionary, and said: Have you, too, come to be a witness of the justice of God? I am the man who made my confession in the hospital of Lima. I then promised to change my life, but have not done so; and now I die in despair. And thus the miserable man, amid these acts of despair, breathed forth his unhappy soul. These facts are related by Father Charles Bovio (part iii., example 9).

10. Let us conclude the discourse. Tell me, brethren, were a person in sin seized with apoplexy, and instantly deprived of his senses, what sentiments of pity would you feel at seeing him die in this state; without the sacraments, and without signs of repentance! Is not he a fool, who, when he has time to be reconciled with God, continues in sin, or returns to his sins, and thus exposes himself to the danger of dying suddenly, and of dying in sin? "At what hour you think not," says Jesus Christ, "the Son of Man will come." (Luke 13:40.) An unprovided death, which has happened to so many, may also happen to each of us. And it is necessary to understand, that all who lead a bad life, meet with an unprovided death, though their last illness may allow them some time to prepare for eternity; for the days of that mortal illness are days of darkness—days of confusion, in which it is difficult, and even morally impossible, to adjust a conscience burdened with many sins. Tell me, brethren, if you were now at the point of death, given over by physicians, and in the last agony, how ardently would you desire another month, or another week, to settle the accounts you must render to God! And God gives you this time. He calls you, and warns you of the danger of damnation to which you are exposed. Give yourself, then, instantly to God. What do you wait for? Will you wait till he sends you to hell? "Walk whilst you have light." (John 12:35.) Avail yourselves of this time and this light, which God gives you at this moment, and now, while it is in your power, repent of all your past sins; for, a time shall come when you will be no longer able to avert the punishment which they deserve.

[I entreat my reader to read Sermon xliv., or the Sermon for the Fifteenth Sunday after Pentecost, on the practical death, or that which practically happens at the death of men of the world. I know by experience that though it does not contain Latin texts, whenever I preached that sermon, it produced a great impression, and left the audience full of terror. A greater impression is made by practical than by speculative truths.]

Sermon XXXIX

TENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE EFFICACY AND NECESSITY OF PRAYER

"O God, be merciful to me a sinner."—LUKE 18:13.

IN this day's gospel we read, that two men, one a Pharisee and the other a Publican, went to the temple. Instead of bowing down to beg of God to assist him by his graces, the Pharisee said: I thank thee, O Lord, that I am not as the rest of men, who are sinners. "Deus gratias ago tibi, quia non sum sicut cæteri homines." But the Publican, filled with sentiments of humility, cried out: "O God, be merciful to me, a sinner." St. Luke tells us, that this Publican returned to his house justified; and that the Pharisee went home as guilty and as proud as when he entered the temple. From this, most beloved brethren, you may infer how pleasing to God, and how necessary for us, are our humble petitions to obtain from the Lord all the graces which are indispensable for salvation. In this sermon I will show, in the first point, the efficacy of prayer: and in the second, the necessity of prayer.

FIRST POINT. ON THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

1. To understand the efficacy and value of our prayers, we need only consider the great promises which God has made to every one who prays. "Call upon me, and I will deliver thee." (Ps. 49:15.) Call upon me, and I will save you from every danger. "He shall cry to me, I will hear him." (Ps. 90:15.) "Cry to me, and I will hear thee." (Jer. 33:3.) "You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you." (John 15:7.) Ask whatsoever you wish and it shall be given to you. There are a thousand similar passages in the Old and New Testaments. By his nature God is, as St. Leo says, goodness itself. "Deus cujus natura bonitas." Hence he desires, with a great desire, to make us partakers of his own good. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that when a soul prays to God for any grace, he feels in a certain manner under an obligation to her, and thanks her; because by prayer the soul opens to him a way of satisfying his desire to dispense his graces to us. Hence, in the holy Scriptures, the Lord appears to recommend and inculcate to us nothing more forcibly than to ask and pray. To show this, the words which we read in the seventh chapter of St. Matthew are sufficient. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you" (7:7). St. Augustine teaches, that by these promises God has bound himself to grant all that we ask in prayer. "By his promises he has made himself a debtor." (De Verb. Dom. Serm. ii.) And, in the fifth sermon, the saint says, that if the Lord did not wish to bestow his graces upon us, he would not exhort us so strenuously to ask them. "He would not exhort us to ask, unless he wished to give." Hence we see that the Psalms of David and the Books of Solomon and of the Prophets are full of prayers.

2. Theodoret has written, that prayer is so efficacious before God, that, "though it be one, it can do all things." "Oratio cum sit una, omnia potest." St. Bernard teaches, that when we pray, the Lord, if he does not give the grace we ask, will grant a more useful gift. "He will give either what we ask, or what he knows to be more profitable to us." (Serm. v. in Fer. 4 cin.) And whom has God, when asked for aid, ever despised by not listening to his petition? "Who hath called upon him, and he despised him?" (Eccl. 2:12.) The Scripture says, that among the nations there is none that has gods so willing to hear our prayers, as our true God. "Neither is there any other nation so great, that hath gods so nigh to them, as our God is present to all our petitions." (Deut. 4:7.) The princes of the earth, says St. Chrysostom, give audience only to a few; but God grants it to every one that wishes for it. "Aures principis paucis patent, Die vero omnibus volentibus." (Lib. 2, de Orat.) David tells us that this goodness of God in hearing us at whatever time we pray to him, shows us that he is our true God, whose love for us surpasses the love of all others. "In what day soever I shall call upon thee, behold I know thou art my God." (Ps. 55:10.) He wishes and ardently desires to confer favours upon us; but he requires us to pray for them. Jesus Christ said one day to his disciples: "Hitherto you have not asked anything in my name; ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full." (John 16:24.) As if he said: You complain of me for not making you perfectly content; but you ought to complain of yourselves for not having asked of me all the gifts you stood in need of; ask, henceforth, whatsoever you want, and your prayer shall be heard. Many, says St. Bernard complain that the Lord is wanting to them. But he complains with more justice that they are wanting to him, by neglecting to ask him for his graces. "Omnes nobis causamur deesse gratiam, sed justius forsitan ista sibi queritur deesse nonnullos." (S. Bern. de Tripl. Cust.)

3. The ancient fathers, after having consulted together about the exercise most conducive to salvation, came to the conclusion, that the best means of securing eternal life is, to pray continually, saying: Lord, assist me; Lord, hasten to my assistance. "Incline unto my aid, O God; O Lord, make haste to help me." Hence the holy Church commands these two petitions to be often repeated in the canonical hours by all the clergy and by all religious, who pray not only for themselves, but also for the whole Christian world. St. John Climacus says, that our prayers as it were compel God by a holy violence to hear us. "Prayer piously does violence to God." Hence, when we pray to the Lord, he instantly answers by bestowing upon us the grace we ask. "At the voice of thy cry, as soon as he shall hear, he will answer thee." (Isa. 30:19.) Hence St. Ambrose says, that "he who asks of God, receives while he asks." (Ep. lxxxiv., ad Demetr.) And he not only grants his grace instantly, but also abundantly, giving us more than we pray for. St. Paul tells us that God is rich—that is, liberal of his graces to every one that prays to him. "Rich unto all that call upon him." (Rom. 10:12.) And St. James says: "If any of you want wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all men abundantly and upbraideth not." (St. James 1:5.) "He upbraideth not;" when we pray to him he does not reproach us with the insults we have offered to him, but he appears then to forget all the injuries we have done him, and to delight in enriching us with his graces.

SECOND POINT. ON THE NECESSITY OF PRAYER.

4. "God," as St. Paul has written, "will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth." (1 Tim. 2:4.) According to St. Peter, he does not wish any one to be lost. "The Lord dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any soul should perish, but that all should return to penance." (1 Pet. 3:9.) Hence St. Leo teaches, that as God wishes us to observe his commands, so he prevents us by his assistance, that we may fulfil them. "Juste instat præcepto qui præcurrit auxilio." (Serm. xvi. de Pass.) And St. Thomas, in explaining the words of the Apostle, "God, who will have all men to be saved," says: "Therefore, grace is wanting to no one; but he, on his part, communicates it to all." (In Epist., ad Hebr., cap. xii., lect. 3.) And in another place the holy doctor writes: "To provide every man with the means necessary for his salvation, provided on his part he puts no obstacle to it, belongs to Divine Providence." But, according to Gennadius, the assistance of his grace the Lord grants only to those who pray for it. "We believe . . . that no one works out his salvation but by God's assistance; and that he only who prays merits aid from God." (de Eccles. Dogm.) And St. Augustine teaches, that, except the first graces of vocation to the faith and to repentance, all other graces, and particularly the grace of perseverance, are granted to those only who ask them. "It is evident that God gives some graces, such as the beginning of faith, without prayer—and that he has prepared other graces, such as perseverance to the end—only for those who pray." (De dono persev., c. xvi.) And in another place he writes, that "God wishes to bestow his favours; but he gives them only to those who ask." (In Ps. c.)

5. Hence theologians commonly teach, after St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom, St. Augustine, Clement of Alexandria, and others, that, for adults prayer is necessary as a means of salvation; that is, that without prayer it is impossible for them to be saved. This doctrine may be inferred from the following passages of Scripture: "We ought always to pray." (Luke 18:1.) "Ask, and you shall receive." (John 16:24.) "Pray without ceasing." (1 Thess. 5:17.) The words we ought, ask, pray, according to St. Thomas (3 part, qu. xxxix. art. 5) and the generality of theologians, imply a precept which obliges, under grievous sin, particularly in three cases: First, when a man is in the state of sin; secondly, when he is in great danger of falling into sin; and, thirdly, when he is in danger of death. Theologians teach, that he who, at other times, neglects prayer for a month, or at most for two months, cannot be excused from mortal sin; because, without prayer we cannot procure the helps necessary for the observance of the law of God. St. Chrysostom teaches that as water is necessary to prevent trees from withering, so prayer is necessary to save us from perdition. "Non minus quam arbores aquis, precibus indigemus." (Tom. 1, hom. lxxvii.)

6. Most groundless was the assertion of Jansenius, that there are some commands, the fulfilment of which is impossible to us, and that we have not even grace to render their observance possible. For, the Council of Trent teaches, in the words of St. Augustine, that, though man is not able, with the aid of the grace ordinarily given, to fulfil all the commandments, still he can, by prayer, obtain the additional helps necessary for their observance. "God does not command impossibilities; but, by his precepts, he admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask what you cannot do; and he assists you, that you may be able to do it." (Sess. 6, cap. xi.) To this may be added another celebrated passage of St. Augustine: "By our faith, which teaches that God does not command impossibilities, we are admonished what to do in things that are easy, and what to ask in things that are difficult." (Lib. de Nat. et Grat., cap. lxix., n. 83.)

7. But why does God, who knows our weakness, permit us to be assailed by enemies which we are not able to resist? The Lord, answers the holy doctor, seeing the great advantages which we derive from the necessity of prayer, permits us to be attacked by enemies more powerful than we are, that we may ask his assistance. Hence they who are conquered cannot excuse themselves by saying that they had not strength to resist the assault of the enemy; for had they asked aid from God, he should have given it; and had they prayed, they should have been victorious. Therefore, if they are defeated, God will punish them. St. Bonaventure says, that if a general lose a fortress in consequence of not having sought timely succour from his sovereign, he shall be branded as a traitor. "Reputaretur infidelis, nisi expectaret a rege auxilium." (S. Bon. Diæt. tit., c. v.) Thus God regards as a traitor the Christian who, when he finds himself assailed by temptations, neglects to seek the divine aid. "Ask," says Jesus Christ, "and you shall receive." Then, concludes St. Teresa, he that does not ask does not receive. This is conformable to the doctrine of St. James: "You have not, because you do not ask." (St. James 4:2.) St. Chrysostom says, that prayer is a powerful weapon of defence against all enemies. "Truly prayer is a great armour." (Hom. xli., ad Pop.) St. Ephrem writes, that he who fortifies himself beforehand by prayer, prevents the entrance of sin into the soul. "If you pray before you work, the passage into the soul will not be open to sin." (Serm. de Orat.) David said the same: "Praising I will call upon the Lord, and I shall be saved from my enemies." (Ps. 17:4.)

8. If we wish to lead a good life, and to save our souls, we must learn to pray. "He," says St. Augustine, "knows how to live well who knows how to pray well." (Hom. xliii.) In order to obtain God's graces by prayer, it is necessary, first, to take away sin; for God does not hear obstinate sinners. For example: if a person entertains hatred towards another, and wishes to take revenge, God does not hear his prayer. "When you multiply prayer, I will not hear; for your hands are full of blood." (Isa. 1:15.) St. Chrysostom says, that he who prays while he cherishes a sinful affection, does not pray, but mocks God. "Qui orat et peccat, non rogat Deum sed illudit." (Hom. xi., in Matt. vi.) But if he ask the Lord to take away hatred from his heart, the Lord will hear him. Secondly, it is necessary to pray with attention. Some imagine that they pray by repeating many Our Fathers, with such distraction that they do not know what they say. These speak, but do not pray. Of them the Lord says, by the Prophet Isaias: "With their lips they glorify me, but their hearts are far from me." (Isa. 29:13.) Thirdly, it is necessary, as the Holy Ghost exhorts us, to take away the occasions which hinder us to pray. "Let nothing hinder thee from praying always." (Eccl. 18:22.) He who is occupied in a thousand affairs unprofitable to the soul, places a cloud before his prayers, which prevents their passing to the throne of grace. "Thou hast set a cloud before thee, that our prayer may not pass through." (Lamen. 3:44.) I will not omit here the exhortation of St. Bernard, to ask graces of God through the intercession of his divine mother. "Let us ask grace, and ask it through Mary; for she is a mother, and her prayer cannot be fruitless." (Serm. de Aqæd.) St. Anselm says: "Many things are asked of God and are not obtained: what is asked of Mary is obtained, not because she is more powerful, but because God decreed thus to honour her, that men may know that she can obtain all things from God."

Sermon XL

ELEVENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE VICE OF SPEAKING IMMODESTLY

"He touched his tongue, . . . and the string of his tongue was loosed."—MARK 7:33, 35.

IN this day's gospel St. Mark relates the miracle which our Saviour wrought in healing the man that was dumb by barely touching his tongue. "He touched his tongue . . . and the string of his tongue was loosed." From the last words we may infer that the man was not entirely dumb, but that his tongue was not free, or that his articulation was not distinct. Hence St. Mark tells us, that after the miracle he spoke right. Let us make the application to ourselves. The dumb man stood in need of a miracle to loose his tongue, and to take away the impediment under which he laboured. But how many are there on whom God would confer a great grace, if he bound their tongues, that they might cease to speak immodestly! This vice does great injury to others. Secondly, it does great injury to themselves. These shall be the two points of this sermon.

FIRST POINT. THE MAN WHO SPEAKS IMMODESTLY DOES GREAT INJURY TO OTHERS WHO LISTEN TO HIM.

1. In explaining the 140th Psalm, St. Augustine calls those who speak obscenely "the mediators of Satan," the ministers of Lucifer; because, by their obscene language, the demon of impurity gets access to souls, which by his own suggestions he could not enter. Of their accursed tongues St. James says: "And the tongue is a fire, . . . being set on fire by hell." (James 3:6.) He says that the tongue is a fire kindled by hell, with which they who speak obscenely burn themselves and others. The obscene tongue may be said to be the tongue of the third person, of which Ecclesiasticus says: "The tongue of a third person hath disquieted many, and scattered them from nation to nation." (Eccl. 28:16.) The spiritual tongue speaks of God, the worldly tongue talks of worldly affairs; but the tongue of a third person is a tongue of hell, which speaks of the impurities of the flesh; and this is the tongue that perverts many, and brings them to perdition.

2. Speaking of the life of men on this earth, the Royal Prophet says: "Let their way become dark and slippery." (Ps. 34:6.) In this life men walk in the midst of darkness and in a slippery way. Hence they are in danger of falling at every step, unless they cautiously examine the road on which they walk, and carefully avoid dangerous steps—that is, the occasions of sin. Now, if in treading this slippery way, frequent efforts were made to throw them down, would it not be a miracle if they did not fall? "The Mediators of Satan," who speak obscenely, impel others to sin, who, as long as they live on this earth, walk in the midst of darkness, and as long as they remain in the flesh, are in danger of falling into the vice of impurity. Now, of those who indulge in obscene language, it has been well said: "Their throat is an open sepulchre." (Ps. 5:11.) The mouths of those who can utter nothing but filthy obscenities are, according to St. Chrysostom, so many open sepulchres of putrified carcasses. "Talia sunt ora hominum qui turpia proferunt." (Hom. 2, de Proph. Obs.) The exhalation which arises from the rottenness of a multitude of dead bodies thrown together into a pit, communicates infection and disease to all who feel the stench.

3. "The stroke of a whip," says Ecclesiasticus, "maketh a blue mark; but the stroke of a tongue will break the bones." (Eccl. 28:21.) The wounds of the lash are wounds of the flesh, but the wounds of the obscene tongue are wounds which infect the bones of those who listen to its language. St. Bernardine of Sienna relates, that a virgin who led a holy life, at hearing an obscene word from a young man, fell into a bad thought, and afterwards abandoned herself to the vice of impurity to such a degree that, the saint says, if the devil had taken human flesh, he could not have committed so many sins of that kind as she committed.

4.The misfortune is, that the mouths of hell that frequently utter immodest words, regard them as trifles, and are careless about confessing them: and when rebuked for them they answer: "I say these words in jest, and without malice." In jest! Unhappy man, these jests make the devil laugh, and shall make you weep for eternity in hell. In the first place, it is useless to say that you utter such words without malice; for, when you use such expressions, it is very difficult for you to abstain from acts against purity. According to St. Jerome, "He that delights in words is not far from the act." Besides, immodest words spoken before persons of a different sex, are always accompanied with sinful complacency. And is not the scandal you give to others criminal? Utter a single obscene word, and you shall bring into sin all who listen to you. Such is the doctrine of St. Bernard. "One speaks, and he utters only one word; but he kills the souls of a multitude of hearers." (Serm. xxiv., in Cant.) A greater sin than if, by one discharge of a blunderbuss, you murdered many persons; because you would then only kill their bodies: but, by speaking obscenely, you have killed their souls.

5. In a word, obscene tongues are the ruin of the world. One of them does more mischief than a hundred devils; because it is the cause of the perdition of many souls. This is not my language; it is the language of the Holy Ghost. "A slippery mouth worketh ruin." (Prov. 26:28.) And when is it that this havoc of souls is effected, and that such grievous insults are offered to God? It is in the summer, at the time when God bestows upon you the greatest temporal blessings. It is then that he supplies you for the entire year with corn, wine, oil, and other fruits of the earth. It is then that there are as many sins committed by obscene words, as there are grains of corn or bunches of grapes. O ingratitude! How does God bear with us? And who is the cause of these sins? They who speak immodestly are the cause of them. Hence they must render an account to God, and shall be punished for all the sins committed by those who hear them. "But I will require his blood at thy hand." (Ezec. 3:11.) But let us pass to the second point.

SECOND POINT. HE WHO SPEAKS IMMODESTLY DOES GREAT INJURY TO HIMSELF.

6. Some young men say: "I speak without malice." In answer to this excuse, I have already said, in the first point, that it is very difficult to use immodest language without taking delight in it; and that speaking obscenely before young females, married or unmarried, is always accompanied with a secret complacency in what is said. Besides, by using immodest language, you expose yourself to the proximate danger of falling into unchaste actions: for, according to St. Jerome, as we have already said, "he who delights in words is not far from the act." All men are inclined to evil. "The imagination and thought of man's heart are prone to evil." (Gen. 8:21.) But, above all, men are prone to the sin of impurity, to which nature itself inclines them. Hence St. Augustine has said, that in struggling against that vice "the victory is rare," at least for those who do not use great caution. "Communis pugna et rara victoria." Now, the impure objects of which they speak are always presented to the mind of those who freely utter obscene words. These objects excite pleasure, and bring them into sinful desires and morose delectations, and afterwards into criminal acts. Behold the consequence of the immodest words which young men say they speak without malice.

7. "Be not taken in thy tongue," says the Holy Ghost. (Eccl. 5:16.) Beware lest by your tongue you forge a chain which will drag you to hell. "The tongue," says St. James, "defileth the whole body, and inflameth the wheel of our nativity." (St. James 3:6.) The tongue is one of the members of the body, but when it utters bad words it infects the whole body, and "inflames the wheels of our nativity;" it inflames and corrupts our entire life from our birth to old age. Hence we see that men who indulge in obscenity, cannot, even in old age, abstain from immodest language. In the life of St. Valerius, Surius relates that the saint, in travelling, went one day into a house to warm himself. He heard the master of the house and a judge of the district, though both were advanced in years, speaking on obscene subjects. The saint reproved them severely; but they paid no attention to his rebuke. However, God punished both of them: one became blind, and a sore broke out on the other, which produced deadly spasms. Henry Gragerman relates (in Magn. Spec., dist. 9, ex. 58), that one of those obscene talkers died suddenly and without repentance, and that he was afterwards seen in hell tearing his tongue in pieces; and when it was restored he began again to lacerate it.

8. But how can God have mercy on him who has no pity on the souls of his neighbours? "Judgment without mercy to him that hath not done mercy." (St. James 2:13.) Oh! what a pity to see one of those obscene wretches pouring out his filthy expressions before girls and young married females! The greater the number of such persons present, the more abominable is his language. It often happens that little boys and girls are present, and he has no horror of scandalizing these innocent souls! Cantipratano relates that the son of a certain nobleman in Burgundy was sent to be educated by the monks of Cluni. He was an angel of purity; but the unhappy boy having one day entered into a carpenter's shop, heard some obscene words spoken by the carpenter's wife, fell into sin, and lost the divine grace. Father Sabitano, in his work entitled "Evangelical Light," relates that another boy, fifteen years old, having heard an immodest word, began to think of it the following night, consented to a bad thought, and died suddenly the same night. His confessor having heard of his death, intended to say Mass for him. But the soul of the unfortunate boy appeared to him, and told the confessor not to celebrate Mass for him—that, by means of the word he had heard, he was damned—and that the celebration of Mass would add to his pains. O God! how great, were it in their power to weep, would be the wailing of the angel-guardians of these poor children that are scandalized and brought to hell by the language of obscene tongues! With what earnestness shall the angels demand vengeance from God against the author of such scandals! That the angels shall cry for vengeance against them, appears from the words of Jesus Christ: "See that you despise not one of these little ones; for I say to you, that their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father." (Matt. 18:10.)

9. Be attentive, then, my brethren, and guard yourselves against speaking immodestly, more than you would against death. Listen to the advice of the Holy Ghost: "Make a balance for thy words, and a just bridle for thy mouth; and take heed lest thou slip with thy tongue—and thy fall be incurable unto death." (Eccl. 28:29, 30.) "Make a balance"—you must weigh your words before you utter them—and "a bridle for thy mouth"—when immodest words come to the tongue, you must suppress them; otherwise, by uttering them, you shall inflict on your own soul, and on the souls of others, a mortal and incurable wound. God has given you the tongue, not to offend him, but to praise and bless him. "But," says St. Paul, "fornication and all uncleanness, let it not so much as be named among you, as becometh saints." (Ephes. 5:3.) Mark the words "all uncleanness." We must not only abstain from obscene language and from every word of double meaning spoken in jest, but also from every improper word unbecoming a saint—that is, a Christian. It is necessary to remark, that words of double meaning sometimes do greater evil than open obscenity, because the art with which they are spoken makes a deeper impression on the mind.

10. Reflect, says St. Augustine, that your mouths are the mouths of Christians, which Jesus Christ has so often entered in the holy communion. Hence, you ought to have a horror of uttering all unchaste words, which are a diabolical poison. "See, brethren, if it be just that, from the mouths of Christians, which the body of Christ enters, an immodest song, like diabolical poison, should proceed." (Serm. 15, de Temp.) St. Paul says, that the language of a Christian should be always seasoned with salt. "Let your speech be always in grace, seasoned with salt." (Col. 4:6.) Our conversation should be seasoned with words calculated to excite others not to offend, but to love God. "Happy the tongue," says St. Bernard, "that knows only how to speak of holy things!" Happy the tongue that knows only how to speak of God! O brethren, be careful not only to abstain from all obscene language, but to avoid, as you would a plague, those who speak immodestly. When you hear any one begin to utter obscene words, follow the advice of the Holy Ghost: "Hedge in thy ears with thorns: hear not a wicked tongue." (Eccl. 28:28.) "Hedge in thy ears with thorns"—that is, reprove with zeal the man who speaks obscenely; at least turn away your face, and show that you hate such language. Let us not be ashamed to appear to be followers of Jesus Christ, unless we wish Jesus Christ to be ashamed to bring us with him into Paradise.

Sermon XLI

TWELFTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE ABUSE OF DIVINE MERCY

"Take care of him."—LUKE 10:35.

IN this day's gospel we read, that a certain man fell into the hands of robbers, who, after having taken his money, wounded him, and left him half dead. A Samaritan who passed by, saw him, and taking pity on him, bound up his wounds, brought him to an inn, and left him to the care of the host, saying: "Take care of him." These words I this day address to those, if there be any such among you, who, though their souls are wounded by sin, instead of attending to the care of them, continually aggravate the wounds by new sins, and thus abuse the mercy of God, who preserves their lives, that they may repent, and not be lost for ever. I say to you: Brethren, take care of your souls, which are in a very bad state; have compassion on them. "Have pity on thy own soul." (Eccl. 30:24.) Your souls are sick, and—what is worse—they are near the eternal death of hell; for he who abuses to excess the divine mercy, is on the point of being abandoned by the mercy of God. This shall be the subject of the present discourse.

1. St. Augustine says that the devil deludes Christians in two ways—"by despair and hope." After a person has committed sin, the enemy, by placing before his eyes the rigour of divine justice, tempts him to despair of the mercy of God. But, before he sins, the devil by representing to him the divine mercy, labours to make him fearless of the chastisement due to sin. Hence the saint gives the following advice: "After sin, hope for mercy; before sin, fear justice." If, after sin, you despair of God's pardon, you offend him by a new and more grievous sin. Have recourse to his mercy, and he will pardon you. But, before sin, fear God's justice, and trust not to his mercy; for, they who abuse the mercy of God to offend him, do not deserve to be treated with mercy. Abulensis says, that the man who offends justice may have recourse to mercy; but to whom can they have recourse, who offend and provoke mercy against themselves?

2. When you intend to commit sin, who, I ask, promises you mercy from God? Certainly God does not promise it. It is the devil that promises it, that you may lose God and be damned. "Beware," says St. John Chrysostom, "never to attend to that dog that promises thee mercy from God." (Hom. 50, ad Pop.) If, beloved sinners, you have hitherto offended God, hope and tremble: if you desire to give up sin, and if you detest it, hope; because God promises pardon to all who repent of the evil they have done. But if you intend to continue in your sinful course, tremble lest God should wait no longer for you, but cast you into hell. Why does God wait for sinners? Is it that they may continue to insult him? No; he waits for them that they may renounce sin, and that thus he may have pity on them, and forgive them. "Therefore the Lord waiteth, that he may have mercy on you." (Isa. 30:1, 8.) But when he sees that the time which he gave them to weep over their past iniquities is spent in multiplying their sins, he begins to inflict chastisement, and he cuts them off in the state of sin, that, by dying, they may cease to offend him. Then he calls against them the very time he had given them for repentance. "He hath called against me the time." (Lam. 1:15.) "The very time," says St. Gregory, "comes to judge."

3. O common illusion of so many damned Christians! We seldom find a sinner so abandoned to despair as to say: I will damn myself. Christians sin, and endeavour to save their souls. They say: "God is merciful: I will commit this sin, and will afterwards confess it." Behold the illusion, or rather the snare, by which Satan draws so many souls to hell. "Commit sin," he says, "and confess it afterwards." But listen to what the Lord says: "And say not, the mercy of the Lord is great; he will have mercy on the multitude of my sins." (Eccl. 5:6.) Why does he tell you not to say, that the mercy of God is great? Attend to the words contained in the following verse: "For mercy and wrath come quickly from him, and his wrath looketh upon sinners." (Ibid., ver. 7.) The mercy of God is different from the acts of his mercy; the former is infinite, the latter are finite. God is merciful, but he is also just. St. Basil says, that sinners only consider God as merciful and ready to pardon, but not as just and prepared to inflict punishment. Of this the Lord complained one day to St. Bridget: "I am just and merciful: sinners regard me only as merciful." St. Basil's words are: "Bonus est Dominus sed etiam Justus, nolimus Deum ex dimidia parte cogitare." God is just, and, being just, he must punish the ungrateful. Father John Avila used to say, that to bear with those who avail themselves of the mercy of God to offend him, would not be mercy, but a want of justice. Mercy, as the divine mother said, is promised to those who fear, and not to those who insult the Lord. "And his mercy to them that fear him." (Luke 1:50.)

4. Some rash sinners will say: God has hitherto shown me so many mercies; why should he not hereafter treat me with the same mercy? I answer: he will show you mercy, if you wish to change your life; but if you intend to continue to offend him, he tells you that he will take vengeance on your sins by casting you into hell. "Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time, that their foot may slide." (Deut. 32:35.) David says, that "except you be converted, he will brandish his sword." (Ps. 7:13.) The Lord has bent his bow, and waits for your conversion; but if you resolve not to return to him, he will in the end cast the arrow against you, and you shall be damned. O God! there are some who will not believe that there is a hell until they fall into it. Can you, beloved Christians, complain of the mercies of God, after he has shown you so many mercies by waiting for you so long? You ought to remain always prostrate on the earth to thank him for his mercies, saying: "The mercies of the Lord that we are not consumed." (Lamen. 3:32.) Were the injuries which you offered to God committed against a brother, he would not have borne with you. God has had so much patience with you; and he now calls you again. If, after all this, he shall send you to hell, will he do you any wrong? "What is there," he will say, "that I ought to do more for my vineyard, that I have not done to it?" (Isa. 5:4.) Impious wretch! what more ought I to do for you that I have not done?

5. St. Bernard says, that the confidence which sinners have in God's goodness when they commit sin, procures for them, not a blessing, but a malediction from the Lord. "Est infidelis fiducia solius ubique maledictionis capax, cum videlicet in spe peccamus." (Serm, 3, de Annunc.) O deceitful hope, which sends so many Christians to hell! St. Augustine says: "Sperant, ut peccent! Væ a perversa spe." (In Ps. cxliv.) They do not hope for the pardon of the sins of which they repent; but they hope that, though they continue to commit sin, God will have mercy upon them; and thus they make the mercy of God serve as a motive for continuing to offend him. O accursed hope! hope which is an abomination to the Lord! "And their hope the abomination." (Job 11:20.) This hope will make God hasten the execution of his vengeance; for surely a master will not defer the punishment of servants who offend him because he is good. Sinners, as St. Augustine observes, trusting in God's goodness, insult him, and say: "God is good; I will do what I please." (Tract. xxxiii. in Joan.) But, alas! how many, exclaims the same St. Augustine, has this vain hope deluded! "They who have been deceived by this shadow of vain hope cannot be numbered." St. Bernard writes, that Lucifer's chastisement was accelerated, because, in rebellion against God, he hoped that he should not be punished for his rebellion. Ammon, the son of king Manasses, seeing that God had pardoned the sins of his father, gave himself up to a wicked life with the hope of pardon; but, for Ammon there was no mercy. St. John Chrysostom says, that Judas was lost because, trusting in the goodness of Jesus Christ, he betrayed him. "Fidit in lenitate Magistri."

6. He that sins with the hope of pardon, saying: "I will afterwards repent, and God will pardon me:" is, according to St. Augustine, "not a penitent, but a scoffer." The Apostle tells us that "God is not mocked." (Gal. 6:7.) It would be a mockery of God to offend him as often and as long as you please, and always to receive the pardon of your offences. "For what things a man shall sow," says St. Paul, "those also shall he reap." (Ibid., ver. 8.) They who sow sins, can hope for nothing but the hatred of God and hell. "Despisest thou the riches of his goodness, and patience, and long-suffering." (Rom. 2:4.) Do you, O sinner, despise the riches of the goodness, of the patience, and long-suffering of God towards you? He uses the word riches, because the mercies which God shows us, in not punishing our sins, are riches more valuable to us than all treasures. "Knowest thou not," continues the Apostle, "that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance?" (Ibid.) Do you not know that the Lord waits for you, and treats you with so much benignity, not that you may continue to sin, but that you may weep over the offences you have offered to him? For, says St. Paul, if you persevere in sin and do not repent, your obstinacy and impenitence shall accumulate a treasure of wrath against the day of wrath, that is, the day on which God shall judge you. "According to thy hardness and impenitent heart, thou treasurest up wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the just judgment of God." (Ibid., verse 5.)

7. To the hardness of the sinner shall succeed his abandonment by God, who shall say of the soul that is obstinate in sin, what he said of Babylon: "We would have cured Babylon; but she is not healed; let us forsake her." (Jer. 51:9.) And how does God abandon the sinner? He either sends him a sudden death, and cuts him off in sin, or he deprives him of the graces which would be necessary to bring him to true repentance; he leaves him with the sufficient graces with which he can, but will not, save his soul. The darkness of his understanding, the hardness of his heart, and the bad habits which he has contracted, will render his conversion morally impossible. Thus, he shall not be absolutely but morally abandoned. "I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be wasted." (Isa. 5:5.) When the master of the vineyard destroys its hedges, does he not show that he abandons it? It is thus that God acts when he abandons a soul. He takes away the hedge of holy fear and remorse of conscience, and leaves the soul in darkness, and then vices crowd into the heart. "Thou hast appointed darkness, and it is night: in it shall all the beasts of the wood go about." (Ps. 103:20.) And the sinner, abandoned in an abyss of sins, will despise admonitions, excommunications, divine grace, chastisement, and hell: he will make a jest of his own damnation. "The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sin, contemneth." (Prov. 18:3.)

8. "Why," asks the Prophet Jeremias, "doth the way of the wicked prosper?" (Jer. 12:1.) He answers: "Gather them together as sheep for a sacrifice." (v. 3.) Miserable the sinner who is prosperous in this life! The prosperity of sinners is a sign that God wishes to give them a temporal reward for some works which are morally good, but that he reserves them as victims of his justice for hell, where, like the accursed cockle, they shall be cast to burn for all eternity. "In the time of the harvest, I will say to the reapers: Gather up the first cockle, and bind it in bundles to burn." (Matt. 13:30.)

9. Thus, not to be punished in this life is the greatest of God's chastisements on the wicked, and has been threatened against the obstinate sinner by the Prophet Isaias. "Let us have pity on the wicked, but he will not learn justice." (Isa. 26:10.) On this passage St. Bernard says: This mercy I do not wish for: it is above all wrath. "Misericordiam hanc nolo; super omnem iram misericordia ista." (Serm. xlii., in Cant.) And what greater chastisement than to be abandoned into the hands of sin, so that, being permitted by God to fall from sin to sin, the sinner must in the end go to suffer as many hells as he has committed sins? "Add thou iniquity upon their iniquity . . . let them be blotted out of the book of the living." (Ps. 68:28, 29.) On these words Bellarmine writes: "There is no punishment greater than when sin is the punishment of sin." It would be better for such a sinner to die after the first sin; because by dying under the load of so many additional iniquities, he shall suffer as many hells as he has committed sins. This is what happened to a certain comedian in Palermo, whose name was Cæsar. He one day told a friend that Father La Nusa, a missionary, foretold him that God should give him twelve years to live, and that if within that time he did not change his life, he should die a bad death. Now, said he to his friend, I have travelled through so many parts of the world: I have had many attacks of sickness, one of which nearly brought me to the grave; but in this month the twelve years shall be completed, and I feel myself in better health than in any of the past years. He then invited his friend to listen to a new comedy which he had composed. But, what happened? On the 24th November, 1688, the day fixed for the comedy, as he was going on the stage, he was seized with apoplexy, and died suddenly. He expired in the arms of a female comedian. Thus the scene of this world ended miserably for him.

10. Let us make the application to ourselves, and conclude the discourse. Brethren, I entreat you to give a glance at all the bygone years of your life: look at the grievous offences you have committed against God, and at the great mercies which he has shown to you, the many lights he has bestowed upon you, and the many times he has called you to a change of life. By this sermon he has to-day given you a new call. He appears to me to say to you: "What is there that I ought to do to my vineyard, that I have not done to it?" (Isa. 5:4.) What more ought I to do for you that I have not done? What do you say? What answer have you to make? Will you give yourselves to God, or will you continue to offend him? Consider, says St. Augustine, that the punishment of your sins has been deferred, not remitted. "O unfruitful tree! the axe has been deferred. Be not secure: you shall be cut off." If you abuse the divine mercy, you shall be cut off; vengeance shall soon fall upon you. What do you wait for? Do you wait till God sends you to hell? The Lord has been hitherto silent; but he is not silent for ever. When the time of vengeance shall arrive he will say: "These things hast thou done, and I was silent. Thou thoughtest unjustly that I should be like to thee: but I will reprove thee, and set before thy face." (Ps. 49:21.) He will set before your eyes the graces which he bestowed upon you, and which you have despised: these very graces shall judge and condemn you. O brethren, resist no longer the calls of God; tremble lest the call which he gives you to-day may be the last call for you. Go to confession as soon as possible, and make a firm resolution to change your lives. It is useless to confess your sins, if you afterwards return to your former vices. But you will perhaps say, that you have not strength to resist the temptations by which you are assailed. Listen to the words of the Apostle: "God is faithful, who will not permit you to be tempted above that which you are able." (1 Cor. 10:13.) God is faithful: he will not permit you to be tempted above your strength. And if of yourself you have not strength to overcome the devil, ask it from God, and he will give it to you. "Ask, and you shall receive." (John 16:24.) "Praising," said David, "I will call on the Lord, and I shall be saved from my enemies." (Ps. 17:4.) And St. Paul said: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me." (Phil. 4:13.) Of myself I can do nothing; but with the divine assistance I can do all things. Recommend yourselves to God in all temptations, and God will enable you to resist them, and you shall not fall.

Sermon LXII

THIRTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON AVOIDING BAD COMPANY

"There met him ten men that were lepers . . . As they went, they were made clean."—LUKE 17:12, 14.

IN this day's gospel it is related, that ten lepers of a certain town met Jesus Christ, and entreated him to heal the leprosy under which they laboured. The Lord bid them go and present themselves to the priests of the temple; but before they reached the temple they were cured. Now it may be asked why our Saviour, who could heal them in an instant, wished them to go to the priests, and healed them on the way. A certain author (Anthony of Lisbon) says that Jesus Christ foresaw that, had he cured them on the spot, they, by remaining in the place and conversing with the other lepers, from whom they took the leprosy, should easily relapse into the same disease. Therefore, he first wished them to depart from the place and then healed them. Whatever may be thought of this reason, let us come to the moral sense which may be deduced from it. The leprosy resembles sin. As the leprosy is a contagious disease, so the bad habits of the wicked infect others who associate with them. Hence, the leper who wishes to be cured shall never be healed unless he separates from bad companions. He that keeps company with robbers soon becomes a thief. In this discourse I shall show, that, to lead a good life, it is necessary to avoid bad companions.

1. "A friend of fools," says the Holy Ghost, "shall become like them." (Prov. 13:20.) Christians who live in enmity with God are, Father M. Avila used to say, all fools, who deserve to be shut up in a mad-house. For, what greater madness can be conceived than to believe in hell and to live in sin? But the man who contracts an intimacy with these fools shall soon become like them. Although he should hear all the sermons of the sacred orators, he will continue in vice, according to the celebrated maxim: "Examples make greater impressions than words." Hence the Royal Prophet has said: "With the elect thou wilt be elect, and with the perverse thou wilt be perverted." (Ps. 17:27.) St. Augustine says, that familiarity with sinners is as it were a hook which draws us to communicate in their vices. Let us, said the saint, avoid wicked friends, "lest by their company we may be drawn to a communion of vice." St. Thomas teaches, that to know whom we should avoid is a great means of saving our souls. "Firma tutela salutis est, scire quem fugiamus."

2. "Let their way become dark and slippery, and let the angel of the Lord pursue them." (Ps. 34:6.) All men in this life walk in the midst of darkness and in a slippery way. If, then, a bad angel—that is, a wicked companion, who is worse than any devil—pursue them, and endeavour to drive them into an abyss, who shall be able to escape death? "Talis eris," says Plato, "qualis conversatio quam sequeris?" And St. John Chrysostom said, that if we wish to know a man's moral habits, we have only to observe the character of the friends with whom he associates; because friendship finds or makes him like his friends. "Vis nosse hominem, attende quorum familiaritate assuescat: amicitia aut pares invenit, aut pares fecit." First, because, to please his friends, a man will endeavour to imitate them; secondly, because, as Seneca says, nature inclines men to do what they see others do. And the Scripture says: "They were mingled among the heathens, and learned their works." (Ps. 105:35.) According to St. Basil, as air which comes from pestilential places causes infection, so, by conversation with bad companions, we almost imperceptibly contract their vices. "Quemadmodum in pestilentibus locis sensim attractus aër latentem corporibus morbum injicit sic itidem in prava conversatione maxima a nobis mala hauriuntur, etiamsi statim incommodum non sentiatur." (St. Bas., hom. 9, ex var. quod Deus, etc.) And St. Bernard says that St. Peter, in consequence of associating with the enemies of Jesus Christ, denied his Master. "Existens cum passionis dominicæ ministris, Dominum negavit."

3. But how, asks St. Ambrose, can bad companions give you the odour of chastity, when they exhale the stench of impurity? How can they infuse into you sentiments of devotion when they themselves fly from it? How can they impart to you a shame of offending God, when they cast it away? "Quid tibi demonstrant castitatem, quem non habent? Devotionem quam non sequuntur? Verecundiam quam projiciunt?" St. Augustine writes of himself, that when he associated with bad companions, who boasted of their wickedness, he felt himself impelled to sin without shame; and to appear like them, he gloried in his evil actions. "Pudebat," he says, "me esse pudentem." (Lib. 2, de Conf., c. ix.) Hence Isaias admonishes you to "touch no unclean thing." (Isa. 52:11.) Touch not what is unclean: if you do, you too shall be polluted. He that handles pitch, says Ecclesiasticus, shall certainly be defiled with it; and they who keep company with the proud shall be clothed with pride. The same holds for other vices: "He that toucheth pitch shall be defiled with it; and he that hath fellowship with the proud shall put on pride." (Eccl. 13:1.)

4. What then must we do? The Wise Man tells us that we ought not only to avoid the vices of the wicked, but also to beware of treading in the ways in which they walk. "Restrain thy foot from their paths." (Prov. 1:15.) That is, we should avoid their conversations, their discourses, their feasts, and all the allurements and presents with which they will seek to entice us into their net. "My son," says Solomon, "if sinners shall entice thee, consent not to them." (Prov. 1:10.) Without the decoy, birds are not enticed into the fowler's net. "Will the bird fall into the snare upon the earth if there be no fowler?" (Amos 3:5.) The devil employs vicious friends as decoys, to draw so many souls into the snare of sin. "My enemies," says Jeremias, "have chased me, and have caught me like a bird without cause." (Lamen. 3:52.) He says, without cause. Ask the wicked why they have made a certain innocent young man fall into sin, and they will answer: We have done it without cause; we only wish to see him do what we ourselves do. This, says St. Ephrem, is one of the artifices of the devil: when he has caught a soul in his net, he makes him a snare, or a decoy, to deceive others. "Cum primum capta fuerit, anima, ad alias decipiendas fit quasi laqueus."

5. Hence, it is necessary to avoid, as you would a plague, all familiarity with those scorpions of hell. I have said that you must avoid familiarity with them—that is, all fellowship in their banquets or conversation; for never to meet them is, as the Apostle says, impossible. "Otherwise you must needs go out of this world." (1 Cor. 5:10.) But, it is in our power to abstain from familiar intercourse with them. "But now I have written to you not to keep company, etc.—with such a one, not so much as to eat." (Ibid. v. 11.) I have called them scorpions: so they have been called by the Prophet Ezechiel. "Thou art among unbelievers and destroyers, and thou dwellest among scorpions." (Ezec. 2:6) Would you live in the midst of scorpions? You must, then, fly from scandalous friends, who, by their bad examples and words, poison your soul. "A man's enemies shall be they of his own household." (Matt. 10:36.) Wicked friends, that are very familiar and intimate with us, become the most pernicious enemies of our souls. "Who," says Ecclesiasticus, "will pity an enchanter struck by a serpent, or any that come near wild beasts? So it is with him that keepeth company with a wicked man." (Eccl. 12:13.) If the man that makes free with serpents, or with ferocious wild beasts, be bitten or devoured by them, who will take pity on him? And so it is with him who associates with scandalous companions; if, by their bad example he be contaminated and lost, neither God nor man will have compassion on him; because he was cautioned to fly from their society.

6. One scandalous companion is enough to corrupt all who treat him as a friend. "Know you not," says St. Paul, "that a little leaven corrupts the whole lump?" (1 Cor. 5:7.) One of these scandalous sinners is able, by a perverse maxim, to infect all his companions. They are the false prophets whom Jesus Christ warns us to avoid. "Beware of false prophets." (Matt. 7:15.) False prophets deceive, not only by false predictions, but also by false maxims or doctrines, which are productive of the greatest mischief. For, as Seneca says, they leave in the soul certain seeds of iniquity which lead to evil. "Semina in animo relinqueunt, quæ inducunt ad malum." It is too true that scandalous language, as experience proves, corrupts the morals of those who hear it. "Evil communications," says the Apostle, "corrupt good manners." (1 Cor. 15:33.) A young man refuses, through the fear of God, to commit a certain sin: an incarnate devil, a bad companion, comes and says to him what the serpent said to Eve: "No; you shall not die the death." (Gen. 3:4.) What are you afraid of? How many others commit this sin? You are young; God will have pity on your youth. They will, as is written in the book of Wisdom, say: "Come, therefore, let us enjoy the good things that are present—let us everywhere leave tokens of joy (2:6, 9). Come with us; let us spend our time in amusement and in joy. "O nimis iniqua amicitia," says St. Augustine, "cum dicitur, eamus, facimus: pudet non esse impudentum." O cruel friendship of those who say: let us go and do etc.: it is a shame not to be shameless. He who hears such language is ashamed not to yield to it, and not be as shameless as they who utter it.

7. When any passion is kindled within us, we must be particularly careful in selecting the persons whom we will consult. For, then the passion itself will incline us to seek counsel from those who will probably give the advice which is most agreeable to the passion. But from such evil counsellors, who do not speak according to God, we should fly with greater horror than from an enemy; for their evil counsel, along with the passion which is excited, may precipitate us into horrible excesses. As soon as the passion shall subside we shall see the error committed, and the delusion into which we have been led by false friends. But the good advice of a friend, who speaks according to Christian truth and meekness, preserves us from every disorder, and restores calm to the soul.

8. "Depart from the unjust," says the Lord, "and evils shall depart from thee." (Eccl. 7:2.) Fly, separate from wicked companions, and you shall cease to commit sin. "Neither let the way of evil men please thee. Flee from it: pass not by it: go aside and forsake it." (Prov. 4:14, 15.) Avoid the ways in which these vicious friends walk, that you may not even meet them. "Forsake not an old friend; for the new will not be like to him." (Eccl. 9:14.) Do not leave your first friend, who loved you before you came into the world. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." (Jer. 31:3.) Your new friends do not love you; they hate you more than your greatest enemy: they seek not your welfare, as God, does, but their own pleasures, and the satisfaction of having companions of their wickedness and perdition. You will, perhaps, say: I feel a repugnance to separate from such a friend, who has been solicitous for my welfare; to break off from him would appear to be an act of ingratitude. What welfare? What ingratitude? God alone wishes your welfare, because he desires your eternal salvation. Your friend wishes your eternal ruin; he wishes you to follow him, but cares not if you be damned. It is not ingratitude to abandon a friend who leads you to hell; but it is ingratitude to forsake God, who has created you, who has died for you on the cross, and who desires your salvation.

9. Fly then from the conversation of these wicked friends. "Hedge in thy ears with thorns, hear not a wicked tongue." (Eccl. 28:28.) Beware of listening to the language of such friends; their words may bring you to perdition. And when you hear them speak improperly arm yourself with thorns, and reprove them, not only for the purpose of rebuking, but also of converting them. "Ut non solum," says St. Augustine, "repellantur sed etiam compungantur." Listen to a frightful example, and learn the evil which a wicked friend does. Father Sabatino relates in his "Evangelical Light," that two friends of that kind were one day together. One of them, to please the other, committed a sin; but after they had separated he died suddenly. The other, who knew nothing of his death, saw, in his sleep, his friend, and, according to his custom, ran to embrace him. But the deceased appeared to be surrounded with fire, and began to blaspheme the other, and to upbraid him for being the cause of his damnation. The other awoke and changed his life. But his unhappy friend was damned; and for his damnation there is not, and shall not be, any remedy for all eternity.

Sermon XLIII

FOURTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ALL ENDS, AND SOON ENDS

"The grass of the field, which is to-day, and to-morrow is cast into the oven."—MATT. 6:30.

BEHOLD! all the goods of the earth are like the grass of the field, which to-day is blooming and beautiful, but in the evening it withers and loses its flowers, and the next day is cast into the fire. This is what God commanded the Prophet Isaias to preach, when he said to him: "Cry. And I said: What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the glory thereof as the flower of the field." (Isa. 40:6.) Hence St. James compares the rich of this world to the flower of grass: at the end of their journey through life they rot, along with all their riches and pomps. "The rich . . . because as the flower of the grass shall he pass away. For the sun rose with a burning heat, and parched the grass, and the flower thereof fell off, and the beauty of the shape thereof perished: so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways." (St. James 1:10, 11.) They fade away and are cast into the fire, like the rich glutton, who made a splendid appearance in this life, but afterwards "was buried in hell." (Luke 16:22.) Let us, then, dearly beloved Christians, attend to the salvation of our souls, and to the acquisition of riches for eternity, which never ends; for everything in this world ends, and ends very soon.

FIRST POINT. EVERYTHING ENDS.

1. When one of the great of this world is in the full enjoyment of the riches and honours which he has acquired, death shall come, and he shall be told: "Take order with thy house; for thou shalt die, and not live." (Isa. 38:1.) Oh! what doleful tidings! The unhappy man must then say: Farewell, O world! farewell, O villa! farewell, O grotto! farewell, relatives! farewell, friends! farewell, sports! farewell, balls! farewell, comedies! farewell, banquets! farewell, honours! all is over for me. There is no remedy: whether he will or not, he must leave all. "For when he shall die, he shall take nothing away; nor shall his glory descend with him." (Ps. 48:18.) St. Bernard says, that death produces a horrible separation of the soul from the body, and from all the things of this earth. "Opus mortis horrendum divortium." (Serm. 26, in Cant.) To the great of this world, whom worldlings regard as the most fortunate of mortals, the bare name of death is so full of bitterness, that they are unwilling even to hear it mentioned; for their entire concern is to find peace in their earthly goods. "O death!" says Ecclesiasticus, "how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that hath peace in his possessions." (Eccl. 41:1.) But how much greater bitterness shall death itself cause when it actually comes—miserable the man who is attached to the goods of this world! Every separation produces pain. Hence, when the soul shall be separated by the stroke of death from the goods on which she had fixed all her affections, the pain must be excruciating. It was this that made king Agag exclaim, when the news of approaching death was announced to him: "Doth bitter death separate me in this manner?" (1 Kings 15:32.) The great misfortune of worldlings is, that when they are on the point of being summoned to judgment, instead of endeavouring to adjust the accounts of their souls, they direct all their attention to earthly things. But, says St. John Chrysostom, the punishment which awaits sinners, on account of having forgotten God during life, is that they forget themselves at the hour of death. "Hac animadversione percutitur impius, ut moriens obliviscatur sui, qui vivens oblitus est Dei."

2. But how great soever a man's attachment to the things of this world may be, he must take leave of them at death. Naked he has entered into this world, and naked he shall depart from it. "Naked," says Job, "I came out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither." (Job 1:21.) In a word, they who have spent their whole life, have lost their sleep, their health, and their soul, in accumulating riches and possessions, shall take nothing with them at the hour of death: their eyes shall then be opened; and of all they had so dearly acquired, they shall find nothing in their hands. Hence, on that night of confusion, they shall be overwhelmed in a tempest of pains and sadness. "The rich man, when he shall sleep, shall take away nothing with him. He shall open his eyes and find nothing . . . a tempest shall oppress him in the night." (Job 27:19, 20.) St. Antonine relates that Saladin, king of the Saracens, gave orders at the hour of death, that the winding sheet in which he was to be buried should be carried before him to the grave, and that a person should cry out: "Of all his possessions, this only shall Saladin bring with him." The saint also relates that a certain philosopher, speaking of Alexander the Great after his death, said: Behold the man that made the earth tremble. "The earth," as the Scripture says, "was quiet before him." (1 Mach. 1:3.) He is now under the earth. Behold the man whom the dominion of the whole world could not satisfy: now four palms of ground are sufficient for him. "Qui terram heri conculcubat, hodie ab ea conculcatur; et cui heri non sufficiebat mundus hodie sufficiunt quatuor ulnæ terræ." St. Augustine, or some other ancient writer, says, that having gone to see the tomb of Cæsar, he exclaimed: "Princes feared thee; cities worshipped thee; all trembled before thee;—where is thy magnificence gone?" (Serm. 38. ad Fratr.) Listen to what David says: "I have seen the wicked highly exalted and lifted up like the cedars of Libanus. And I passed by, and lo! he was not." (Ps. 36:35, 36.) Oh! how many such spectacles are seen every day in the world! A sinner who had been born in lowliness and poverty, afterwards acquires wealth and honours, so as to excite the envy of all. When he dies, every one says: He made a fortune in the world; but now he is dead, and with death all is over for him.

3. "Why is earth and ashes proud?" (Eccl. 10:9.) Such the language which the Lord addresses to the man who is puffed up by earthly honours and earthly riches. Miserable creature, he says, whence comes such pride? If you enjoy honours and riches, remember that you are dust. "For dust thou art, and into dust thou shalt return." (Gen. 3:19.) You must die, and after death what advantage shall you derive from the honours and possessions which now inflate you with pride? Go, says St. Ambrose, to a cemetery, in which are buried the rich and poor, and see if you can discern among them who has been rich and who has been poor; all are naked, and nothing remains of the richest among them but a few withered bones. "Respice sepulchra, die mihi, quis ibi dives, quis pauper sit" (lib. vi. exam., cap. viii). How profitable would the remembrance of death be to the man who lives in the world! "He shall be brought to the grave, and shall watch in the heap of the dead." (Job 21:32.) At the sight of these dead bodies he would remember death, and that he shall one day be like them. Thus, he should be awakened from the deadly sleep in which perhaps he lives in a state of perdition. But the misfortune is, that worldlings are unwilling to think of death until the hour comes when they must depart from this earth to go into eternity; and therefore they live as attached to the world, as if they were never to be separated from it. But our life is short, and shall soon end: thus all things must end, and must soon end.

SECOND POINT. ALL SOON ENDS.

4. Men know well, and believe firmly, that they shall die; but they imagine death is far off as if it were never to arrive. But Job tells us that the life of man is short. "Man born of a woman, living for a short time, is filled with many miseries. Who cometh forth like a flower and is destroyed." (Job 14:2.)

At present the health of men is so much impaired, that, as we see by experience, the greater number of them die before they attain the age of seventy. And what, says St. James, is our life but a vapour, which a blast of wind, a fever, a stroke of apoplexy, a puncture, an attack of the chest, causes to disappear, and which is seen no more? "For what is your life? It is a vapour which appeareth for a little while." (St. James 4:15.) "We all die," said the woman of Thecua to David, "and like waters that return no more, we fall down into the earth." (2 Kings 14:14.) She spoke the truth;—as all rivers and streams run to the sea, and as the gliding waters return no more, so our days pass away, and we approach to death.

5. They pass; they pass quickly. "My days," says Job, "have been swifter than a post." (Job 9:25.) Death comes to meet us, and runs more swiftly than a post; so that every step we make, every breath we draw, we approach to death. St. Jerome felt that even while he was writing he was drawing nearer to death. Hence he said: "What I write is taken away from my life." "Quad scribo de mea vita tollitur." Let us, then, say with Job: Years passed by, and with them pleasures, honours, pomps, and all things in this world pass away, "and only the grave remaineth for me." (Job 18:1.) In a word, all the glory of the labours we have undergone in this world, in order to acquire a large income, a high character for valour, for learning and genius, shall end in our being thrown into a pit to become the food of worms. The miserable worldling then shall say at death: My house, my garden, my fashionable furniture, my pictures and rich apparel, shall, in a short time, belong no more to me; "and only the grave remaineth for me."

6. But how much soever the worldling may be distracted by his worldly affairs and by his pleasures—how much soever he may be entangled in them, St. Chrysostom says, that when the fear of death, which sets fire to all things of the present life, begins to enter the soul, it will compel him to think and to be solicitous about his lot after death. "Cum pulsare animam incipit metus mortis (ignis instar præsentis vitæ omnia succendens) philosophari eam cogit, et futura solicita mente versari." (Serm, in 2 Tim.) Alas! at the hour of death "the eyes of the blind shall be opened." (Isa. 35:5.) Then indeed shall be opened the eyes of those blind worldlings who have employed their whole life in acquiring earthly goods, and have paid but little attention to the interests of the soul. In all these shall be verified what Jesus Christ has told them—that death shall come when they least expect it. "At what hour you think not the Son of Man will come." (Luke 12:40.) Thus, on these unhappy men death comes unexpectedly. Hence, because the lovers of the world are not usually warned of their approaching dissolution till it is very near, they must, in the last few days of life, adjust the accounts of their soul for the fifty or sixty years which they lived on this earth. They will then desire another month, or another week, to settle their accounts or to tranquillize their conscience. But "they will seek for peace, and there shall be none." (Ezec. 7:25.) The time which they desire is refused. The assistant priest reads the divine command to depart instantly from this world. "Proficiscere, anima Christiani de hoc mundo." "Depart, Christian soul, from this world." Oh! how dangerous the entrance of worldlings into eternity, dying, as they do, amid so much darkness and confusion, in consequence of the disorderly state of the accounts of their souls.

7. "Weight and balance are the judgments of the Lord." (Prov. 16:11.) At the tribunal of God, nobility, dignities, and riches have no weight; two things only—our sins, and the graces bestowed on us by God—make the scales ascend or descend. They who shall be found faithful in corresponding with the lights and calls which they have received, shall be rewarded; and they who shall be found unfaithful, shall be condemned. We do not keep an account of God's graces; but the Lord keeps an account of them; he measures them; and when he sees them despised to a certain degree, he leaves the soul in her sins, and takes her out of life in that miserable state. "For what things a man shall sow those also shall he reap." (Gal. 6:8.) From labours undertaken for the attainment of posts of honour and emolument, for the acquisition of property and of worldly applause, we reap nothing at the hour of death: all are then lost. We gather fruits of eternal life only from works performed, and tribulations suffered, for God.

8. Hence, St. Paul exhorts us to attend to our own business. "But we must entreat you, brethren . . . that you do your own business." (1 Thess. 4:10, 11.) Of what business, I ask, does the Apostle speak? Is it of acquiring riches, or a great name in the world? No; he speaks of the business of the soul, of which Jesus Christ spoke, when he said: "Trade till I come." (Luke 19:13.) The business for which the Lord has placed, and for which he keeps us on this earth, is to save our souls, and by good works to gain eternal life. This is the end for which we have been created. "And the end eternal life." (Rom. 6:22.) The business of the soul is for us not only the most important, but also the principal and only affair; for, if the soul be saved, all is safe; but if the soul be lost, all is lost. Hence, we ought, as the Scripture says, to strive for the salvation of our souls, and to combat to death for justice—that is, for the observance of the divine law. "Strive for justice for thy soul, and even unto death fight for justice." (Eccl. 4:33.) The business which our Saviour recommends to us, saying: Trade till I come, is, to have always before our eyes the day on which he shall come to demand an account of our whole life.

9. All things in this world—acquisitions, applause, grandeur—must, as we have said, all end, and end very soon. "The fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Cor. 7:31.) The scene of this life passes away; happy they who, in this scene, act their part well, and save their souls, preferring the eternal interests of the soul to all the temporal interests of the body. "He that hateth his life in this world, keepeth it unto life eternal." (John 12:26.) Worldlings say: Happy the man who hoards up money! happy they who acquire the esteem of the world, and enjoy the pleasures of this life! O folly! Happy he who loves God and saves his soul! The salvation of his soul was the only favour which king David asked of God. "One thing have I asked of the Lord, this will I seek after." (Ps. 26:4.) And St. Paul said, that to acquire the grace of Jesus Christ which contains eternal life, he despised as dung all worldly goods. "I count all things as loss—and I count them as dung, that I may gain Christ." (Phil. 3:8.)

10. But certain fathers of families will say: I do not labour so much for myself as for my children, whom I wish to leave in comfortable circumstances. But I answer: If you dissipate the goods which you possess, and leave your children in poverty, you do wrong, and are guilty of sin. But will you lose your soul in order to leave your children comfortable? If you fall into hell, perhaps they will come and release you from it? O folly! Listen to what David said: "I have not seen the just man forsaken, nor his seed seeking bread." (Ps. 36:25.) Attend to the service of God; act according to justice; the Lord will provide for the wants of your children; and you shall save your souls, and shall lay up that eternal treasure of happiness which can never be taken from you—a treasure not like earthly possessions, of which you may be deprived by robbers, and which you shall certainly lose at death. This is the advice which the Lord gives you: "But lay up to yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither the rust nor the moth doth consume, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." (Matt. 6:20.) In conclusion, attend to the beautiful admonition which St. Gregory gives to all who wish to live well and to gain eternal life. "Sit nobis in intentione æternitas, in usu temporalitas." Let the end of all our actions in this life be, the acquisition of eternal goods; and let us use temporal things only to preserve life for the little time we have to remain on this earth. The saint continues: "Sicut nulla est proportio inter æternitatem et nostiæ vitæ tempus, ita nulla debet esse proportio inter æternitatis, et hujus, vitæ curas." As there is an infinite distance between eternity and the time of our life, so there ought to be, according to our mode of understanding, an infinite distance between the attention which we should pay to the goods of eternity, which shall be enjoyed for ever, and the care we take of the goods of this life, which death shall soon take away from us.

Sermon XLIV

FIFTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE PRACTICAL DEATH, OR ON WHAT ORDINARILY HAPPENS AT THE DEATH OF MEN OF THE WORLD

"Behold, a dead man was carried out, the only son of his mother."—LUKE 7:12.

IT is related in this day's gospel that, going to the city of Naim, Jesus Christ met a dead man, the only son of his mother, who was carried out to be buried. "Behold, a dead man was carried out." Before we proceed further, let us stop at these words and remember death. The holy Church directs her ministers to say to Christians every year, on Ash Wednesday: "Memento homo qu ia pulvis es, et in pulverum reverteris." Remember man, thou art but dust, and into dust thou shalt return. Oh! would to God that men had death always before their eyes; if they had, they certainly should not lead such bad lives. Now, beloved brethren, that the remembrance of death may be impressed upon you, I will this day place before your eyes the practical death, or a description of what ordinarily happens at the death of men of the world, and of all the circumstances attending it. Hence we shall consider, in the first point, what happens at the time of the last illness: in the second point, what happens when the last sacraments are received; and, in the third, what happens at the time of death.

FIRST POINT. WHAT HAPPENS AT THE TIME OF THE LAST ILLNESS.

1. I do not intend in this discourse to speak of a sinner who had always lived in habitual sin; but of a worldling, who is careless about his salvation, and always entangled in the affairs of the world, in contracts, enmities, courtships, and gaming. He has frequently fallen into mortal sins, and after a considerable time has confessed them. In a word, he has been a relapsing sinner, and has generally lived in enmity with God, or, at least, has been generally perplexed with grievous doubts of conscience. Let us consider the death of such persons, and what ordinarily happens at their death.

2. Let us commence at the time at which his last illness appears. He rises in the morning, he goes out to look after his temporal affairs; but while he is engaged in business, he is assailed by a violent pain in the head, his legs totter, he feels a cold shivering, which runs through every member, a sickness of the stomach, and great debility over the whole body. He immediately returns home and throws himself on the bed. His relatives, his wife and sisters, run to him, and say: "Why have you retired so early? Are you unwell?" He answers: "I feel sick. I am scarcely able to stand; I have a great head-ache." "Perhaps," they say, "you have got a fever." "It must be so," he repl ies, "send for a physician." The physician is immediately sent for. In the meantime the sick man is put to bed, and there he is seized with a cold fit, which makes him shiver from head to foot. He is loaded with covering, but the cold continues for an hour or two, and is succeeded by a burning heat. The physician arrives, asks the sick man how he feels; he examines the pulse, and find he has a severe attack of fever. But, not to alarm him, the physician says: You have fever: but it is trifling. Have you giv en any occasion to it? The sick man replies: I went out by night a few days ago, and caught cold; or, I dined with a friend, and indulged my appetite to excess. It is worth nothing, the physician says: it is a fulness of stomach, or more probably one of these attacks which occur at the change of season. Eat nothing to-day: take a cup of tea; be not uneasy; be cheerful; there is no danger. I will see you tomorrow. Oh! that there was an angel, who, on the part of God, would say to the physician: What do you say? Do you tell me that there is no danger in this disease? Ah! the trumpet of the divine justice has, by the first symptoms of his illness, given the signal of the death of this man: for him the time of God's vengeance has already arrived.

3. The night comes, and the poor invalid gets no rest. The difficulty of breathing and headache increase. The night appears to him a thousand years. The light scarcely dawns when he calls for some of the family. His relatives come, and say to him: Have you rested well? Ah! I have not been able to close my eyes during the entire night. O God! how much do I feel oppressed! Oh! how violent are the spasms in my head! I feel my temples pierced by two nails. Send immediately for the physician; tell him to come as soon as possible. The physician comes, and finds the fever increased; but still he continues to say: "Have courage; there is no danger. The disease must take its course. The fever which accompanies it will make it disappear." He comes the third day, and finds the sick man worse. He comes on the fourth day, and symptoms of malignant fever appear. The taste on the mouth is disagreeable; the tongue is black; every part of the body is restless; and delirium has commenced. The physician, finding that the fever is acute, prescribes purging, bloodletting, and iced water. He says to the relatives: Ah! the sickness is most severe; I do not wish to be alone. Let other physicians be called in, that we may have a consultation. This he says in secret to the relatives, but not to the sick man—on the contrary, not to frighten him, he continues to say: "Be cheerful; there is no danger."

4. Thus, they speak of remedies, of more physicians, and of a consultation; but not a word about confession or the last sacraments. I know not how such physicians can be saved. Where the Bull of Pope Pius the Fifth is in force, they expressly swear, when they receive the diploma, that, after the third day of his illness, they will pay no more visits to any sick man until he has made his confession. But some physicians do not observe this oath, and thus so many poor souls are damned. For, when a sick man has lost his reason, of what use is confession to him? He is lost. Brethren, when you fall sick, do not wait till the physician tells you to send for a confessor; send for him of your own accord; for physicians, through fear of displeasing a patient, do not warn him of his danger until they despair, or nearly despair of his recovery. Thus, brethren, send first for your confessor—call first for the physician of the soul, and afterwards for the physician of the body. Your soul is at stake, eternity is at stake; if you err then you have erred for ever; your mistake shall be for ever irreparable.

5. The physician, then, conceals from the sick man his danger; his relatives do what is still worse—they deceive him by lies. They tell him that he is better, and that the physicians give strong hopes of his recovery. O treacherous relatives! O barbarous relatives, who are the worst of enemies! Instead of warning the sick man of his danger (as is their duty, particularly if they are parents, children, or brothers), that he may settle the accounts of his soul, they flatter him, they deceive him, and cause him to die in the state of damnation. But, from the pains, oppression, and restlessness which he feels, from the studied silence of friends who visit him, and from the tears which he sees in the eyes of his relatives, the poor invalid perceives that his disease is mortal. Alas! he says, the hour of death is come; but, through fear of giving me annoyance, they do not warn me of it.

6. No; his relatives do not let him know that he is in danger of death; but because they attend to their own interest, about which they are more solicitous than they are about anything else, they bring in a scrivener, in the hope that the dying man will leave them a large portion of his property. The scrivener arrives. Who is this? asks the sick man. The relatives answer: He is a scrivener. Perhaps, for your own satisfaction, you would like to make your will. Then is my sickness mortal? Am I near my end? No, father, or brother, they say: we know that there is no necessity for making a will; but you must one day make it, and it would be better to do it now, while you have the full use of all your faculties. Very well, he replies; since the scrivener is come, and since you wish me to do it, I will make my last will. The scrivener first asks the sick man in what church he wishes to be buried, in case he should die. Oh! what a painful question! After choosing the place of his interment, he begins to dispose of all his goods. I bequeath such an estate or farm to my children; such a house to my brother; such a sum of money to a friend; and such an article of furniture to an acquaintance. O miserable man, what have you done? You have submitted to so much fatigue, you have burthened your conscience with so many sins, in order to acquire these goods; and now you leave them for ever, and bequeath them to such and such persons. But there is no remedy; when death comes we must leave all things. This separation from all worldly possessions is very painful to the sick man, whose heart was attached to his property, his house, his garden, his money, and his amusements. Death comes, gives the stroke, and separates the heart from all the objects of its love. This stroke tortures the sick man with excruciating pain. Ah, brethren! let us detach our hearts from the things of this world before death separates us from them with so much pain, and with such great danger to our salvation.

SECOND POINT. WHAT HAPPENS AT THE TIME IN WHICH THE SACRAMENTS ARE RECEIVED.

7. Behold! the dying man has made his will. After the eighth or tenth day of his illness, seeing that he is daily growing worse, and that he is near his end, one of his relatives asks: "When shall we send for his confessor? He has been a man of the world. We know that he has not been a saint." They all agree that the confessor should be sent for; but all refuse to speak to the sick man on the subject. Hence they send for the parish priest, or for some other confessor, to make known to the dying man his danger, and the necessity of receiving the last sacraments. But this is done only when he has nearly lost the use of his faculties. The confessor comes; he inquires from the family about the state of the sick man, and the sort of life which he led. He finds that he has been careless about the duties of religion, and, from the circumstances which he hears, he trembles for the salvation of the poor soul. Understanding that the dying man has but a short time to live, the confessor, first of all, orders the relatives to leave the room, and to return to it no more. He then approaches and salutes the sick man. The latter asks: Who are you? I am, replies the confessor, the parish priest, Father Such-a-one. Do you wish me to do anything for you? Having heard that you had a severe attack of illness, I have come to reconcile you with your Creator. Father, I am obliged to you; but I beg of you for the present to let me take a little rest; for I have got no sleep for several nights, and I am scarcely able to speak. Recommend me to God.

8. Knowing the dangerous state of the soul and body of the sick man, the confessor says: We hope that the Lord and the most holy Virgin will deliver you from this illness; but, sooner or later, you must die. Your illness is very severe. You would do well to make your confession, and to adjust the affairs of your soul. Perhaps you have scruples of conscience. I have come on purpose to calm the troubles of your mind. Father, I should have to make a long confession; for my conscience is perplexed and burdened with sin. At present I am not able to do it. I feel a lightness in my head, and I can scarcely breathe. Father, we will see about it to-morrow, at present I am not able. But who knows what may happen? Some attack may come on, which will not leave you time to make your confession. Father, do not torment me any longer. I have said that I am not able; it is impossible for me to do it. But the confessor, who knows that there is no hope of recovery, feels himself obliged to speak more plainly, and says: I think it is my duty to inform you that your life is about to close. I entreat you to make your confession: for, perhaps, to-morrow you shall be dead. Why, father, do you say so? Because, replies the confessor, so the physicians have said. The poor dying man then begins to rage against the physicians, and against his friends. Ah! the traitors have deceived me. They knew my danger, and have not informed me of it. Ah! unhappy me! The confessor rejoins, and says: Be not alarmed at the difficulties of making your confession: it is enough to mention the most grievous sins which you remember. I will assist you. Be not afraid. Begin at once to tell your sins. The dying man forces himself to commence his confession; but his mind is all confusion; he knows not where to begin; he tries to tell his sins, but is not able to explain himself. He feels but little, and understands still less, what the confessor says to him. O God! At such a time, and in such a state, worldlings are obliged to attend to the most important of all affairs—the affair of eternal salvation! The confessor hears, perhaps, many sins, bad habits, injuries done to the property and character of others, confessions made with little sorrow and with little purpose of amendment. He assists the dying man as well as he can, and, after a short exhortation, tells him to make an act of contrition. But, God grant that he may not be as insensible to sorrow as the sick man who was attended by Cardinal Bellarmine. When the Cardinal exhorted him to make an act of contrition, he said: Father, do not trouble yourself; these things are too high for me; I do not understand them. In the end, the confessor absolves the dying man; but who knows if God absolves him?

9. After giving him absolution, the confessor says: Prepare yourself, now, to receive Jesus Christ for your viaticum. It is now, replies the sick man, four or five hours after night; I will communicate in the morning. No: perhaps in the morning time shall be no more for you; you must at present receive the viaticum and extreme unction. Ah, unhappy me! the dying man says; am I then at the point of death? He has reason to say so; for the practice of some physicians is, to put off the viaticum till the patient is near his last, and till he has lost, or nearly lost, his senses. This is a common delusion. According to the common opinion of theologians, the viaticum ought always to be administered when there is danger of death. It would be useful here to observe, that Benedict the Fourteenth, in his fifty-third Bull (in Euchol. Græc., §. 46, ap. Bullar, tom. 4), says, that extreme unction may be given whenever the sick man "labours under a grievous illness." Hence, whenever the sick can receive the viaticum, they can also receive the sacrament of extreme unction. It is not necessary to wait, as some physicians recommend, till they are near the agony, or till they lose their senses.

10. Behold! the viaticum arrives, the sick man hears the bell. Oh! how he trembles! The trembling and terror increase when he sees the priest coming into the room with the holy sacrament, and when he beholds around his bed the torches of those who assisted at the procession. The priest recites the words of the ritual: "Accipe frater viaticum corporis Domini nostri Jesu Christi qui te custodiat ab hoste maligno, et perducat in vitam æternum. Amen." Brother, receive the viaticum of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he may preserve you from the wicked enemy, and that he may bring you to eternal life. He receives the consecrated host upon his tongue: the priest then gives him a little water to enable him to swallow it; for his throat is dry and parched.

11. The priest afterwards gives the extreme unction; and begins by anointing the eyes while he says the following words: "Per istam sanctam unctionem, et suam piissimam misericordiam, indulgeat tibi Deus, quidquid per visum deliquisti." He then anoints the other senses—the ears, the nostrils, the mouth, the hands, the feet, and the loins, saying: "Quidquid per aditum deliquisti per odoratum, per gustum et locutionem, per tactum, per gressum, et lumborum delectationem." And, during the administration of the extreme unction, the devil is employed in reminding the sick man of all the sins he committed by the senses—by the eyes, the ears, the tongue, the hands; and says to him: After so many sins can you expect to be saved? Oh! what terror is then caused by every one of those mortal sins, which are now called human frailties, and which, worldlings say, God will not punish! Now they are disregarded; but then every mortal sin shall be a sword that will pierce the soul with terror. But let us come to what happens at death.

THIRD POINT. WHAT HAPPENS AT THE TIME OF DEATH.

12. After having administered the sacraments the priest departs, and leaves the dying man alone. He feels more terror and alarm after the sacraments than before he received them; for he knows that his entire preparation for them was made in the midst of great confusion of mind and great uneasiness of conscience. But the signs of approaching death appear: the sick man falls into a cold sweat; the sight grows dim, and he no longer knows the persons that attend him: he has lost his speech, and can scarcely breathe. In the midst of this darkness of death he continues to say: "Oh! that I had time, that I had another day, with the use of my faculties, to make a good confession!" For, the unhappy man has great doubts about the confession which he has made: he feels that he was not able to excite himself to make a true act of sorrow. But, what time? what day? "Time shall be no longer." (Apoc. 10:6.) The confessor has the book open to announce to him his departure from this world. "Profiscere, anima Christiana, de hoc mundo." Depart, Christian soul, from this world. The dying man continues to say within himself: "O lost years of my life! O fool that I have been!" But when does he say this? When the scene is about to close for him; when the oil in the lamp is just consumed; and when the great moment has arrived on which his eternal happiness or misery depends.

13. But behold! his eyes are petrified; his body takes the posture of a corpse; the extremities, the hands and feet, have become cold. The agony commences; the priest begins to recite the prayers for the recommendation of a departing soul. After having read the recommendation, he feels the pulse of the dying man, and feels that it has ceased to beat. Light, he says, immediately the blessed candle. O candle! O candle! show us light, now that we have health; for, at the hour of death, thy light shall serve only to terrify us the more. But already the breathing of the sick man is not so frequent; it has begun to fail. This is a sign that death is very near. The assisting priest raises his voice, and says to the poor man in his agony: Say after me: O God, come to my aid; have mercy on me. My crucified Jesus, save me through thy passion. Mother of God, intercede for me. St. Joseph, St. Michael, the archangel, my holy angel-guardian, and all ye saints in Paradise, pray to God for me. Jesus, Jesus, Jesus and Mary, I give you my heart and my soul. But behold the last signs of death; the phlegm is confined in the throat; the dying man sends forth feeble moans; the tears rush from his eyes; finally he twists the mouth, he distorts the eyes, he makes a few pauses, and at the last opening of the mouth, he expires and dies.

14. The priest then brings a candle to the mouth of the dead man, to try if he be still alive: he sees that the flame is not moved, and thence infers that life is extinct. He says: Requiescat in pace. May he rest in peace. And turning to the bystanders, announces that he is dead. "I hope," he adds, "he is gone to heaven." He is dead, and how has he died? No one knows whether he is saved or damned; but he has died in a great tempest. Such is the death of those unfortunate men who, during life, have cared little about God. "Their souls shall die in a storm." (Job 36:14.) Of every one that dies it is usual to say that "he is gone to heaven." He is gone to heaven if he deserved heaven; but, if he merited hell, he has gone to hell. Do all go to heaven? Oh! how few enter into that abode of bliss!

15. Before the body is cold he is covered with a worn out garment; because it must soon rot with him in the grave. Two lighted candles are placed in the chamber; the curtain of the bed on which the dead man lies is let down, and he is left alone. The parish priest is sent for, and requested to come in the morning and take away the corpse. The priest comes; the deceased is carried to the church; and this is his last journey on this earth. The priests begin to sing the "De profundis clamavi ad te Domine," etc. The spectators, who look at the funeral as it passes, speak of the deceased. One says: "He was a proud man." Another: "Oh! that he had died ten years ago!" A third: "He was fortunate in the world; he made a great deal of money! he had a fine house, but now he takes nothing with him." And while they speak of him in this manner he is burning in hell. He arrives at the church, and is placed in the middle, surrounded by six candles. The bystanders look at him, but suddenly turn away their eyes, because his appearance excites horror. The Mass is sung for his repose, and after Mass, the "Libera;" and the function is concluded with these words: Requiescat in pace—May he rest in peace. May he rest in peace, if he died in peace with God; but, if he has died in enmity with God, what peace—what peace can he enjoy? He shall have no peace as long as God shall be God. The sepulchre is then opened, the corpse is thrown into it; the grave is covered with a tombstone; and he is left there to rot and to be the food of worms. It is thus that the scene of this world ends for each of us. His relatives put on mourning; but they first divide among themselves the property which he has left. They shed an occasional tear for two or three days, and afterwards forget him. And what shall become of him? If he be saved, he shall be happy for ever; if damned, he must be miserable for eternity.

Sermon XLV

SIXTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON IMPURITY

"And behold, there was a certain man before him, who had the dropsy."—LUKE 14:2.

THE man who indulges in impurity is like a person labouring under the dropsy. The latter is so much tormented by thirst, that the more he drinks the more thirsty he becomes. Such, too, is the nature of the accursed vice of impurity; it is never satiated. "As," says St. Thomas of Villanova, "the more the dropsical man abounds in moisture, the more he thirsts; so, too, is it with the waves of eternal pleasures." I will speak to-day of the vice of impurity, and will show, in the first point, the delusion of those who say that this vice is but a small evil; and, in the second, the delusion of those who say, that God takes pity on this sin, and that he does not punish it.

FIRST POINT. DELUSION OF THOSE WHO SAY THAT SINS AGAINST PURITY ARE NOT A GREAT EVIL.

1. The unchaste, then, say that sins contrary to purity are but a small evil. Like "the sow wallowing in the mire" ("Sus lota in volutabro luti"—2 Pet. 2:22), they are immersed in their own filth, so that they do not see the malice of their actions; and therefore they neither feel nor abhor the stench of their impurities, which excite disgust and horror in all others. Can you, who say that the vice of impurity is but a small evil—can you, I ask, deny that it is a mortal sin? If you deny it, you are a heretic; for as St. Paul says: "Do not err. Neither fornicators, nor adulterers, nor the effeminate, etc., shall possess the kingdom of God." (1 Cor. 6:9.) It is a mortal sin; it cannot be a small evil. It is more sinful than theft, or detraction, or the violation of the fast. How then can you say that it is not a great evil? Perhaps mortal sin appears to you to be a small evil? Is it a small evil to despise the grace of God, to turn your back upon him, and to lose his friendship, for a transitory, beastly pleasure?

2. St. Thomas teaches, that mortal sin, because it is an insult offered to an infinite God, contains a certain infinitude of malice. "A sin committed against God has a certain infinitude, on account of the infinitude of the Divine Majesty." (S. Thom., 3 p., q. 1, art. 2, ad. 2.) Is mortal sin a small evil? It is so great an evil, that if all the angels and all the saints, the apostles, martyrs, and even the Mother of God, offered all their merits to atone for a single mortal sin, the oblation would not be sufficient. No; for that atonement or satisfaction would be finite; but the debt contracted by mortal sin is infinite, on account of the infinite Majesty of God which has been offended. The hatred which God bears to sins against purity is great beyond measure. If a lady find her plate soiled she is disgusted, and cannot eat. Now, with what disgust and indignation must God, who is purity itself, behold the filthy impurities by which his law is violated? He loves purity with an infinite love; and consequently he has an infinite hatred for the sensuality which the lewd, voluptuous man calls a small evil. Even the devils who held a high rank in heaven before their fall disdain to tempt men to sins of the flesh.

3. St. Thomas says (lib. 5, de Erud. Princ., c. li.), that Lucifer, who is supposed to have been the devil that tempted Jesus Christ in the desert, tempted him to commit other sins, but scorned to tempt him to offend against chastity. Is this sin a small evil? Is it, then, a small evil to see a man endowed with a rational soul, and enriched with so many divine graces, bring himself by the sin of impurity to the level of a brute? "Fornication and pleasure," says St. Jerome, "pervert the understanding, and change men into beasts." (In Oseam., c. iv.) In the voluptuous and unchaste are literally verified the words of David: "And man, when he was in honour, did not understand: he is compared to senseless beasts, and is become like to them." (Ps. 48:13.) St. Jerome says, that there is nothing more vile or degrading than to allow oneself to be conquered by the flesh. "Nihil vilius quam vinci a carne." Is it a small evil to forget God, and to banish him from the soul, for the sake of giving the body a vile satisfaction, of which, when it is over, you feel ashamed? Of this the Lord complains by the Prophet Ezechiel: "Thus saith the Lord God: Because thou hast forgotten me, and has cast me off behind thy back" (23:35.) St. Thomas says, that by every vice, but particularly by the vice of impurity, men are removed far from God. "Per luxuriant maxime recedit a Deo." (In Job cap. 31.)

4. Moreover, sins of impurity, on account of their great number, are an immense evil. A blasphemer does not always blaspheme, but only when he is drunk or provoked to anger. The assassin, whose trade is to murder others, does not, at the most, commit more than eight or ten homicides. But the unchaste are guilty of an unceasing torrent of sins, by thoughts, by words, by looks, by complacencies, and by touches; so that, when they go to confession they find it impossible to tell the number of the sins they have committed against purity. Even in their sleep the devil represents to them obscene objects, that, on awakening, they may take delight in them; and because they are made the slaves of the enemy, they obey and consent to his suggestions; for it is easy to contract a habit of this sin. To other sins, such as blasphemy, detraction, and murder, men are not prone; but to this vice nature inclines them. Hence St. Thomas says, that there is no sinner so ready to offend God as the votary of lust is, on every occasion that occurs to him. "Nullus ad Dei contemptum promptior." The sin of impurity brings in its train the sins of defamation, of theft, hatred, and of boasting of its own filthy abominations. Besides, it ordinarily involves the malice of scandal. Other sins, such as blasphemy, perjury, and murder, excite horror in those who witness them; but this sin excites and draws others, who are flesh, to commit it, or, at least, to commit it with less horror.

5. "Totum hominem," says St. Cyprian, "agit in triumphum libidinis." (Lib. de bono pudic.) By lust the evil triumphs over the entire man, over his body and over his soul; over his memory, filling it with the remembrance of unchaste delights, in order to make him take complacency in them; over his intellect, to make him desire occasions of committing sin; over the will, by making it love its impurities as his last end, and as if there were no God. "I made," said Job, a covenant with my eyes, that I would not so much as think upon a virgin. For what part should God from above have in me?" (31:1, 2.) Job was afraid to look at a virgin, because he knew that if he consented to a bad thought God should have no part in him. According to St. Gregory, from impurity arises blindness of understanding, destruction, hatred of God, and despair of eternal life. "De luxuria cœcitas mentis præcipitatio, odium Dei, desperatio futuri sæculi gencrantur." (S. Greg., Mor., lib. 13.) St. Augustine says, though the unchaste may grow old, the vice of impurity does not grow old in them. Hence St. Thomas says, that there is no sin in which the devil delights so much as in this sin; because there is no other sin to which nature clings with so much tenacity. To the vice of impurity it adheres so firmly, that the appetite for carnal pleasures becomes insa tiable. "Diabolus dicitur gaudere maxime de peccato luxuriæ, quia est maximæ adhœrentiæ: et difficile ab eo homo eripi potest; insatiabilis est enim delectabilis appetitus." (12, qu. 73, a. 5, ad. 2.) Go now, and say that the sin of impurity is but a small evil. At the hour of death you shall not say so; every sin of that kind shall then appear to you a monster of hell. Much less shall you say so before the judgment-seat of Jesus Christ, who will tell you what the Apostle has already told you: "No fornicator, or unclean, hath inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God." (Eph. 5:5.) The man who has lived like a brnte does not deserve to sit with the angels.

6. Most beloved brethren, let us continue to pray to God to deliver us from this vice: if we do not, we shall lose our souls. The sin of impurity brings with it blindness and obstinacy. Every vice produces darkness of understanding; but impurity produces it in a greater degree than all other sins. "Fornication, and wine, and drunkenness take away the understanding." (Osee 4:11.) Wine deprives us of understanding and reason; so does impurity. Hence St. Thomas says, that the man who indulges in unchaste pleasures, does not live according to reason. "In nullo procedit secundum judicium rationis." Now, if the unchaste are deprived of light, and no longer see the evil which they do, how can they abhor it and amend their lives? The Prophet Osee says, that being blinded by their own mire, they do not even think of returning to God; because their impurities take away from them all knowledge of God. "They will not set their thought to return to their God; for the spirit of fornication is in the midst of them, and they have not known the Lord." (Osee 5:4.) Hence St. Lawrence Justinian writes, that this sin makes men forget God. "Delights of the flesh induced forgetfulness of God." And St. John Damascene teaches that "the carnal man cannot look at the light of truth." Thus, the lewd and voluptuous no longer understand what is meant by the grace of God, by judgment, hell, and eternity. "Fire hath fallen upon them, and they shall not see the sun." (Ps. 57:9.) Some of these blind miscreants go so far as to say, that fornication is not in itself sinful. They say, that it was not forbidden in the Old Law; and in support of this execrable doctrine they adduce the words of the Lord to Osee: "Go, take thee a wife of fornication, and have of her children of fornication." (Osee 1:2.) In answer I say, that God did not permit Osee to commit fornication; but wished him to take for his wife a woman who had been guilty of fornication: and the children of this marriage were called children of fornication, because the mother had been guilty of that crime. This is, according to St. Jerome, the meaning of the words of the Lord to Osee. "Idcirco," says the holy doctor, "Fornicationis appelandi sunt filii, quod sunt de meretrice generati." But fornication was always forbidden, under pain of mortal sin, in the Old, as well as in the New Law. St. Paul says: "No fornicator or unclean, hath inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." (Eph. 5:5.) Behold the impiety to which the blindness of such sinners carry them! From this blindness it arises, that though they go to the sacraments, their confessions are null for want of true contrition; for how is it possible for them to have true sorrow, when they neither know nor abhor their sins?

7. The vice of impurity also brings with it obstinacy. To conquer temptations, particularly against chastity, continual prayer is necessary. "Watch ye, and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." (Mark 14:38.) But how will the unchaste, who are always seeking to be tempted, pray to God to deliver them from temptation? They sometimes, as St. Augustine confessed of himself, even abstain from prayer, through fear of being heard and cured of the disease, which they wish to continue. "I feared," said the saint, "that you would soon hear and heal the disease of concupiscence, which I wished to be satiated, rather than extinguished." (Conf., lib. 8, cap. vii.) St. Peter calls this vice an unceasing sin. "Having eyes full of adultery and sin that ceaseth not." (2 Pet. 2:14.) Impurity is called an unceasing sin on account of the obstinacy which it induces. Some person addicted to this vice says: I always confess the sin. So much the worse; for since you always relapse into sin, these confessions serve to make you persevere in the sin. The fear of punishment is diminished by saying: I always confess the sin. If you felt that this sin certainly merits hell, you would scarcely say: I will not give it up; I do not care if I am damned. But the devil deceives you. Commit this sin, he says; for you afterwards confess it. But, to make a good confession of your sins, you must have true sorrow of the heart, and a firm purpose to sin no more. Where are this sorrow and this firm purpose of amendment, when you always return to the vomit? If you had had these dispositions, and had received sanctifying grace at your confessions, you should not have relapsed, or at least you should have abstained for a considerable time from relapsing. You have always fallen back into sin in eight or ten days, and perhaps in a shorter time, after confession. What sign is this? It is a sign that you were always in enmity with God. If a sick man instantly vomits the medicine which he takes, it is a sign that his disease is incurable.

8. St. Jerome says, that the vice of impurity, when habitual, will cease when the unhappy man who indulges in it is cast into the fire of hell. "O infernal fire, lust, whose fuel is gluttony, whose sparks are brief conversations, whose end is hell." The unchaste become like the vulture that waits to be killed by the fowler, rather than abandon the rottenness of the dead bodies on which it feeds. This is what happened to a young female, who, after having lived in the habit of sin with a young man, fell sick, and appeared to be converted. At the hour of death she asked leave of her confessor to send for the young man, in order to exhort him to change his life at the sight of her death. The confessor very imprudently gave the permission, and taught her what she should say to her accomplice in sin. But listen to what happened. As soon as she saw him, she forgot her promise to the confessor and the exhortation she was to give to the young man. And what did she do? She raised herself up, sat in bed, stretched her arms to him, and said: Friend, I have always loved you, and even now, at the end of my life, I love you: I see that, on your account, I shall go to hell: but I do not care: I am willing, for the love of you, to be damned. After these words she fell back on the bed and expired. These facts are related by Father Segneri (Christ. Istr. Rag., xxiv, n. 10.) Oh! how difficult is it for a person who has contracted a habit of this vice, to amend his life and return sincerely to God! how difficult is it for him not to terminate this habit in hell, like the unfortunate young woman of whom I have just spoken.

SECOND POINT. ILLUSION OF THOSE WHO SAY THAT GOD TAKES PITY ON THIS SIN.

9. The votaries of lust say that God takes pity on this sin; but such is not the language of St. Thomas of Villanova. He says, that in the sacred Scriptures we do not read of any sin so severely chastised as the sin of impurity. "Luxuriæ facinus præ aliis punitum legimus." (Serm. iv., Dom. 1, Quadrag.) We find in the Scriptures, that in punishment of this sin, a deluge of fire descended from heaven on four cities, and, in an instant, consumed not only the inhabitants, but even the very stones. "And the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven. And he destroyed these cities, and all things that spring from the earth." (Gen. 19:24.) St. Peter Damian relates, that a man and a woman who had sinned against impurity, were found burnt and black as a cinder.

10. Salvian writes, that it was in punishment of the sin of impurity that God sent on the earth the universal deluge, which was caused by continued rain for forty days and forty nights. In this deluge the waters rose fifteen cubits above the tops of the highest mountains; and only eight persons along with Noah were saved in the ark. The rest of the inhabitants of the earth, who were more numerous then than at present, were punished with death in chastisement of the vice of impurity. Mark the words of the Lord in speaking of this chastisement which he inflicted on that sin: "My spirit shall not remain in man for ever; because he is flesh." (Gen. 6:3.) "That is," says Liranus, "too deeply involved in carnal sins." The Lord added: "For it repenteth me that I made man." (Gen. 7:7.) The indignation of God is not like ours, which clouds the mind, and drives us into excesses: his wrath is a judgment perfectly just and tranquil, by which God punishes and repairs the disorders of sin. But to make us understand the intensity of his hatred for the sin of impurity, he represents himself as if sorry for having created man, who offended him so grievously by this vice. We, at the present day, see more severe temporal punishment inflicted on this than on any other sin. Go into the hospitals, and listen to the shrieks of so many young men, who, in punishment of their impurities, are obliged to submit to the severest treatment and to the most painful operations, and who, if they escape death, are, according to the divine threat, feeble, and subject to the most excruciating pain for the remainder of their lives. "Thou—hast cast me off behind thy back; bear thou also thy wickedness and thy fornications." (Ezec. 23:35.)

11. St. Remigius writes that, if children be excepted, the number of adults that are saved is few, on account of the sins of the flesh. "Exceptis parvulis ex adultis propter vitiam carnis pauci salvantur." (Apud S. Cypr. de bono pudic.) In conformity with this doctrine, it was revealed to a holy soul, that as pride has filled hell with devils, so impurity fills it with men. (Col., disp. ix, ex. 192.) St. Isidore assigns the reason. He says that there is no vice which so much enslaves men to the devil as impurity. "Magis per luxuriam, humanum genus subditur diabolo, quam per aliquod aliud." (S. Isid., lib. 2, c. xxxix.) Hence, St. Augustine says, that with regard to this sin, "the combat is common and the victory rare." Hence it is, that on account of this sin hell is filled with souls.

12. All that I have said on this subject has been said, not that any one present, who has been addicted to the vice of impurity, may be driven to despair, but that such persons may be cured. Let us, then, come to the remedies. These are two great remedies—prayer, and the flight of dangerous occasions. Prayer, says St. Gregory of Nyssa, is the safeguard of chastity. "Oratio pudicitiæ præsidium et tutamen est." (De Orat.) And before him, Solomon, speaking of himself, said the same. "And as I knew that I could not otherwise be continent, except God gave it . . . I went to the Lord, and besought him." (Wis. 8:21.) Thus, it is impossible for us to conquer this vice without God's assistance. Hence, as soon as temptation against chastity presents itself, the remedy is, to turn instantly to God for help, and to repeat several times the most holy names of Jesus and Mary, which have a special virtue to banish bad thoughts of that kind. I have said immediately, without listening to, or beginning to argue with the temptation. When a bad thought occurs to the mind, it is necessary to shake it off instantly, as you would a spark that flies from the fire, and instantly to invoke aid from Jesus and Mary.

13. As to the flight of dangerous occasions, St. Philip Neri used to say that cowards—that is, they who fly from the occasions—gain the victory. Hence you must, in the first place, keep a restraint on the eyes, and must abstain from looking at young females. Otherwise, says St. Thomas, you can scarcely avoid the sin. "Luxuria vitari vix protest nisi vitatur aspectus mulieris pulchræ." (S. Thom. 1, 2, qu. 167, a. 2.) Hence Job said: "I made a covenant with my eyes, that I would not so much as think upon a virgin" (31:1). He was afraid to look at a virgin; because from looks it is easy to pass to desires, and from desires to acts. St. Francis de Sales used to say, that to look at a woman does not do so much evil as to look at her a second time. If the devil has not gained a victory the first, he will gain the second time. And if it be necessary to abstain from looking at females, it is much more necessary to avoid conversation with them." "Tarry not among women." (Eccl. 42:12.) We should be persuaded that, in avoiding occasions of this sin, no caution can be too great. Hence we must be always fearful, and fly from them. "A wise man feareth and declineth from evil; a fool is confident." (Prov. 14:16.) A wise man is timid, and flies away; a fool is confident, and falls.

Sermon XLVI

SEVENTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE LOVE OF GOD

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart."—MATT. 22:37.

"BUT one thing is necessary." (Luke 10:42.) What is this one thing necessary? It is not necessary to acquire riches, nor to obtain dignities, nor to gain a great name. The only thing necessary is to love God. Whatever is not done for the love of God is lost. This is the greatest and the first commandment of the divine law. To the Pharisee who asked what is the greatest commandment of the law, Jesus Christ answered: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart. . . . This is the greatest and first commandment." (Matt. 22:37, 38.) But this, which is the greatest of the commandments, is the most despised by men: there are few who fulfil it. The greater part of men love their relatives, their friends, and even brute animals, but do not love God. Of these St. John says that they have not life—that they are dead. "He that loveth not, abideth in death." (1 John 3:14.) St. Bernard writes, that the reward of a soul is estimated by the measure of her love for God. "Quantitas animæ æstimatur de mensura charitatis quam habet." (Serm. xxvii., in Cant.) Let us consider to-day, in the first point, how dear this command of loving God with our whole heart ought to be to us; and, in the second, what we ought to do in order to love God with our whole heart.

FIRST POINT. HOW DEAR THIS COMMAND OF LOVING GOD WITH OUR WHOLE HEART OUGHT TO BE TO US.

1. What object more noble, more magnificent, more powerful, more rich, more beautiful, more bountiful, more merciful, more grateful, more amiable, or more loving, than himself, could God give us to love? Who more noble than God? Some boast of the nobility of their family for five hundred or a thousand years; but the nobility of God is eternal. He is the Lord of all. Before God all the angels in heaven or all the nobles on earth are but as a drop of water or a grain of dust. "Behold the Gentiles are as a drop of a bucket—behold the islands are as a little dust." (Isa. 40:15.) Who more powerful than God? He can do whatsoever he wills. By an act of his will he has created this world, and by another act he can destroy it when he pleases. Who more wealthy? He possesses all the riches of heaven and earth. Who more beautiful? Before the beauty of God all the beauties of creatures disappear. Who more bountiful? St. Augustine says, that God has a greater desire to do good to us than we have to receive it. Who more merciful? If the most impious sinner on earth humble himself before God, and repent of his sins, God instantly pardons and embraces him. Who more grateful? He does not leave unrewarded the smallest act we perform for his sake. Who more amiable? God is so amiable that, by barely seeing and loving him in heaven, the saints feel a joy which makes them perfectly happy and content for all eternity. The greatest of the torments of the damned arise from knowing that this God is so amiable, and that they cannot love him.

2. Finally, who more loving than God? In the Old Law, men might doubt whether God loved them with a tender love; but, after seeing him die on a cross for us, how can we doubt of the tenderness and the ardent affection with which he loves us? Let us raise our eyes and look at Jesus, the true Son of God, fastened with nails to a gibbet, and let us consider the intensity of the love which he bears us. The cross, the wounds, says St. Bernard, cry out, and proclaim to us that he truly loves us. "Clamat crux, clamat vulnus, quod ipse vere dilexit." And what more could he do to convince us of his great love than to lead a life of sorrow for thirty-three years, and afterwards die in torments on the infamous tree of the cross, in order to wash away our sins with his own blood? "Christ also hath loved us, and hath delivered himself up for us." (Eph. 5:2.) "Who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." (Apoc. 1:5.) "How," says St. Philip Neri, "is it possible for him who believes in God to love anything but God?" Contemplating God's love towards men, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi began one day to ring the bell, saying that she wished to invite all the nations of the earth to love so loving a God. St. Francis de Sales used to say with tears: "To love our God it would be necessary to have an infinite love; and we throw away our love on vain, contemptible things."

3. O! inestimable value of divine love, which makes us rich before God! It is the treasure by which we gain his friendship. "She is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God." (Wis. 7:14.) The only thing we ought to fear, says St. Gregory of Nyssa (de Vita Moysis), is the loss of God's friendship; and the only object of our desires should be its attainment. "Unum terribile, arbitror, ab amicitia Dei repelli: unum solum expectibile, amicitia Dei." It is love that obtains the friendship of God. Hence, according to St. Lawrence Justinian, by love the poor become rich, and without love the rich are poor. "No greater riches than to have charity. In charity the poor man is rich, and without charity the rich man is poor." (S. Laur. Just. in Matt. 13:44.) How great is the joy which a person feels in thinking that he is loved by a man of exalted rank! But how much greater must be the consolation which a soul derives from the conviction that God loves her! "I love them that love me." (Prov. 8:17.) In a soul that loves God the Three Persons of the Adorable Trinity dwell. "If any one love me he will keep my word; and my Father will love him; and we will come to him, and will make our abode with him." (John 14:23.) St. Bernard writes, that among all the virtues charity is the one that unites us to God. Charitas est virtus conjungens nos Deo." St. Catherine of Bologna used to say, that love is the golden chain that binds the soul to God. St. Augustine says, that "love is a joint connecting the lover with the beloved." Hence, were God not immense, where should he be found? Find a soul that loves God, and there God is certainly found. Of this St. John assures us. "He that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him." (1 John 4:16.) A poor man loves riches, but he does not therefore enjoy them; he may love a throne, but he does not therefore possess a kingdom. But the man that loves God possesses God. "He abideth in God, and God in him."

4. Besides, St. Thomas says (Tr. de Virt., art. 3), that love draws in its train all other virtues, and directs them all to unite us more closely to God. Hence, because from charity all virtues are born, St. Lawrence Justinian called it the mother of virtues. Hence, St. Augustine used to say: "Love, and do what you wish." He that loves God can only do what is good; if he does evil, he shows that he has ceased to love God. And when he ceases to love him, all things can profit him nothing. If, said the Apostle, I give all my possessions to the poor, and my body to the flames, and have not charity, I am nothing. "And if I should distribute all my goods to feed the poor, and if I should deliver my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." (1 Cor. 13:3.)

5. Love also prevents us from feeling the pains of this life. St. Bonaventure says, that the love of God is like honey; it sweetens things the most bitter. And what more sweet to a soul that loves God than to suffer for him? She knows that by cheerfully embracing sufferings she pleases God, and that her pains shall be the brightest jewels in her crown in Paradise. And who is there that will not willingly suffer and die in imitation of Jesus Christ, who has gone before us, carrying his cross, to offer himself in sacrifice for the love of us, and inviting us to follow his example? "If any man will come after me, let him take up his cross and follow me." (Matt. 16:24.) For this purpose he has condescended to humble himself to death, and to the opprobrious death of the cross, for the love of us. "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even to the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:8.)

SECOND POINT. WHAT WE OUGHT TO DO IN ORDER TO LOVE GOD WITH OUR WHOLE HEART.

6. St. Teresa used to say, that in calling a soul to his love, God bestows upon her an exceedingly great favour. Since, then, most beloved brethren, God calls us all to his love, let us thank and love him with our whole heart. Because he loves us intensely, he wishes to be tenderly loved by us. "When," says St. Bernard, "God loves, he desires nothing else than to be loved; for he loves only that he may be loved." (Serm. 63, in Cant.) It was to inflame us with his divine love that the Eternal Word descended from heaven. So he himself has declared; adding, that he only desires to see this fire lighted up in our hearts. "I am come to cast fire on the earth, and what will I but that it be kindled?" (Luke 12:49.) Let us now see what means we ought to adopt in order to love God.

7. In the first place, we ought to guard against every sin, whether mortal or venial. "If," says Jesus Christ, "any one love me, he will keep my word." (John 14:23.) The first mark of love is to endeavour not to give the smallest displeasure to the beloved. How can he be said to love God with his whole heart, who is not afraid to commit deliberate venial offences against God? St. Teresa used to say to her spiritual children: "From deliberate sin, however small, may God deliver you." But some will say: Venial sin is a small evil. Is it a small evil to displease a God who is so good, and who loves us so tenderly?

8. In the second place, to love God with the whole heart, it is necessary to have a great desire to love him. Holy desires are the wings with which we fly to God; for, as St. Lawrence Justinian says, a good desire gives us strength to go forward, and lightens the labour of walking in the way of God. "Vires subministrat, pœnam exhibet leviorem." According to the spiritual masters, he that does not advance in the way of the Lord goes back; but, on the other hand, God cheerfully gives himself to those who seek after him. "The Lord is good to the soul that seeketh him." (Lamen. 3:25.) He fills with his own good things all who desire him through love. "He hath filled the hungry with good things." (Luke 1:53.)

9. In the third place, it is necessary to resolve courageously, to arrive at the perfect love of God. Some persons desire to belong entirely to God, but do not resolve to adopt the means. It is of them the Wise Man says, "Desires kill the soul." (Prov. 21:25.) I would wish, they say, to become a saint; but still, with all their desires, they never advance a single step. St. Teresa used to say, that "of these irresolute souls the devil is never afraid." Because, if they do not resolve sincerely to give themselves to God without reserve, they shall always continue in the same imperfections. But, on the other hand, the saint says, that God wishes only from us a true resolution to become saints; he himself will do the rest. If, then, we wish to love God with our whole heart, we must resolve to do without reserve what is most pleasing to him, and to begin at once to put our hands to the work. "Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it earnestly." (Eccl. 9:10.) What you can do to-day do not put off till to-morrow; do it as soon as possible. A certain nun in the convent of Tori degli Speechi, in Rome, led a tepid life; but, being called by God, in a retreat, to his perfect love, she resolved to correspond immediately to the divine call, and said to her director, with a sincere resolution: "Father, I wish to become a saint, and to become one immediately." And from that moment, with the aid of God's grace, she lived and died a saint. We must, then, resolve to acquire the perfect love of God, and must immediately adopt the means of becoming saints.

10. The first means is, to detach the heart from all creatures, and to banish from the soul every affection which is not for God. The first question which the ancient fathers of the desert put to every one who sought admission into their society was: "Do you bring an empty heart, that the Holy Ghost may be able to fill it?" If the world be not expelled from the heart, God cannot enter it. St. Teresa used to say: "Detach the heart from creatures; seek God, and you shall find him." St. Augustine writes, that the Romans worshipped thirty thousand gods; but, among these gods the Roman Senate refused to admit Jesus Christ. Because, said they, he is a proud God, who requires that he alone should be adored. This they had reason to say; for our God wishes to possess our whole souls. He is, as St. Jerome says, a jealous God. "Zelotypus est Jesus." And therefore he will have no rival in the affections of our heart. Hence, the Spouse in the Canticles is called "an enclosed garden." "My sister, my spouse is an enclosed garden." (Cant. 4:12.) The soul, then, that wishes to belong entirely to God, must be shut against all love which is not for God.

11. Hence the Divine Spouse is said to be wounded by one of the eyes of his eyes. "Thou hast wounded my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast wounded my heart with one of thy eyes." (Cant. 4:9.) One of her eyes signifies, that in all her thoughts and actions the only end of the spouse is to please God; while, in their devout exercises, worldlings propose to themselves different objects—sometimes their own interest, sometimes to please their friends, and sometimes to please themselves. But the saints seek only to please God, to whom, they turn, and say: "What have I in heaven? and, besides thee, what do I desire upon earth? . . . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion for ever." (Ps. 72:25, 26.) We should do the same if we wished to be saints. If, says St. Chrysostom, we do some things pleasing to God, what else but his pleasure do we seek? "Si dignus fueris agere aliquid, quod Deo placet, aliam præter id mercedem requiris?" (Lib. 2, de Compunct. Cord.) What greater reward can a creature obtain than to please its Creator? Hence, in all we desire or do, we should seek nothing but God. A certain solitary, called Zeno, walking through the desert, absorbed in thought, met the Emperor Macedonius going to hunt. The emperor asked him what he was doing. In answer, the solitary said: You go in quest of animals, and I seek God alone. St. Francis de Sales used to say, that the pure love of God consumes all that is not God.

12. Moreover, to love God with our whole heart, it is necessary to love him without reserve. Hence we must love him with a love of preference. We must prefer him before every other good, and must be resolved to lose a thousand lives, rather than forfeit his friendship. We must say with St. Paul: "Neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God." (Rom. 8:38, 39.) We must also love him with a love of benevolence, desiring to see him loved by all: and therefore, if we love God, we should seek as much as possible to kindle in others the fire of his love, or, at least, should pray for the conversion of all who do not love him. We must love him with a love of sorrow, regretting every offence offered to him more than every evil which we could suffer. We must love him with a love of conformity to the divine will. The principal office of love is to unite the will of lovers, and to make the soul say: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts 9:6.) Lord, tell me what thou dost wish from me; I desire to do it. I wish for nothing; I wish only what thou willest. Hence, we ought frequently to offer ourselves to God without reserve, that he may do with us, and with all we have, whatever he pleases. We must love God with a love of patience. This is that strong love by which true lovers are known. "Love is strong as death." (Cant. 8:6.) "There is nothing too difficult," says St. Augustine, "to be conquered by the fire of love." (Lib. de Mor. Eccl., c. xxii.) For, adds the saint, in doing what we love, labour is not felt, or, if it be felt, the very labour is loved. "In eo quod amatur, aut non laboratur, aut labor amatur.") St. Vincent of Paul used to say, that l ove is measured by the desire of the soul to suffer and be humbled, in order to please God. Let God be pleased, though it should cost us the loss of our life and of all things. To gain all, it is necessary to leave all. All for all, said Thomas a Kempis. The reason we do not become saints is, as St. Teresa says, because, as we do not give God all our affections, so he does not give us his perfect love. We must then say with the spouse in the Canticles: "My beloved to me, and I to him."

(Cant. 2:16.) My beloved has given himself entirely to me: it is but just that I give myself without reserve to him. St. John Chrysostom says, that when a soul has given herself entirely to God, she no longer cares for ignominies and sufferings; she loses the desire of all things; and not finding repose in any creature, she is always in search of her beloved; her sole concern is to find her beloved.

13. To obtain and to preserve divine love, three things are necessary: meditation, communion, and prayer. First, meditation is necessary. He who thinks but little on God, loves him but little. "In my meditation," says David, "a fire shall flame out." (Ps. 38:4.) Meditation, and particularly meditation on the passion of Jesus Christ, is the blessed furnace in which the love of God is kindled and fanned. "He brought me into the wine cellar; he set in order charity in me." (Cant. 2:4.) The souls that are introduced into this heavenly cellar, by a single glance of Jesus Christ crucified and dying for the love of us, are wounded and inebriated with holy love. For St. Paul says, that Jesus Christ died for us all, that each of us may live only to love him. "And Christ died for all, that they also may not now live to themselves, but unto him who died for them." (2 Cor. 5:15.) The communion is another holy furnace, in which we are inflamed with divine love. "The holy eucharist," says St. Chrysostom, "is a fire which inflames us, that, like lions breathing fire, we may retire from the holy table, being made terrible to the devil." (Hom. xli, ad Pop.) Above all, prayer (the prayer of petition) is necessary. It is by means of prayer that God dispenses all his favours, but particularly the great gift of divine love. To make us ask this love, meditation is a great help. Without meditation we shall ask little or nothing from God. We must, then, always, every day, and several times in the day, ask God to give us the grace to love him with our whole heart. St. Gregory says, that God wishes to be compelled and importuned by our petitions to bestow upon us his graces. "God wishes to be entreated—to be compelled: he wishes in a certain manner to be overcome by importunity." Let us, then, continually ask of Jesus Christ his holy love; and let us ask his divine mother Mary, who is the treasurer of all his graces, to obtain it for us. Thesauraria gratiarum (Idiota). She is called by St. Bernardine, the dispensatrix of God's graces. "All graces are dispensed through her hands." It is through her intercession that we must obtain the great gift of divine love.

Sermon XLVII

EIGHTEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON BAD THOUGHTS

"And Jesus seeing their thoughts, said: Why do you think evil in your hearts."—MATT. 9:4.

IN the gospel of this day it is related that a paralytic was presented to Jesus Christ that he might heal him. The Lord healed not only his body, but also his soul, and said to him: "Be of good heart, son; thy sins are forgiven thee" (verse 2). Some of the Scribes, as soon as they heard these words, said in their hearts: He blasphemeth. But our Saviour soon let them know that he saw their evil thoughts, saying: "Why do you think evil in your hearts." Let us come to the subject of this discourse. God sees the most secret evil thoughts of our hearts; he sees and punishes them. Human judges forbid and chastise only external crimes; for men only see what appears externally. "Men seeth those things that appear; but the Lord beholdeth the heart." (1 Kings 16:7.) God prohibits and punishes bad thoughts. We shall examine, in the first point, when bad thoughts are sinful; in the second, the great danger of bad thoughts when indulged; and in the third, the remedies against bad thoughts.

FIRST POINT. WHEN BAD THOUGHTS ARE SINFUL.

1. In two ways men err regarding bad thoughts. Some who have the fear of God, are scrupulous, and are afraid that every bad thought that presents itself to the mind is a sin. This is an error. It is not the bad thought, but the consent to it, that is sinful. All the malice of mortal sin consists in a bad will, in giving to a sin a perfect consent, with full advertence to the malice of the sin. Hence St. Augustine teaches, that where there is no consent there can be no sin. "Nullo modo sit peccatum, si non sit voluntarium." (De Vera Rel., cap. xiv.) Though the temptation, the rebellion of the senses, or the evil motion of the inferior parts, should be very violent, there is no sin, as long as there is no consent. "Non nocet sensus," says St. Bernard, "ubi non est consensus." (De Inter. Domo., cap. xix.)

2. Even the saints have been tormented by temptations. The devil labours harder to make the saints fall, than to make the wicked sin: he regards the saints as more valuable prey. The Prophet Habacuc says, that the saints are the dainty food of the enemy. "Through them his portion is made fat, and his meat dainty." (Hab. 1:16.) And therefore, the prophet adds, that the evil one stretches out his net for all, to deprive them of the life of grace: and that he spares no one. "For this cause, therefore, he spreadeth out his net, and will not spare continually to slay the nations." (Ibid., v. 17.) Even St. Paul, after he had been made a vessel of election, groaned under temptations against chastity. "There was," said he, "given me a sting of the flesh, an angel of Satan to afflict me." (2 Cor. 12:7.) He three times prayed to the Lord, to deliver him from these temptations; but in answer the Lord told him, that his grace was sufficient for him. "For which thing thrice I besought the Lord, that it might depart from me. And he said: My grace is sufficient for thee." (ver. 8, 9.) God permits even his servants to be tempted, as well to try their fidelity, as to purify them from their imperfections. And, for the consolation of timid and scrupulous souls, I will here state that, according to the common opinion of theologians, when a soul that fears God and hates sin is in doubt whether she gave consent to a bad thought, she is not bound, as long as she is not certain of having given consent, to confess it: for it is then morally certain that she has not consented to it. Had she really fallen into grevious sin she would have no doubt about it; for mortal sin is so horrible a monster, that it is impossible for him who fears God to admit it into the soul without his knowledge.

3. Others, who are not scrupulous, but are ignorant, and have lax consciences, think that evil thoughts, though wilfully indulged, are not mortal sins, unless the act is consummated. This is an error worse than the former. What we cannot lawfully do, we cannot lawfully desire. Hence it is, that a bad thought to which a person consents, has the same malice as the bad act. As sinful works separate us from God, so also do sinful thoughts. "Perverse thoughts separate us from God." (Wis. 1:3.) And as all bad actions are known to God, so also he sees all evil thoughts, and will condemn and punish them. "The Lord is a God of all knowledge, and to him are thoughts prepared." (1 Kings 2:3.)

4. However, all bad thoughts are not equally sinful: nor have all those that are sinful equal malice. In a bad thought we may consider three things: the suggestion, the delectation, and the consent. The suggestion is the first bad thought that is presented to the mind: this is no sin, but, when rejected is an occasion of merit. "As often," says St. Antonine, "as you resist, you are crowned." The delectation takes place when the person stops, as it were, to look at the bad thought, which by its pleasing appearance, causes delight. Unless the will consents to it, this delectation is not a mortal sin; but it is a venial sin, and, if not resisted, the soul is in danger of consenting to it: but, when this danger is not proximate, the sin is only venial. But it is necessary to remark, that, when the thought which excites the delight is against chastity, we are, according to the common opinion of theologians, bound under pain of mortal sin to give a positive resistance to the delectation caused by the thought; because, if not resisted, the delight easily obtains the consent of the will. "Unless a person repel delectations," says St. Anselm, "the delight passes to consent, and kills the soul." (S. Ans. Simil., c. xl.) Hence, though a person should not consent to the sin, if he delight in the obscene object, and do not endeavour to resist the delectation, he is guilty of a mortal sin, by exposing himself to the proximate danger of consent. "How long shall hurtful thoughts abide in thee." (Jer. 4:14.) Why, says the Prophet, do you allow hurtful thoughts to remain in the mind? Why do you not make an effort to banish them from the heart? God wishes us to watch over the heart with great care; because on the heart—that is, the will—our life depends. "With all watchfulness keep thy heart, because life issueth out from it." (Prov. 4:23.) Finally, the consent, which is the cause of mortal sin, takes place when the person clearly knows that the object is mortally sinful, and embraces it perfectly with the will.

5. A person may sin grievously by thought in two ways; by desire, and by complacency. A person sins by desire when he wishes to do the bad act which he desires, or would wish to do it if he had the opportunity: the desire is a mortal or a venial sin, according as the act which he desires to do is mortally or venially sinful. However, in practice, the commission of the external act always increases the malice of the will, either because it ordinarily increases the complacency which the will indulges, or causes it to continue for a longer time. Hence, if the act followed, it is necessary to mention it in confession. A person sins by complacency, when he does not desire to commit the sinful act, but delights in it as if he had committed it. This complacency is called morose delectation. It is called morose, not because the complacency in the thought of the unchaste acts lasts for a considerable time, but because the will dwells with delight on the thought. Hence, the sin of complacency may, as St. Thomas teaches, be committed in a moment. "Dicitur morosa," says the holy doctor, "non ex mora temporis, sed ex eo quod ratio deliberans circa eam immoratur revolvens libenter quæ statim respui debuerent." (1, 2, qu. 74, a 1 ad. 3.) He says "libenter" (wilfully) to remove scruples from persons of timorous conscience, who suffer against their will certain carnal motions and delights, although they do all in their power to banish them. Though the inferior part should feel a certain delight, as long as the will does not consent, there is no sin, at least no mortal sin. I repeat with St. Augustine, that what is not voluntary is by no means sinful. "Malum nullo modo sit peccatum, si non sit voluntarium." (De Vera Rel., c. xiv.) In temptations against chastity, the spiritual masters advise us, not so much to contend with the bad thought, as to turn the mind to some spiritual, or, at least, indifferent object. It is useful to combat other bad thoughts face to face, but not thoughts of impurity.

SECOND POINT. THE GREAT DANGER OF BAD THOUGHTS.

6. It is necessary to guard with all possible caution against all bad thoughts, which are an abomination to God. "Evil thoughts are an abomination to the Lord." (Prov. 15:26.) They are called "an abomination to the Lord," because, as the holy Council of Trent says, bad thoughts, particularly thoughts against the ninth and tenth commandments, sometimes inflict on the soul a deeper wound, and are more dangerous than external acts. "Nonnunquam animam gravius sauciant, et periculosiora sunt iis quæ in manifesto admittuntur." (Sess. 14, de Pæna, cap. v.) They are more dangerous on many accounts; first, because sins of thought are more easily committed than sins of action. The occasions of sinful acts are frequently wanting; but sins of thought are committed without the occasion. When a soul has turned her back on God, the heart is continually intent on evil, which causes delight, and thus multiplies sins without number. "All the thought of their heart was bent upon evil at all times." (Gen. 6:5.)

7. Secondly, at the hour of death sinful actions cannot be committed; but we may then be guilty of sins of thought; and he who has had a habit of consenting to bad thoughts during life, will be in danger of indulging them at death; for then the temptations of the devil are most violent, Knowing that he has but little time to gain the soul he makes great efforts to bring her into sin. "The devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time." (Apoc. 12:12.) Being in danger of death, St. Eleazar, as Surius relates, was so severely tempted with bad thoughts, that, after his recovery, he said: "Oh! how great is the power of the devils at the hour of death!" The saint conquered the temptations, because he was accustomed to reject bad thoughts. But miserable the man that has contracted the habit of committing them. Father Segneri relates that a certain sinner indulged evil thoughts during life. At death he made a sincere confession of all his sins, and was truly sorry for them; but, after death, he appeared to a person and said he was damned. He stated, that his confession was valid, and that God had pardoned all his sins: that, before death, the devil represented to him, that should he recover from his illness, it would be an act of ingratitude to forsake a certain woman who had a great affection for him. He banished the first temptation: a second came, which he also rejected; but having continued to think on it for a little, he was tempted a third time, yielded to the temptation, and thus he was lost.

THIRD POINT. ON THE REMEDIES AGAINST BAD THOUGHTS.

8. The Prophet Isaias says, that to be freed from bad thoughts, we must take away the evil of our thoughts. "Take away the evil of our devices." (Isa. 1:16.) What does he mean by taking away the evil of our devices? He means that we should take away the occasions of evil thoughts, avoid dangerous occasions, and keep at a distance from bad company. I knew a young man who was an angel; but, in consequence of a word which he heard from a bad companion he had an evil thought, and consented to it. He was of opinion that this was the only grievous sin which he committed in his whole life; for he afterwards became a religious, and, after some years, died a holy death. Thus, it is also necessary to abstain from reading books that are obscene, or otherwise bad. You must, moreover, avoid dances with females and profane comedies: at least when the dances or comedies are immodest.

9. Some young men will ask: Father, is it sinful to make love? I say: I cannot assert that of itself it is a mortal sin; but persons who do so are often in the proximate occasion of mortal sin; and experience shows that few of them are found free from grievous faults. It is useless for them to say that they neither had a bad motive nor bad thoughts. This is an illusion of the devil; in the beginning he does not suggest bad thoughts; but when, by frequent conversations together, and by frequently speaking of love, the affection of these lovers has become strong, the devil will make them blind to the danger and sinfulness of their conduct, and they shall find that, without knowing how, they have lost their souls and God by many sins of impurity and scandal. Oh! how many young persons of both sexes does the devil gain in this way! And of all those sins of scandal God will demand an account of fathers and mothers, who are bound, but neglect, to prevent these dangerous conversations. Hence, they are the cause of all these evils, and shall be severely chastised by God for them.

10. Above all, in order to avoid bad thoughts, men must abstain from looking at women, and females must be careful not to look at men. I repeat the words of Job which I have frequently quoted: "I made a covenant with my eyes, that I should not so much as think upon a virgin." (Job 31:1.) He says that he made a covenant with his eyes that he would not think. What have the eyes to do with thinking? The eyes do not think; the mind alone thinks. But he had just reason to say that he made a covenant with his eyes that he would not think on women; for St. Bernard says, that through the eyes the darts of impure love, which kills the soul, enter into the mind. "Per oculos intrat in mentem sagitta impuri amoris." Hence the Holy Ghost says: "Turn away thy face from a woman dressed up." (Eccl. 9:8.) It is always dangerous to look at young persons elegantly dressed; and to look at them purposely, and without a just cause, is, at least, a venial sin.

11. When thoughts against chastity, which often occur without any immediate occasion, present themselves, it is, as I have said, necessary to banish them at once, without beginning to argue with the temptation. The instant you perceive the thought reject it, without giving car to it, or examining what it says or represents to you. It is related in the book of the sentences of the fathers, § 4, that St. Pachomius one day saw a devil boasting that he often made a certain monk fall into sin; because, when tempted, the monk, instead of turning to God, listened to his suggestions, and began to reason with the temptations. But the saint heard another devil complaining, that he could gain nothing from the monk whom he tempted; because the monk immediately had recourse to God for help, and thus he was always victorious. This is the advice of St. Jerome: As soon as lust shall suggest evil, let us exclaim: The Lord is my helper. "Statim ut libido titillaverit sensum, erumpamus in vocem: Domine auxiliator meus." (Epist. 22, ad Eustoch.)

12. Should the temptation continue it will be very useful to make it known to your confessor. St Philip Neri used to say, that "a temptation disclosed is half conquered." In assaults of impurity, some saints have had recourse to very severe mortifications. St. Benedict rolled his naked body among thorns. St. Peter of Alcantara threw himself into a frozen pool. But I consider the best means of overcoming these temptations to be, to have recourse to God, who will certainly give us the victory. "Praising, I will call on the Lord," said David, "and I shall be saved from my enemies." (Ps. 17:4.) And when, after asking aid from God, the temptation continues, we must not cease to pray, but must multiply prayers: we must sigh and groan before the most holy sacrament in the chapel, or before a crucifix in our own room, or before some image of most holy Mary, who is the mother of purity. It is true, all our efforts are useless unless God sustains us by his own hand; but he sometimes requires these efforts on our part, that he may supply our deficiency, and secure to us the victory. In such combats with hell, it is useful in the beginning to renew our purpose never to offend God, and to forfeit life rather than lose his grace; and then, we must make repeated petitions to him, saying: Lord give me strength to resist this temptation: do not permit me to be separated from thee: deprive me of life rather than allow me to lose thee.

NINETEENTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE PAIN OF LOSS WHICH THE DAMNED SUFFER IN HELL

"Cast him into the exterior darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."—MATT. 22:13.

ACCORDING to all laws, divine and human, the punishment of crime should be proportioned to its grievousness. "According to the measure of the sin shall the measure also of the stripes be." (Deut. 25:2.) Now, the principal injury which sinners do to God by mortal sin, consists in turning their back upon their Creator and their sovereign good. St. Thomas defines mortal sin to be "a turning away from the immutable good" (p. 1, qu. 24, art. 4). Of this injury the Lord complains in the following words: "Thou hast forsaken me, saith the Lord; thou hast gone backward. (Jer. 15:6.) Since, then, the greatest guilt of the sinner consists in deliberately consenting to lose God, the loss of God shall constitute his greatest punishment in hell. "There shall be weeping." In hell there is continual weeping; but what is the object of the bitterest tears of the unhappy damned? It is the thought af having lost God through their own fault. This shall be the subject of the present discourse. Be attentive, brethren.

1. No! dearly beloved Christians! the goods of the earth are not the end for which God has placed you in the world; the end for which he has created you is the attainment of eternal life. "And the end life eternal." (Rom. 6:22.) Eternal life consists in loving God, and possessing him for eternity. Whosoever attains this end shall be for ever happy; but he who, through his own fault, does not attain it, loses God; he shall be miserable for eternity, and shall weep for ever, saying: "My end is perished." (Lamen. 3:18.)

2. The pain produced by loss is proportioned to the value of what has been lost. If a person lose a jewel—a diamond worth a hundred crowns, he feels great pain; if the diamond were worth two hundred crowns, the pain is double; if worth four hundred, the pain is still greater. Now, I ask, what is the good which a damned soul has lost? She has lost God; she has lost an infinite good. The pain, then, arising from the loss of God is an infinite pain. "The pain of the damned," says St. Thomas, "is infinite, because it is the loss of an infinite good." (1. 2, qu. 87, a. 4.) Such, too, is the doctrine of St. Bernard, who says, that the value of the loss of the damned is measured from the infinitude of God the supreme good. Hence, hell does not consist in its devouring fire, nor in its intolerable stench, nor in the unceasing shrieks and howlings of the damned, nor in the terrific sight of the devils, nor in the narrowness of that pit of torments, in which the damned are thrown one over the other: the pain which constitutes hell is the loss of God. In comparison of this pain, all the other torments of hell are trifling. The reward of God's faithful servants in heaven is, as he said to Abraham, God himself. "I am thy reward, exceeding great." (Gen. 15:1.) Hence, as God is the reward of the blessed in heaven, so the loss of God is the punishment of the damned in hell.

3. Hence, St. Bruno has truly said, that how great soever the torments which may be inflicted on the damned, they never can equal the great pain of being deprived of God. Add torments to torments, but do not deprive them of God. "Addantur tormenta tormentis, et Deo non priventur." (Serm. de Jud. Fin.) According to St. Chrysostom, a thousand hells are not equal to this pain. Speaking of the loss of God, he said: "Si mille dixeris gehennas, nihil par dices illius doloris." (Hom. xlix., ad Pop.) God is so lovely that he deserves infinite love. He is so amiable that the saints in heaven are so replenished with joy, and so absorbed in divine love, that they desire nothing but to love God, and think only of loving him with all their strength. At present, sinners, for the sake of their vile pleasures, shut their eyes, and neither know God nor the love which he deserves; but in hell they shall, in punishment of their sins, be made to know that God is an infinite good and infinitely amiable. "The Lord shall be known when he executeth judgment." (Ps. 9:17.) The sinner, drowned in sensual pleasures, scarcely knows God: he sees him only in the dark, and therefore he disregards the loss of God. But in hell he shall know God, and shall be tormented for ever by the thought of having voluntarily lost his infinite good. A certain Parisian doctor appeared after death to his bishop, and said that he was damned. His bishop asked him if he remembered the sciences in which he was so well versed in this life. He answered, that in hell the damned think only of the pain of having lost God.

4. "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." (Matt. 25:41.) "Depart from me." This command constitutes the hell of the damned. Begone from me; you shall be no longer mine, and I shall be no longer yours. "You are not my people, and I will not be yours." (Osee 1:9.) At present this punishment is, as St. Augustine says, dreaded only by the saints. "Hæe amantibus non contemnentibus pœna est." It is a punishment which affrights the soul that loves God more than all the torments of hell; but it does not terrify sinners, who are immersed in the darkness of sin. But at death they shall, for their greater chastisement, understand the infinite good which they have lost through their own fault.

5. It is necessary to know that men have been created for God, and that nature draws them to love him. In this life, the darkness of sin, and the earthly affections which reign in their hearts, stifle their natural tendency and inclination to a union with God, their sovereign good; and therefore the thought of being separated from him does not produce much pain. But when the soul leaves the body, and is freed from the senses, which keeps her in darkness, she then clearly sees that she has been created for God, and that he is the only good which can make her happy. "But," says St. Antonine, "the soul separated from the body understands that God is her sovereign good, and that she has been created for him." Hence, as soon as she is loosed from the bondage of the body, she rushes forward to embrace her supreme good: but because she is in sin, and his enemy, God will cast her off. Though driven back and chased away, she retains her invincible tendency and inclination to a union with God; and her hell shall consist in seeing herself always drawn to God, and always banished from him.

6. If a dog see a hare, what effort does he not make to break his chain and seize his prey! Thus, at her separation from the body, the natural inclinations of the soul draw her to God, while at the same time sin separates her from him, and drags her with it into hell. Sin, says the prophet, like a wall of immense thickness, is placed between the soul and God, and separates her from him. "But your iniquities have divided between you and your God." (Isa. 59:2.) Hence, the unhappy soul, confined in the prison of hell, at a distance from God, shall weep for ever, saying: Then, O my God, I shall be no longer thine, and thou wilt be no longer mine. I shall love thee no more, and thou will never again love me. This separation from God terrified David, when he said: "Will God, then, cast off for ever? or will he never be more favourable again?" (Ps. 76:8.) How great, he says, would be my misery if God should cast me from him, and never again be merciful to me! But this misery every damned soul in hell suffers, and shall suffer for eternity. As long as he remained in sin, David felt his conscience roproaching him, and asking, "Where is thy God?" O David, where is thy God, who once loved thee? Thou hast lost him; he is no longer thine. David was so afflicted at the loss of his God that he wept night and day. "My tears have been my bread day and night, whilst it has been said to me daily: Where is thy God?" (Ps. 41:4.) Thus, even the devils will say to the damned: Where is your God? By his tears David appeased and recovered his God; but the damned shall shed an immense sea of tears, and shall never appease nor recover their God.

7. St. Augustine says, that if the damned saw the beauty of God, "they should feel no pain, and hell itself would be converted into a Paradise." (Lib. de Trip. Hab.) But the damned shall never see God. When David forbade his son Absalom to appear in his presence, the sorrow of Absalom was so great, that he entreated Joab to tell his father that he would rather be put to death than never more be permitted to see his face. "I beseech thee, therefore, that I may see the face of the king; and if he be mindful of my iniquity, let him kill me." (2 Kings 14:32.) To a certain grandee, who acted irreverently in the church, Philip the Second said: "Do not dare ever to appear again in my presence." So intense was the pain which the nobleman felt, that after having returned home, he died of grief. What then must be the feelings of the reprobate at the hour of death, when God shall say to them: Begone; let me never see you again: you shall never more see my face! "I will hide my face from them; all evils and afflictions shall find them." (Deut. 31:17.) What sentiments of pity should we feel at seeing a son who was always united with his father, who always eat and slept with him, weeping over a parent whom he loved so tenderly, and saying: My father, I have lost you; I shall never see you more. Ah! if we saw a damned soul weeping bitterly, and asked her the cause of her wailing, she would answer: I weep because I have lost God, and shall never see him again.

8. The pain of the reprobate shall be increased by the knowledge of the glory which the saints enjoy in Paradise, and from which they see, and shall for ever see, themselves excluded. How great would be the pain which a person should feel if, after being invited by his sovereign to his own theatre, to be present at the singing, dancing, and other amusements, he should be excluded in punishment of some fault! How bitter should be his anger and disappointment when, from without, he should hear the shouts of joy and applause within! At present sinners despise heaven, and lose it for trifles, after Jesus Christ shed the last drop of his blood to make them worthy of entering into that happy kingdom. But when they shall be confined in hell, the knowledge of the glory of heaven shall be the greatest of all their torments. St. John Chrysostom says, that to see themselves banished from that land of joy, shall be to the damned a torment ten thousand times as great as the hell which they suffer. "Decem mille quis ponat gehennas, nihil tale dicet quale est a beata gloria excidere." (S. Joan. Chry. ap. S. Thom. Suppl., qu. 98, art. 9.) Oh! that I had at least the hope, the damned will say, that after a thousand, or even a million of ages, I could recover the divine grace, and become worthy of entering into heaven, there to see God! But, no! he shall be told, "When the wicked man is dead, there shall be no hope any more." (Prov. 11:7.) When he was in this life he could have saved his soul; but because he has died in sin his loss is irreparable. Hence, with tears of despair, he shall say: "I shall not see the Lord God in the land of the living." (Isa. 38:11.)

9. The thought of having lost God and Paradise, solely through their own fault, shall increase the torture of the damned. Every damned soul shall say: It was in my power to have led a life of happiness on earth by loving God, and to have acquired boundless happiness for eternity; but, in consequence of having loved my vices, I must remain in this place of torments as long as God shall be God. She will then exclaim in the words of Job: "Who will grant me that I might be according to the months past, according to the days in which God kept me?" (Job 39:2.) Oh! that I were allowed to go back to the time I lived on earth, when God watched over me, that I might not fall into this fire! I did not live among the savages, the Indians, or the Chinese. I was not left without the sacraments, sermons, or masters to instruct me. I was born in the bosom of the true Church, and have been well instructed and frequently admonished by preachers and confessors. To this prison I have not been dragged by the devils; I have come of my own accord. The chains by which I am bound and kept at a distance from God, I have forged with my own will. How often has God spoken to my heart, and said to me: Amend, and return to me. Beware, lest the time should come when thou shalt not be able to prevent thy destruction. Alas! this time has come; the sentence has been already passed; I am damned; and for my damnation there neither is, nor shall be, any remedy for all eternity. But if the damned soul has lost God, and shall never see him, perhaps she can at least love him? No; she has been abandoned by grace, and thus she is made the slave of her sins, and compelled to hate him. The damned see that God is their adversary on account of their contempt for him during life, and are therefore always in despair. "Why hast thou set me opposite to thee, and I am become burthensome to myself." (Job 7:20.) Hence, because the damned see that they are enemies of God, whom they at the same time know to be worthy of infinite love, they are to themselves objects of the greatest horror. The greatest of all the punishments which God shall inflict on them, will consist in seeing that God is so amiable, and that they are so deformed, and the enemies of this God. "I will set before thy face." (Ps. 49:21.)

10. The sight of all that God has done for the damned shall above all increase their torture. "The wicked shall see and shall be angry." (Ps. 111:10.) They shall see all the benefits which God bestowed upon them—all the lights and calls which he gave them—and the patience with which he waited for them. They shall, above all, see how much Jesus Christ has loved them, and how much he has suffered for the love of them; and after all his love and all his sufferings, they shall see that they are now objects of his hatred, and shall be no longer objects of his love. According to St. Chrysostom, a thousand hells are nothing compared with the thought of being hateful to Christ. "Si mille quis ponat, gehennas, nihil tale dicturus est, quale est exosum esse Christo." (Hom xiv. in Matt.) Then the damned shall say: My Redeemer, who, through compassion for me, sweated blood, suffered an agony in the garden, and died on the cross bereft of all consolation, has now no pity on me! I weep, I cry out; but he no longer hears or looks to me! He is utterly forgetful of me. He once loved me; but now he hates and justly hates me; for I have ungratefully refused to love him. David says, that the reprobate are thrown into the pit of death. "Thou shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction." (Ps. 54:24.) Hence St. Augustine has said: "The pit shall be closed on top, it shall be opened at the bottom, it shall be expanded downwards; and they who refuse to know God shall be no longer known by him." "Puteus claudetur sursum, aperietur deorsum, dilatatibur in profundum: et ultra nescientur a Deo qui Deum scire noluerunt." (Hom. xvi., cap 50.)

11. Thus the damned see that God deserves infinite love, and that they cannot love him. St. Catherine of Genoa being one day assailed by the devil, asked him who he was. He answered with tears: I am that wicked one who is deprived of the love of God. I am that miserable being that can never more love God. They not only cannot love God, but, abandoned in their sins, they are forced to hate him: their hell consists in hating God, whom they at the same time know to be infinitely amiable. They love him intensely as their sovereign good, and hate him as the avenger of their sins. "Res miserrima," says a learned author, "amare vehementer, et amatum simul odisse." (Magnotius Medit.) Their natural love draws them continually to God; but their hatred drags them away from him. These two contrary passions, like two ferocious wild beasts, incessantly tear in pieces the hearts of the damned, and cause, and shall for all eternity cause, them to live in a continual death. The reprobate then shall hate and curse all the benefits which God has bestowed upon them. They shall hate the benefits of creation, redemption, and the sacraments. But they shall hate in a particular manner the sacrament of baptism, by which they have, on account of their sins, been made more guilty in the sight of God; the sacrament of penance, by which, if they wished, they could have so easily saved their souls; and, above all, the most holy sacrament of the altar, in which God had given himself entirely to them. They shall consequently hate all the other means which have been helps to their salvation. Hence, they shall hate and curse all the angels and saints. But they shall curse particularly their guardian angels—their special advocates—and, above all, the divine mother Mary. They shall curse the three divine persons—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; but particularly Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Word, who suffered so much, and died for their salvation. They shall curse the wounds of Jesus Christ, the blood of Jesus Christ, and the death of Jesus Christ. Behold the end to which accursed sin leads the souls which Jesus Christ has dearly bought.

Sermon XLIX

TWENTIETH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE PREDOMINANT PASSION

"For he was at the point of death. Lord, come down before that my son die."—JOHN 4:47, 49.

OUR passions are not of themselves bad nor hurtful, when regulated according to the dictates of reason and prudence, they do us no injury, but are, on the contrary, profitable to the soul; but, when disorderly, they are productive of irreparable mischief to those who obey them; for, when any passion takes possession of the heart, it obscures the truth, and makes the soul incapable of distinguishing between good and evil. Ecclesiasticus implored the Lord to deliver him from a mind under the sway of passion. "Give me not over to a shameless and foolish mind." (Eccl. 23:6.) Let us, then, be careful not to allow any bad passion to rule over us. In this day's gospel it is related that a certain ruler, whose son was at the point of death (incipiebat enim mori), knowing that Jesus Christ had come into Galilee, went in search of him, and entreated him to come and cure his son. "Come down before that my son die." The same may be said of him who begins to submit to the tyranny of any passion. "He is at the point of death" of the soul, which should be dreaded far more than the death of the body. Hence, if he wishes to preserve spiritual life, he ought to ask the Lord to deliver him as soon as possible from that passion—Lord, come down before my soul die; if he do not, he shall be miserably lost. I intend to-day to show the great danger of damnation to which all who submit to the domination of any bad passions are exposed.

1. "Only this," said Solomon, "I found, that God made man right, and he hath entangled himself with an infinity of questions." (Eccl. 7:30.) "God created man right"—that is, in the state of justice; but, by giving ear to the serpent, man exposed himself to temptations, and was conquered. He rebelled against God, and his passions rebelled against himself. These are the passions which, according to St. Paul, cause a continual war between the flesh and the spirit. "For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh." (Gal. 5:17.) However, with the aid of divine grace, it is in man's power to resist these passions, and not to allow them to rule over him. It is, as the Lord told Cain, even in the power of man to rule over them, and to bring them into subjection to reason. "But the lust thereof shall be under thee, and thou shalt have dominion over it." (Gen. 4:7.) Let the assaults of the flesh and of the devil, to make us abandon the way of God, be ever so violent, Jesus Christ has said: "Lo! the kingdom of God is within you." (Luke 17:21.) Within us he has established a kingdom, in which the will is the queen that ought to rule over all the senses and passions. And what greater honour or glory can a man have, than to be the master of his passions?

2. The proper regulation of the motions of the mind constitutes the interior mortification so much recommended by spiritual masters, and secures the salvation of the soul. The health of the body depends on the regulation of the humours:—if one of them predominate to excess it causes death. But the health of the soul consists in the proper control of the passions by reason. But, when any passion rules over reason, it first enslaves, and then kills the soul.

3. Many pay great attention to their external conduct; they endeavour to appear modest and respectful; but, at the same time, they cherish in their hearts sinful affections against justice, charity, humility, and chastity. For them is prepared the chastisement with which the Saviour threatened the Scribes and Pharisees, who were careful to have their cups and dishes clean, but nourished within unjust and unclean thoughts. "Woe to you, Scribes and Pharisees—hypocrites; because you make clean the outside of the cup and of the dish; but, within you are full of rapine and uncleanness." (Matt. 23:25.) The Royal Prophet says, that all the beauty of a soul that is the true daughter of God consists in an interior good will. "All the glory of the king's daughter is within." (Ps. 44:14.) Of what use, then, says St. Jerome, is it to abstain from food, and at the same time to allow the mind to swell with pride? or to abstain from wine, and to indulge in the drunkenness of anger? "Quid prodest tenuari abstinentia, si animus superbia intumeseit? quid vinum non bibere, et odio inebriari?" Christians who act in this manner do not lay aside their vices; they only cover them with the mantle of devotion. A man, then, must divest himself of all bad passions; otherwise he will not be the king, but the slave of his affections, and in opposition to the command of the Apostle sin shall reign in his heart. "Let not sin, therefore, reign in your mortal body, so as to obey the lusts thereof." (Rom. 6:12.) Man, then, is, as St. Thomas says, the king of himself when he regulates his body and his carnal affections according to reason. "Rex est homo per rationem, quia per eam regit totum corpus et affectus ejus." (In Joan. 4) But, according to St. Jerome, "when the soul serves vice she loses the honour of a kingdom." (In Thren., 2:7.) She loses the honour of a queen, and becomes, as St. John teaches, the slave of sin. "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." (John 8:34.)

4. St. James exhorts us to treat the body and its lusts as we would treat a horse. We put a bridle in the mouth of a horse, and we bring him wherever we please. "We put bits in the mouths of horses, that they may obey us, and we turn about their whole body." (St. James 3:3.) Hence, as soon as we feel the cravings of any bad passion, we must restrain it with the bridle of reason; for, if we yield to its demands, it will bring us to the level of brute animals, that obey not the dictates of reason, but the impulse of their beastly appetites. "And man, when he was in honour, did not understand: he is compared to senseless beasts, and is become like to them." (Ps. 48:13.) "It is worse," says St. John Chrysostom, "to become like, than to be born, a senseless beast; for, to be naturally without reason is tolerable." The saint says, that to want reason by nature is not disgraceful; but, to be born with the gift of reason, and afterwards to live like a beast, obeying the lusts of the flesh, is degrading to man, and makes him worse than a senseless brute. What would you say if you saw a man who would, of his own accord, live in a stable with horses, feed with them on hay and oats, and sleep, as they do, on dung? The man who submits to the tyranny of any passion, does what is far worse in the eyes of God.

5. It was thus the Gentiles lived, who, because the darkness of their understanding prevented them from discerning between good and evil, went wherever their sensual appetite led them. "That you walk not," says St. Paul, "as also the Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind, having their understanding darkened." (Ephes. 4:17, 18.) Hence they were abandoned to their vices—to impurity and avarice, and blindly obeyed the commands of their passions. "Who, despairing, have given themselves up to lasciviousness, unto the working of all uncleanness, unto covetousness." (verse 19.) To this miserable state are reduced all Christians who, despising reason and God, follow the dictates of passion. In punishment of their sins God abandons them, as he abandoned the Gentiles, to their own wicked desires. "Wherefore God gave them up to the desires of their own heart." (Rom. 1:24.) This is the greatest of all chastisements.

6. St. Augustine writes, that two cities may be built up in the heart of a Christian: one by the love of God, the other by self-love. "Cœlestem (civitatem) ædificat amor Dei usque ad contemptum sui; terrestrem ædificat amor sui usque ad contemptum Dei." (Lib. 14, de Civ., cap. xxviii.) Thus, if the love of God reign within us, we will despise ourselves: if self-love reign, we will despise God. But, in conquering self-love consists the victory to which shall be given a crown of eternal glory. This was the great maxim which St. Francis Xavier always inculcated to his disciples: "Conquer yourself; conquer yourself." All the thoughts and feelings of man, says the Scripture, are inclined to evil from his boyhood. "The imagination and thought of man's heart are prone to evil from his youth." (Gen. 8:21.) Hence we must, during our whole life, zealously combat and conquer the evil inclinations which continually rise within us, as noxious weeds spring up in our gardens. Some will ask how they can free themselves from bad passions, and how they can prevent them from starting up within them. St. Gregory gives the answer: "It is one thing to look at these beasts, and another to keep them within the den of the heart." (Mor. lib. 6, cap. xvi.) It is one thing, says the saint, to look at these beasts, or bad passions, when they are outside, and another to harbour them in the heart. As long as they are outside they can do us no harm; but if we admit them into the soul they devour us.

7. All bad passions spring from self-love. This is, as Jesus Christ teaches all who wish to follow him, the principal enemy which we have to contend with; and this enemy we must conquer by self-denial. "If any one shall come after me let him deny himself." (Matt. 16:24.) "Non intrat in te, amor Dei," says Thomas a Kempis, "nisi exulet amor tui." Unless we banish self-love from the heart the love of God cannot enter. Blessed Angela of Foligno used to say, that she was more afraid of self-love than of the devil, because self-love has greater power than the devil to draw us into sin. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say the same, as we read in her life: "Self-love is the greatest traitor we have to guard against. Like Judas, it betrays us with a kiss. He who conquers it conquers all enemies; he who does not conquer it is lost." The saint then adds: "If you cannot kill it with a single stroke give it poison." She meant, that since we are not able to destroy this accursed enemy, which, according to St. Francis de Sales, dies only with our latest breath, we must at least labour to weaken it as much as possible; for when strong it kills us. Death, says St. Basil, is the reward which self-love gives its followers. The wages of self-love is death; it is the beginning of every evil. "Stipendium amoris proprii mors est, initium omnis mali." (S. Bas. Apud Lyreum, lib. 2.) Self-love seeks not what is just and honourable, but what is agreeable to the senses. Hence Jesus Christ has said: "He that loveth his life"—that is, his sensual appetite or self-will—"shall lose it." (John 12:25.) He who truly loves himself, and wishes to save his soul, should refuse to the senses whatever God has forbidden; otherwise he shall lose God and himself.

8. There are two passions which reign within us:—the concupiscible and irascible appetites—that is, love and hatred. I have said, two principal passions; for each of them, when vicious, draws in its train many other bad passions. The concupiscible appetite brings with it temerity, ambition, greediness, avarice, jealousy, scandal. The irascible brings with it revenge, injustice, slander, envy. St. Augustine advises us, in our combat with the passions, not to endeavour to beat them all down in a single conflict. "Calca jacentem, conflige cum resistente." (In cap. viii. Rom.) We must trample on the passion which we have cast to the ground, so that it may be no longer able to contend with us, and then we must endeavour to subdue the other passions which resist our efforts.

9. But we must endeavour above all to find out our predominant passion. He who conquers this conquers all his passions; he who allows himself to be overcome by it is lost. God commanded Saul to destroy all the Amalecites, along with all their animals and all their property. He destroyed everything that was vile, but spared the life of King Agag, and preserved all that was valuable and beautiful. "And Saul and the people spared Agag and the rest of the flocks of sheep . . . and all that was beautiful, and would not destroy them; but everything that was vile and good for nothing, that they destroyed." (1 Kings 15:9.) In this Saul was afterwards imitated by the Scribes and Pharisees, to whom our Lord said: "Woe to you, Scribes and Pharisees, because you tithe mint, and anise, and cummin, and have left the weightier things of the law, judgment, and mercy, and faith." (Matt. 23:23.) They were careful to pay the tithe of things of least value, and neglected the more important things of the law: such as justice, charity to their neighbour, and faith in God. Some persons act in a similar manner; they abstain from certain defects of minor importance, and, at the same time, allow themselves to be ruled by their predominant passions; but if they do not destroy this passion, they never shall gain the victory of salvation. The King of Syria commanded the captains of his cavalry to kill the King of Israel only, and not to mind the others. "Fight ye not with small or great, but with the King of Israel only." (2 Paral. 18:30.) They obeyed the order, slew King Achab, and gained the victory.

10. We must imitate the captains of Syria: unless we kill the king—that is, the predominant passion—we shall never be able to obtain salvation. The passion which brings man under its sway, first blinds him and prevents him from seeing his danger. Now, how can a blind man, led by a blind guide, such as passion, which follows not reason, but sensual pleasures, possibly avoid falling into some abyss? "If the blind lead the blind, both fall into the pit." (Matt. 15:14.) St. Gregory says that it is a common artifice of the devil to inflame daily more and more our predominant passion, and thus he brings us into many horrible excesses. Through passion for a kingdom, Herod spilled the blood of so many innocent infants. Through love for a woman, Henry the Eighth was the cause of so many frightful spiritual evils, put to death several most worthy individuals, and, in the end, lost the faith. No wonder: for he who is under the domination of any passion no longer sees what he does. Therefore he disregards corrections, excommunications, and even his own damnation: he seeks only his own pleasures, and says: "Come what will, I must satisfy this passion." And, as eminent virtue is accompanied by other virtues, so an enormous vice brings in its train other vices. "In catena iniquitatis," says St. Lawrence Justinian, "fœderata sunt vitia."

11. It is necessary, then, as soon as we perceive any passion beginning to reign within us, to beat it down instantly, before it acquires strength. "Let cupidity gain strength," says St. Augustine, "strike it down while it is small." (In Ps. cxxxvi.) St. Ephrem gives the same advice: "Unless you quickly destroy passions, they cause an ulcer." (De Perfect.) A wound, if it be not closed up, will soon become an incurable ulcer. To illustrate this by an example, a certain monk, as St. Dorotheus relates (Serm. xi.), commanded one of his disciples to pluck up a small cypress. The disciple obeyed, and drew it up with a slight effort. The monk then ordered him to pull up another tree, which was somewhat larger. He succeeded in the task; but not without a good deal of labour. The disciple was then told to pluck up a tree which had taken deep root; but all his efforts were ineffectual. The monk then said to him: Thus it is, my son, with our passions; when they have taken deep root in the heart, we shall not be able to extirpate them. Dearly beloved brethren, keep always before your eyes this maxim: that either the spirit must trample on the flesh, or the flesh shall trample on the spirit.

12. Cassian has laid down an excellent rule for conquering our passions. Let us endeavour, he says, to change the object of our passions; and thus from being vicious they shall become holy. Some are prone to anger against all who treat them with disrespect. Such persons ought to change the object of their passions, and turn their indignation into a hatred of sin, which is more injurious to them than all the devils in hell. Others are inclined to love every one who possesses amiable qualities: they should fix all their affections on God, who is infinitely amiable. But, to recommend ourselves to God, and to beg of him to deliver us from our passions, is the best remedy against them. And, when any passion becomes very violent, we must multiply prayers. Reasoning and reflections are then of little use; for passion obscures our faculties; and the more we reflect the more delightful the object of passion appears. Hence, there is no other remedy than to have recourse to Jesus and to most holy Mary, saying with tears and sighs: "Lord, save us, or we perish: do not permit us to be ever separated from thee. We fly to thy protection, O holy mother of God." O souls created to love God, let us raise ourselves above the earth; let us cease to fix our thoughts and affections on the miserable things of this world; let us cease to love dross and smoke and dung; let us endeavour with all our strength to love the Supreme Infinite Good, our most amiable God, who has made us for himself, and expects us in heaven to make us happy, and to make us enjoy the very glory which he enjoys for eternity.

Sermon L

TWENTY-FIRST SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON THE ETERNITY OF HELL

"And his Lord, being angry, delivered him to the torture until he paid all the debt."—MATT. 18:34.

IN this day's gospel we find that a certain servant, having badly administered the affairs of his master, was found to owe him a debt of ten thousand talents. The master demanded payment; but the servant falling down said: "Have patience and I will pay thee all." The master took pity on him, and forgave the entire debt. One of his fellow-servants who owed him a hundred pence, besought him to have patience, and promised to pay him the last farthing; but the wicked servant cast him into prison. Hearing of this act of cruelty to his fellow-servant, the master sent for him, and said to him: "Wicked servant, I have forgiven thee ten thousand talents, and for a debt of a hundred pence thou hast refused to show compassion to thy fellow-servant. He then delivered him to the tortures till he paid all the debt. Behold, dearly beloved brethren, in these last words, a description of the sentence of the eternal death which is prepared for sinners. By dying in sin, they die debtors to God for all their iniquities; and being unable to make any satisfaction in the other life for their past sins, they remain for ever debtors to the divine justice, and must suffer for eternity in hell. Of this miserable eternity I will speak to-day: listen to me with attention.

1. The thought of eternity is a great thought: so it was called by St. Augustine: Magna cogitatio. According to the holy doctor, God has made us Christians, and instructed us in the maxims of faith, that we may think of eternity. "We are Christians that we may always think of the world to come." This thought has driven from the world so many of the nobles of the earth, has made them renounce all their riches, and shut themselves up in the cloister, there to live in poverty and penance. This thought has sent so many young men into caves and deserts, and has animated so many martyrs to embrace torments and death, in order to save their souls for eternity. "For," exclaims St. Paul, "we have not here a lasting city, but we seek one that is to come." (Heb. 13:14.) This earth, dearly beloved Christians, is not our country; it is for us a place of passage, through which we must soon pass to the house of eternity. "Man shall go into the house of his eternity." (Eccl. 12:5.) In this eternity the house of the just, which is a palace of delights, is very different from the house of sinners, which is a dungeon of torments. Into one of these two houses each of us must certainly go. "In hanc vel illam æternitatem," says St. Ambrose, "cadam necesse est." (S. Amb., in Ps. cxviii.) "Into this or that eternity I must fall."

2. And where the soul shall first go, there she shall remain for ever. "If the tree fall to the south or to the north, in what place soever it shall fall there shall it lie." (Eccl. 11:3.) On what side does a tree fall when it is cut down? It falls on the side to which it inclines. On what side, brethren, will you fall, when death shall cut down the tree of your life? You will fall on the side to which you incline. If you shall be found inclining to the south—that is, in favour with God—you shall be for ever happy; but if you shall fall to the north, you must be for ever miserable. There is no middle place: you must be for ever happy in heaven, or overwhelmed with despair in hell. We must all die, says St. Bernard or some other author (de Quat. Noviss.), but we know not which of the two eternities shall be our lot after death. "Necessi morem, post hæc autem dubia æternitatis."

3. This uncertainty about his lot for eternity was the constant subject of the thoughts of David: it deprived his eyes of sleep, and kept him always in terror. "My eyes prevented the watches: I was troubled, and I spoke not: I thought upon the days of old, and I had in my mind the eternal years." (Ps. 76:5, 6.) What, says St. Cyprian, has encouraged the saints to lead a life, which, on account of their continual austerities, was an uninterrupted martyrdom? It was, he answers, the thought of eternity that inspired them with courage to submit to such unceasing rigours. A certain monk shut himself in a cave, and did nothing else than constantly exclaim: "O eternity! O eternity!" The famous sinner converted by the Abbot Paphnutius, kept eternity always before her eyes, and was accustomed to say: "Who can assure me of a happy eternity, and that I will not fall into a miserable eternity." The same uncertainty kept St. Andrew Avellino in continual terrors and tears till his last breath. Hence he used to ask every one he met, "What do you say? shall I be saved or damned for eternity?"

4. O! that we, too, had eternity always before our eyes! We certainly should not be so much attached to the world. "Quisquis in æternitatis disiderio figitur, nec prosperitate attollitur, nec adversitate quassatur: et dum nihil habet in mundo quod appetat, nihil est quod de mundo pertimescat." He who fixes his thoughts on eternity, is not elated by prosperity nor dejected by adversity; because, having nothing to desire in this world, he has nothing to fear: he desires only a happy eternity, and fears only a miserable eternity. A certain lady, who was greatly attached to the world, went one day to confession to Father M. D'Avila. He bid her go home, and reflect on these two words—always and never. She obeyed, took away her affections from the world, and consecrated them to God. St. Augustine says that the man who thinks on eternity, and is not converted to God, either has no faith, or has lot his reason. "O æternitas! qui te cogitat, nec pœnitet, aut certo fidem non habet, aut si habet, cor non habet." (In soliloq.) O eternity! he who thinks on thee, and does not repent, has certainly no faith, or has lost his heart. Hence St. Chrysostom relates, that the pagans upbraided the Christians with being liars or fools: liars, if they said they believed what they did not believe; fools, if they believed in eternity and committed sin. "Exprobabant gentiles aut mendaces, aut stultos esse Christianos; mendaces si non crederent quod credere dicebant; stultos si credebant et peccabant."

5. Woe to sinners, says St. Cesarius of Arles; they enter into eternity without having known it; but their woes shall be doubled when they shall have entered into eternity, and shall never be able to leave. "Væ peccatoribus, incognitam ingrediuntur." To those who enter hell, the door opens for their admission, but never opens for their departure. "I have the keys of death and of hell." (Apoc. 1:18.) God himself keeps the keys of hell, to show us that whosoever enters has no hope of ever escaping from it. St. John Chrysostom writes, that the condemnation of the reprobate is engraved on the pillar of eternity, so that it never shall be revoked. In hell there is no calendar; there the years are not counted. St. Antonine says, that if a damned soul heard that she was to be released from hell after so many millions of years as there are drops of water in the sea, or grains of sand in the earth, she would feel a greater joy than a criminal condemned to death would experience at hearing that he was reprieved, and was to be made the monarch of the whole world! But, no! as many millions of years shall pass away as there are drops of water in the ocean, or grains of dust in the earth, and the hell of the damned shall be at its commencement. All these millions of years shall be multiplied an infinite number of times, and hell will begin again. But of what use is it, says St. Hilary, to count years in eternity? Where you expect the end, there it commences. "Ubi putas finem invenire, ibi incipit." And St. Augustine says, "that things which have an end cannot be compared with eternity." (In Ps. xxxvi.) Each of the damned would be content to make this compact with God—Lord, increase my torments as much as thou pleasest; assign a term for them as distant as thou pleasest; provided thou fix a time at which they shall cease, I am satisfied. But, no! this time shall never arrive. "My end," the damned shall say, "is perished." (Lamen. 3:18.) Then, is there no end to the torments of the damned? No! the trumpet of divine justice sounds in the caverns of hell, and continually reminds the reprobate that their hell shall be eternal, and shall never have an end.

6. If hell were not eternal, it would not be so frightful a chastisement. Thomas a Kempis says, that "everything which passes with time is trifling and short." Any pain which has an end is not very appalling. The man who labours under an imposthume or a cancer, must submit to the knife or the cautery: the pain is severe; but because it is soon over it can be borne. But a tooth-ache which lasts for three months without interruption is insupportable. Were a person obliged to lie in the same posture for six months on a soft bed, or even to hear the same music, or the same comedy, night and day for one year, he would fall into melancholy and despondency. Poor blind sinners! When threatened with hell they say: "If I go there I must have patience." But they shall not say so when they will have entered that region of woes, where they must suffer, not by listening to the same music or the same comedy, nor by lying in the same posture, or by tooth-ache, but by enduring all torments and all evils. "I will heap evils upon them." (Deut. 33:23.) And all these torments shall never end.

7. They shall never end, and shall never be diminished in the smallest degree. The damned must for ever suffer the same fire, the same privation of God, the same sadness, the same despair. Yes, says St. Cyprian, in eternity there is no change, because the decree is immutable. This thought shall immensely increase their sufferings, by making them feel beforehand, and at each moment, all that they shall have to suffer for eternity. In this description of the happiness of the saints, and the misery of the reprobate, the Prophet Daniel says: "They shall wake some unto life everlasting, and some unto reproach to see it always." (Dan. 12:2.) They shall always see their unhappy eternity. Ut videant semper. Thus eternity tortures each of the damned not only by his present pains, but with all his future sufferings, which are eternal.

8. These are not opinions controverted among theologians; they are dogmas of faith clearly revealed in the sacred Scriptures. "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire." (Matt. 25:41.) Some will say: The fire, but not the punishment of the damned is everlasting. Such the language of the incredulous, but it is folly. For what other purpose would God make this fire eternal, than to chastise the reprobate, who are immortal? But, to take away every shadow of doubt, the Scriptures, in many other places, say, that not only the fire, but the punishment, of the damned is eternal. "And these," says Jesus Christ, "shall go into everlasting punishment." (Matt. 25:46.) Again we read in St. Mark, "Where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not extinguished." (9:43.) St. John says: "And the smoke of their torments shall ascend up for ever and ever." (Apoc. 16:11.) "Who," says St. Paul, "shall suffer eternal punishment in destruction." (2 Thess. 1:9.)

9. Another infidel will ask: How can God justly punish with eternal torments a sin that lasts but a moment? I answer, that the grievousness of a crime is measured not by its duration, but by the enormity of its malice. The malice of mortal sin is, as St. Thomas says, infinite. (1, 2, q. 87, art. 4.) Hence, the damned deserve infinite punishment; and, because a creature is not capable of suffering pains infinite in point of intensity, God, as the holy doctor says, renders the punishment of the damned infinite in extension by making it eternal. Moreover, it is just, that as long as the sinner remains in his sin, the punishment which he deserves should continue. And, therefore, as the virtue of the saints is rewarded in Heaven, because it lasts for ever, so also the guilt of the damned in Hell, because it is everlasting, shall be chastised with everlasting torments. "Quia non recipit causæ remedium," says Eusebius Emissenus, "carebit fine supplicium." The cause of their perverse will continues: therefore, their chastisement will never have an end. The damned are so obstinate in their sins, that even if God offered pardon, their hatred for him would make them refuse it. The Prophet Jeremias, speaking in the name of the reprobate, says: Why is my sorrow become perpetual and my wound desperate, so as to refuse to be healed?" (Jer. 15:18.) My wound, they say, is incurable, because I do not wish it to be healed. Now, how can God heal the wound of their perverse will, when they would refuse the remedy, were it offered to them? Hence, the punishment of the reprobate is called a sword, a vengeance which is irrevocable. "I, the Lord, have drawn my sword out of its sheath, not to be turned back." (Ezech. 21:5.)

10. Death, which is so terrible in this life, is desired in hell by the damned; but they never shall find it. "And in these days men shall seek death, and shall not find it: and they shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them." (Apoc. 11:6.) They would wish, as a remedy for their eternal ruin, to be exterminated and destroyed. But "there is no poison of destruction in them." (Wis. 1:14.) If a man, condemned to die, be not deprived of life by the first stroke of the axe, his torture moves the people to pity. Miserable damned souls! They live in continual death in the midst of the pains of hell: death excites in them all the agony of death, but does not give them a remedy by taking away life. "Prima mors," says St. Augustine, "animam nolentem pellit de corpore, secunda mors nolentem tenet in corpore." The first death expels from the body the soul of a sinner who is unwilling to die: but the second death—that is, eternal death—retains in the body a soul that wishes to die. "They are laid in hell like sheep; death shall feed upon them." (Ps. 48:15.) In feeding, sheep eat the blades of grass, but leave the root untouched; hence the grass dies not, but grows up again. It is thus that death treats the damned; it torments them with pain, but spares their life, which may be called the root of suffering.

11. But, if these miserable souls have no chance of release from hell, perhaps they can at least deceive or flatter themselves with the hope, that God may one day be moved to pity, and free them from their torments? No: in hell there is no delusion, no flattery, no perhaps; the damned are as certain as they are of God's existence that their hell shall have no end. "Thou thoughtest unjustly that I shall be like to thee; but I will reprove thee, and set before thy face." (Ps. 49:21.) They shall for ever see before their eyes their sins and the sentence of their eternal condemnation. "And I will set before thy face."

12. Let us conclude. Thus, most beloved brethren, the affair of our eternal salvation should be the sole object of all our concerns. "The business for which we struggle," says St. Eucharius, "is eternity." There is question of eternity: there is question whether we will be saved, and be for ever happy in a city of delights, or be damned, and confined for eternity in a pit of fire. This is not an affair of little importance; it is of the utmost and of eternal importance to us. When Thomas More was condemned to death by Henry the Eighth, his wife Louisa went to him for the purpose of tempting him to obey the royal command. Tell me, Lousia, replied the holy man, how many years can I, who am now so old, expect to live? You might, said she, live for twenty years. O foolish woman! he exclaimed, do you want me to condemn my soul to an eternity of torments for twenty years of life?

13. O God! Christians believe in the existence of hell, and commit sin! Dearly beloved brethren, let not us also be fools, like so many who are now weeping in hell. Miserable beings! What benefit do they now derive from all the pleasures which they enjoyed in this life? Speaking of the rich and of the poor, St. John Chrysostom said: "O unhappy felicity, which has drawn the rich into eternal infelicity! O happy infelicity, which has brought the poor to the felicity of eternity!" The saints have buried themselves alive in this life, that after death they may not find themselves buried in hell for all eternity. If eternity were a doubtful matter, we ought even then make every effort in our power to escape an eternity of torments; but no, it is not a matter of doubt; it is a truth of faith, that after this life each of us must go into eternity, to be for ever in glory or for ever in despair. St. Teresa says, that it is through a want of faith that so many Christians are lost. As often as we say the words of the Creed, life everlasting, let us enliven our faith, and remember that there is another life, which never ends; and let us adopt all the means necessary to secure a happy eternity. Let us do all, and give up all; if necessary, let us leave the world, in order to secure eternal happiness. When eternity is at stake no security can be too great. "Nulla nimia securitas," says St. Bernard, "ubi periclitatur æternitas."

Sermon LI

TWENTY-SECOND SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

STRAITS AND ANGUISH OF DYING CHRISTIANS WHO HAVE BEEN NEGLIGENT DURING LIFE ABOUT THE DUTIES OF RELIGION

"Render, therefore, to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's."—MATT. 22:21.

ONE day, the Pharisees, with the malignant intention of ensnaring him in his speech, that they might afterwards accuse him before the ministers of Cæsar, sent their disciples to ask Jesus Christ, if it were lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar. In answer, the Redeemer, after looking at the coin of the tribute, asked: "Whose image and inscription is this?" Being told it was Cæsar's, he said: "Render then to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's." By these words Jesus Christ wishes to teach us, that it is our duty to give to men what is due to them; and to reserve for him all the affections of our heart, since he created us to love him, and afterwards imposed upon us a precept of loving him. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart." Miserable the man who, at the hour of death, shall see that he has loved creatures, that he has loved his pleasures, and has not loved God. "When distress cometh upon them, they will seek peace, and there will be none." (Ezech. 7:25.) He will then seek peace, but shall not find it; for many causes of distress and trouble shall assail him. What shall these causes be? Behold, the unhappy man shall then say, first: O God! I could have become a saint, but have not become one. Secondly, he shall say: Oh! that I now had time to repair the evil I have done! but time is at an end. Thirdly: Oh! that at least, in the short time which remains, I could remedy the past: but, alas! this time is not fit for repairing past evils.

FIRST POINT. O GOD! I COULD HAVE, BUT HAVE NOT, BECOME A SAINT.

1. Because, during their whole life, they thought only of pleasing God and sanctifying themselves, the saints go with great confidence to meet death, which delivers them from the miseries and dangers of the present life, and unites them perfectly with God. But the man who has thought only of his pleasures and of his own ease, and has neglected to recommend himself to God, or to reflect on the account which he must one day render, cannot meet death with confidence. Poor sinners! they banish the thought of death whenever it presents itself to them, and think only of living in pleasures and amusements, as if they never were to die. But for each of them the end must one day come. "The end is come; the end is come." (Ezech. 7:2.) And when this end is come every one must gather the fruit which he has sown during his life. "For what things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap." (Gal. 6:8.) If he has sown works of holiness, he shall receive rewards of eternal life; but if he has sown evil works, he shall reap chastisements and eternal death.

2. The scene of his past life is the first thing which shall rush on the mind of the dying man, when the news of death shall be announced to him. He shall then see things in a light far different from that in which he viewed them during life. The acts of revenge which appeared to him lawful—the scandals which he disregarded—the liberty of speaking obscenely and injurious to the character of his neighbour—the pleasures which were regarded as innocent—the acts of injustice which he held to be allowable—shall then appear what they really were: grevious sins and offences against God, each of which merited hell. Alas! those blind sinners, who voluntarily blind themselves during life, by shutting their eyes to the light shall, at death, involuntarily see all the evil they have done. "Then shall the eyes of the blind be opened." (Is. 35:5.) At the light of the candle which lights him to death, "the wicked shall see and shall be angry," (Ps. 111:10.) He shall see all the irregularities of his past life—his frequent abuse of the sacraments, confessions made without sorrow or purpose of amendment, contracts completed with remorse of conscience, injury done to the property and reputation of others, immodest ests, rancours, and vindictive thoughts. He shall then see the bad examples which he gave to young persons who feared God, and whom he treated with contempt, and turned into derision by calling them hypocrites and other reproachful names. He shall see so many lights and calls received from God, so many admonitions of spiritual fathers, and so many resolutions and promises made but afterwards neglected.

3. He shall see particularly the bad maxims by which he regulated his conduct during life. "It is necessary to seek the esteem of the world, and to preserve honour." But is it necessary for a man to preserve his honour by trampling on the honour due to God? "We ought to indulge in amusements as often as we can." But is it lawful to indulge in amusements by insulting God? "Of what use to the world is the man who lives in poverty and has no money? But, will you, for the sake of money, lose your soul? In answer to these questions the sinner says: No matter. What can be done? "If we do not make a fortune in the world we cannot appear among our equals." Such the maxims of the worldling during life; but at death he shall change his language. He shall then see the truth of that maxim of Jesus Christ: "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul." (Matt. 16:26.) Unhappy me! the worldling shall exclaim on the bed of death, I have had so much time to tranquillize my conscience, and behold I am now at the point of death, and I find my soul burdened with so many sins? What would it have cost me to have broken off such a friendship, to have gone to confession every week, to have avoided certain occasions of sin? Ah! very little, but though it should have cost me a great deal of pain and labour, I ought to have submitted to every inconvenience in order to save my soul. Salvation is of greater importance to me than the dominion of the entire world. But, alas! the sentiments of negligent Christians at death are as fruitless as the sorrows of the damned, who mourn in hell over their sins as the cause of their perdition, but mourn in vain.

4. At that time they derive no consolation from their past amusements or pomps, from their exalted dignities, or from the humiliation of their rivals. On the contrary, at the hour of death, these things, like so many swords shall pierce their hearts. "Evil shall catch the unjust man unto destruction." (Ps. 139:12.) At present the lovers of the world seek after banquets, dances, games, and scenes of laughter and joy; but, at the time of death this laughter and joy, as St. James says, shall be turned into mourning and affliction. "Let your laughter be turned into mourning, and your joy into sorrow." (St. James 4:5.) Of this we see frequent examples. A young man who entertains his companions by sallies of wit and by immodest jests, is seized with a severe illness. His friends come to see him, and find him overwhelmed with grief and melancholy. He indulges no more in jests, or laughter, or conversation. If he speaks at all, his words are words of terror or despair. His friends ask why he speaks so despondingly—why he is so melancholy. Have courage, they say: your illness is not dangerous. They endeavour to inspire hope and cheerfulness: but he is silent. And how can he be cheerful when he feels his conscience burdened with many sins, sees that he must soon appear before Jesus Christ to give an account of his entire life, and that he has much reason to fear that he shall receive the sentence of eternal death? He will then say: O fool that I have been! Oh! that I had loved God! Had I loved him, I should not now find myself in these straits, in this anguish. Oh! that I had time to tranquillize the troubles of my conscience? Let us pass to the second point.

SECOND POINT. OH! THAT I HAD TIME TO REPAIR THE EVIL I HAVE DONE! BUT NOW TIME IS AT AN END.

5. Oh! that I had time, he will say, to repair the past! But, when will he say this? When the oil in the lamp is consumed: when he is on the point of entering into eternity. One of the greatest causes of the distress and anguish of the careless Christian at the hour of death, is the remembrance of the bad use he has made of the time in which he ought to have acquired merits for heaven, and in which he has accumulated merits for hell. Oh! that I had time! Do you seek for time? You have lost so many nights in gaming, and so many years in indulging the senses, without ever thinking of your soul; and now you seek for time; but time is now no more. "Time shall be no longer." (Apoc. 10:6.) Were you not already admonished by preachers to be prepared for death? were you not told that it would come upon you when you least expected it? "Be you ready," says Jesus Christ; "for at what hour you think not the Son of Man will come." (Luke 12:40.) You have despised my admonitions, and have voluntarily squandered the time which my goodness bestowed upon you in spite of your demerits; but now time is at an end. Listen to the words in which the priest that assists you shall tell you to depart from this world: Proficisere anima Christiana de hoc mundo. Go forth, Christian soul, from this world. And where shall you go? To eternity, to eternity. Death respects neither parents nor monarchs; when it comes, it does not wait even for a moment. "Thou hast appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed." (Job 14:5.)

6. Oh! what terror shall the dying man feel at hearing the assisting priest tell him to depart from this world! what dismay shall he experience in saying with himself: "This morning I am living, and this evening I shall be dead! "To-day I am in this house; to-morrow I shall be in the grave: and where shall my soul be found? His terror shall be increased when he sees the death-candle lighted, and when he hears the confessor order the relatives to withdraw from his chamber, and to return to it no more. It shall be still more increased when the confessor gives him the crucifix, and tells him to embrace it, saying: "Embrace Jesus Christ, and think no more of this world." He takes the crucifix and kisses it; but, in kissing it, he trembles at the remembrance of the many injuries which he has offered to Jesus Christ. He would now wish to repent sincerely of all his injuries to his Saviour, but he sees that his repentance is forced by the necessity of his approaching death. "He," says St. Augustine, "who is abandoned by sin before he abandons it, condemns it not freely, but through necessity."

7. The common delusion of worldlings is, that earthly things appear great, and that the things of Heaven, as being distant and uncertain, appear to be of little value. They regard tribulations as insupportable, and grievous sins as unimportant. The miserable beings are as if they were shut up in a room filled with smoke, which hinders them from seeing objects before their eyes. But at the hour of death this darkness shall vanish, and the soul shall begin to see things in their real colours. At that hour all temporal things appear to be what they really are—vanity, lies, and deception; and the things of eternity assume their true value. Oh! how important shall judgment, hell, and eternity, which are so much disregarded during life, appear at the time of death. According as these shall begin to put on their true colours, the fears of the dying man shall increase. "In morte," says St. Gregory, "tanto timor fit acrior, quanto retributio vicinior; et quanto vicinius judicium tangitur, tanto vehementius formidator." (Mor. 25.) The nearer the sentence of the Judge approaches, the more sensible the fear of condemnation becomes. Hence the sick man will say: "Oh! in what anguish do I die! Unhappy me! Oh! that I knew that so unhappy a death awaited me!" You have not known; but you ought to have foreseen it; for you know that a good death could not be expected after a wicked life. But, since I must soon die, oh! that I could at least, in the little time that remains, tranquillize my conscience! Let us pass to the third point.

THIRD POINT. OH! THAT I COULD, IN THE LITTLE TIME THAT REMAINS, REPAIR THE PAST! BUT, ALAS! THIS TIME IS NOT FIT FOR REPAIRING PAST EVILS.

8. The time allowed to careless Christians at the hour of death, is, for two reasons, unfit for tranquillizing the troubles of their conscience. First, because this time will be very short; for at the commencement, and for some days during the progress, of the disease, the sick man thinks only of physicians, of remedies, and of making his last will. During that time his relatives, friends, and even the physicians deceive him by holding out hopes of recovery. Hence, deluded by these hopes, he will not be able for some time to persuade himself that his death is at hand. When shall he begin to persuade himself that death is near? Only when he shall be at the very point of death. This is the second reason why that time is unfit for repairing the evils of the soul. At that time the dying man is sick in mind as well as in body. He shall be assailed by pains in the chest, spasms in the head, debility, and delirium. These shall render him unable to make any effort to excite a true detestation of his past sins, or to apply to the disorders of his past life a remedy which will calm the terrors of his conscience. The news of his approaching death will astound him to such a degree, that he shall be scarcely half alive.

9. A person labouring under a severe headache, which deprives him of sleep for two or three nights, will not even attempt to dictate a letter of ceremony. And at death when he feels but little, understands but little, and sees only a confusion of things which fills him with terror, the careless Christian adjusts a conscience burdened with the sins of thirty or forty years. Then are verified the words of the gospel: "The night cometh when no man worketh." (John 9:4.) Then his conscience will say to him: "Now thou canst be steward no longer." (Luke 16:2.) There is no more time for negotiation; what has been done, is done. "When distress cometh upon them, they will seek for peace, and there shall be none. Trouble shall come upon trouble." (Ezech. 7:25, 26.)

10. It is often said of a person that he led a bad life, but afterwards died a good death; that by his sighs and tears he gave proofs of sincere repentance. "Morientes non delieti pœnitentia," says St. Augustine, "sed mortis urgentis admonitio compellit." (Serm. xxxvi.) The wailing of such persons proceeds not from sorrow for their sins, but from the fear of imminent death. He was not afraid of sinning, says the holy doctor, but of burning. "Non meteuit peccare, sed adere." (Epis. cxiv.) Till this moment the dying man has loved sinful objects: will he now detest them? Perhaps he will then love them with more tenderness; for the objects of our affections become more dear to us when we are afraid of losing them. The celebrated master of St. Bruno died with signs of repentance; but when laid in the coffin, he said that he was damned. If, at the hour of death, even the saints complain that on account of the state of the head, they can think but little of God, or make but little effort to excite good acts, how can the negligent Christian make these acts at death, when he was not in the habit of making them during life? It maybe said that he appeared to have a sincere sorrow for the wickedness of his past life. But, was his sorrow true sorrow? The devil persuades him that the wish to have sorrow is true sorrow; but he deceives him. The dying man will say: "I am sorry from the bottom of my heart," etc.; but these words shall come from a heart of stone. "From the midst of the rocks they shall give forth their voices." (Ps. 103:12.) But he has frequently been at confession, and has received all the sacraments; he has died in perfect resignation. Ah! the criminal who goes to be executed, appears to be perfectly resigned: but why? Because he cannot escape from the officers of justice, who bring him in chains to the place of execution.

11. O moment on which eternity depends! This moment made the saints tremble at the hour of death, and made them exclaim: "O God! where shall I be in a few hours?" "Sometimes," says St. Gregory, "the soul even of the just man is disturbed by the terror of vengeance." (Mor. xxiv.) What, then, shall the careless Christian, who has disregarded God, feel when he sees the scaffold prepared on which he must die? "His eyes shall see his own destruction, and he shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty." (Job 21:20.) He shall see with his own eyes death prepared for his soul, and shall from that moment begin to feel the anger of the Lord. The viaticum which he must receive, the extreme unction which will be administered to him, the crucifix which is placed in his hands, the recommendation of the soul which is read by the assisting priest, the lighting of the blessed candle—all these shall form the scaffold of divine justice. The poor sick man perceives that he is already in a cold sweat, that he can no longer move or speak, that his respiration has begun to fail: in a word, he sees that the moment of death is at hand; he sees his soul defiled with sins; the Judge waiting for him; hell burning under his feet; and in this confusion of darkness and terror he shall enter into eternity.

12. "O that they would be wise, and would understand, and would provide for their last end." (Deut. 32:29.) Behold, dearly beloved brethren, how the Holy Ghost exhorts us to provide now for the terrible straits and distress by which we shall be encompassed at death, and to adjust at present the accounts which we must render to God; for it will be then impossible to settle these accounts so as to save our souls. My crucified Jesus, I will not wait till death to embrace thee; I embrace thee at this moment. I love thee above all things; and because I love thee, I repent with my whole heart of all the offences and insults I have offered to thee, who art infinite goodness; and I purpose and hope, with thy grace, to love thee always, and never more to offend thee. Through the merits of thy passion I ask thee to assist me.

Sermon LII

TWENTY-THIRD SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON IMPENITENCE

"Lord, my daughter is even now dead."—MATT. 9:18.

HOW great is God's goodness! how difficult it is to obtain pardon from a man whom we have offended! when sinners cast themselves at the feet of the Lord with humility and with sorrow for having offended him, he instantly pardons and embraces them. "Turn to me, saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will turn to you." (Zach. 1:3.) Sinners, says the Lord, I have turned my back on you, because you first turned your back on me: return to me, and I will return to you and will embrace you. When rebuked by the Prophet Nathan, David repented, and said: "I have sinned against the Lord; I have offended my God." David was instantly pardoned: for at the very moment that he confessed his guilt, Nathan said to him: "The Lord also hath taken away thy sin." (2 Kings 12:13.) But let us come to the gospel of the day, in which we find that a certain ruler, whose daughter was dead, went immediately to Jesus Christ, and asked him to restore her to life: "Lord, my daughter is even now dead; but come, lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live." In explaining this passage, St. Bonaventure turns to the sinner, and says: "Your daughter is your soul; she even now is dead by sin; hasten your conversion." Brother, your soul is your daughter, that has just died by committing sin. Return immediately to God. Hasten; if you delay, and defer your conversion from day to day, the wrath of God shall suddenly come upon you, and you shall be cast into hell. "Delay not to be converted to the Lord, and defer it not from day to day." (Eccl. 5:8, 9.) Behold the sermon for this day, in which I will show, first, the danger to which he who is in the state of sin, and defers his conversion, is exposed; and secondly, the remedy to be adopted by him who is in sin, and wishes to save his soul.

FIRST POINT. THE DANGER TO WHICH A PERSON IN SIN, WHO DEFERS HIS CONVERSION, IS EXPOSED.

1. St. Augustine considers three states of Christians. The first is the state of those who have always preserved their baptismal innocence; the second is the state of those who have fallen into sin, and have afterwards returned to God, and persevered in grace; the third is of those who have fallen and have always relapsed into sin, and are found in that unhappy state at death. Speaking of the first and second class, he pronounces them secure of salvation; but, speaking of the third he says: "Non dico, non præsumo, non promitto." (Hom. xli. int. 50.) "I do not say; I do not presume; I do not promise." He neither says, nor presumes, nor promises, that such sinners are saved. From these words it appears that, in his opinion, it is very improbable that they obtain eternal life. St. Thomas teaches (2, 2, qu. 109, a. 8) that he who is in the state of mortal sin cannot long abstain from the commission of some new sin. And St. Gregory says: "A sin which is not blotted out by repentance by its weight soon draws to another sin; hence it is not only a sin, but the cause of sin." (1. 3, Mor. c. ix.) One sin is the cause of another, because, in the sinner reason is disordered, and inclines him to evil; and therefore he cannot long resist temptation. "Quando," says St. Anselm, "quis manet in peccato, ratio jam est deordinata et ideo veniente tentatione faciet id quod est facilius agore." Hence, according to the holy doctor, though they understand the great advantage of sanctifying grace, sinners, because they are deprived of grace, always relapse, in spite of all their efforts to avoid sin. "Per peccatum non potest prosequi bonum quod cogniscit, conatur et labitur." But how can the branch that is cut off from the vine produce fruit? "As," says Jesus Christ, "the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, unless it abide in the vine, so neither can you, unless you abide in me." (John 15:4.)

2. But some young persons may say: "I will hereafter give myself to God." Behold the false hope of sinners, which leads them to remain in sin till death, and from death conducts them to hell! Who are you that say, you will hereafter give yourself to God? But who, I ask, promises you that you shall have time to give yourself to God, and that you shall not meet with a sudden death, which will take you out of this world before you give yourself to him? "He," says St. Gregory, "who has promised pardon to penitents has not promised to-morrow to sinners." (Hom. xii. in Ev.) The Lord has promised pardon to all who repent of their sins; but to those who wish to continue in sin he has not promised time for repentance. Do you say, hereafter? But Jesus Christ tells you that time is in the hand of God, and not under your control. "It is not for you to know the times or moments which the Father has put in his own power." (Acts 1:7.) We read in the Gospel of St. Luke, that Jesus Christ, seeing a fig-tree which was fruitless for three years, ordered it to be cut down. "He said to the dresser of the vineyard: Behold, for these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and I find none. Cut it down therefore. Why cumbereth it the ground?" (Luke 13:7.) Tell me, you who say that you will hereafter give yourself to God, for what purpose does he preserve your life? Is it that you may continue to insult him by sin? No; he gives you life that you may renounce sin, and change your conduct. "Knowest thou not that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance?" (Rom. 2:4.) But you are resolved not to amend; and if you wish, to give yourself to God only hereafter, he will say of your soul to the dresser of his vineyard: "Cut it down. Why cumbereth it the ground?" Why should such a sinner be allowed to remain on earth? Is it to continue to offend me? Cut down this fruitless tree, and cast it into the fire. "Every tree, therefore, that doth not yield good fruit, shall be cut down, and cast into the fire." (Matt. 3:10.)

3. But, should God hereafter give you time for repentance, will you, if you do not now repent, return to him hereafter? Sins, like so many chains, keep the sinner in bondage. "He is first bound with the ropes of his own sins." (Prov. 5:22.) My brother, if you cannot now break the cords by which you are at present bound, will you be able to break them hereafter, when they shall be doubled by the commission of new sins? To give him an idea of the degree of folly which impenitent sinners reach, our Lord showed one day to the Abbot Arsenius, an Ethiopian, who, not being able to raise a load of faggots, added to their weight, and thus became less liable to raise it. Sinners, said the Saviour to the holy abbot, act in a similar manner. They wish to get rid of their past sins, and, at the same time, commit new ones. These new sins shall lead them into others more numerous and more enormous. Cain sinned against his brother, first, by envy; then, by hatred; and afterwards, by murder; finally, he despaired of the divine mercy, saying: "My iniquity is greater than that I may obtain pardon." (Gen. 4:13.) Judas also was first guilty of the sin of avarice; he then betrayed Jesus Christ, and afterwards hanged himself. Sins chain the sinner, and make him their slave, so that he knowingly brings himself to destruction. "His own iniquities catch the wicked." (Prov. 5:22.)

4. Moreover, his sins weigh down the sinner to such a degree, that he no longer regards heaven nor his own salvation. "My iniquities," said David with tears, "are growing over my head, and, as a heavy burden, are become heavy upon me." (Ps. 37:5.) Hence the miserable man loses reason, thinks only of earthly goods, and thus forgets the divine judgments. "And they perverted their own minds, and turned away their eyes, that they might not look unto heaven, nor remember just judgments." (Dan. 13:9.) He even hates the light, because he fears that it will interrupt his criminal pleasures. "Every one that doth evil hateth the light." (John 3:20.) Hence, he becomes miserably blind, and goes round about continually from sin to sin. "The wicked walk round about." (Ps. 11:9.) He then despises admonitions, divine calls, hell, heaven, and God. "The wicked, when he is come into the depth of sins, comtemneth." (Prov. 18:3.)

5. "He hath," says Job, "torn me with wound upon wound, he hath rushed in upon me like a giant." (Job 16:15.) By conquering one temptation, a man acquires not only additional strength to repel future assaults, but also diminishes the power of the devil. And, on the other hand, when we yield to any temptation, the devil becomes like a giant, and we become so weak, that we have scarcely strength to resist him any longer. If you receive a wound from an enemy you lose strength. If to this new wounds be added you shall be exhausted, and rendered unable to defend yourself. This is what happens to the fools who say: "I will hereafter give myself to God." How can they resist the attacks of the devil, after they have lost their strength, and after their wounds have mortified? "My sores are putrefied and corrupted, because of my foolishness." (Ps. 37:6.) At its commencement a wound is easily healed; but when it becomes gangrenous, the cure is most difficult. Recourse must be had to the cautery; but even this remedy is in many cases ineffectual.

6. But further, St. Paul teaches, that God "will have all men to be saved" (1 Tim. 2:4); and that Jesus Christ came on earth for the salvation of sinners: "Jesus Christ came into this world to save sinners." (1 Tim. 1:15.) God certainly wills the salvation of all who desire it: he wills the salvation of those who wish to save their souls; but not of those who labour for their own damnation. Jesus Christ has come to save sinners. To save our souls, two things are necessary: first, the grace of God; and secondly, your own cooperation. "Behold, I stand at the gate and knock: if any man shall hear my voice, and open to me the door, I will come unto him." (Apoc. 3:20.) Then, in order that God may enter into us by his grace, we must, on our part, obey his calls, and open our hearts to him. Likewise, St. Paul says, "with fear and trembling work out your salvation." (Phil. 2:12.) He says, work out. Then we, too, must co-operate to our salvation by good works; otherwise the Lord will only give us sufficient grace by which we shall be able to save our souls, but by which we certainly will not save them. Behold, the reason: he who is in the state of sin, and continues to commit sin, is daily more and more attached to the flesh, and more removed from God. Now, how can God, by his grace, approach to us, when we withdraw farther from him? He then retires from us, and becomes less liberal of his favours. "And I will make it desolate—and I will command the clouds to rain no rain upon it." (Isa. 5:6.) When the soul continues to offend God he abandons her, and withdraws his helps. Hence she shall cease to feel remorse of conscience; she shall be left without light; and the blindness of her understanding and the hardness of her heart shall be increased. She shall become utterly insensible to the calls of God, to the maxims of faith, and to the melancholy examples of other rebellious souls that have closed their career in hell.

"But who knows," the obstinate sinner will say, "but God will show me the same mercy which he has shown to certain great sinners? In answer to this, St. Chrysostom says: "Fortasse dabit, inquis: cur dicis fortasse? Contigit aliquando; sed cogita quod de anima deliberas?" (Hom. xxii. in 2 Cor.) You say: "Perhaps God will give me the grace of salvation." But why do you say perhaps? Is it because he has sometimes given to great sinners the grace of eternal life? But remember, says the holy doctor, that there is question of your soul, which, if once lost, is lost for ever. I, too, take you up, and admit that God has, by certain extraordinary graces, saved some enormous sinners. But these cases are very rare; they are prodigies and miracles of grace, by which God wished to show the boundlessness of his mercy. But, ordinarily, sinners who wish to continue in sin, are, in the end, cast into hell. On them are executed the threats of the Lord against obstinate sinners. "You have despised my counsels, and neglected my reprehensions. I also will laugh in your destruction. . . . Then they will call on me, and I will not hear." (Prov. 1:25, 26, 28.) I, says the Lord, have called on them again and again, but they have refused to hear me. "But they did not hear nor incline their ears; but hardened their neck, that they might not hear me." (Jer. 17:23.) Now they call upon me, it is but just that I refuse to listen to their cries. God bears, but he does not bear for ever; when the time of vengeance arrives he punishes past and present iniquities. "For the Most High is a patient rewarder." (Eccl. 5:4.) And according to St. Augustine, the longer God has waited for negligent sinners the more severely he will chastise them. "Quanto diutius expectat Deus, ut emenderis; tanto gravius judicabit, si neglexeris." (Lib. de util. ag. pæn.) He who promises to amend, and wilfully neglects to return to God, is unworthy of the grace of true repentance.

But God is full of mercy. He is full of mercy; but he is not so stupid as to act without reason: to show mercy to those who continue to insult him would be stupidity, and not goodness. "Is thy eye evil because I am good?" (Matt. 20:15.) Will you persevere in wickedness because I am bountiful? God is good, but he is also just, and exhorts us all to observe his law, if we wish to save our souls. "If thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments." (Matt. 19:17.) Were God to show mercy to the wicked as well as to the just, and to give to all the grace of conversion before death, he would hold out a strong temptation even to the saints to commit sin: but, no! when his mercies have reached their term he punishes, and pardons no more. "And my eye shall not spare thee, and I will show thee no pity." (Ezec. 7:4.) Hence he says: Pray that your flight may not be in the winter or on the Sabbath." (Matt. 24:20.) We are prevented from working in the winter by the cold, and on the Sabbath by the law. In this passage the Redeemer gives us to understand that, for impenitent sinners, a time shall come when they would wish to give themselves to God, but shall find themselves prevented by their bad habits from returning to him. Of this there are numberless melancholy examples. In his sermons on a happy death, Cataneus relates, that a dissolute young man, when admonished to give up his wickedness, said: I have a saint who is omnipotent, and this is the mercy of God. Death came; the unhappy man sent for a confessor; but while he was preparing for confession, the Devil wrote down before his eyes all his sins. He was seized with terror, and exclaimed: Alas! what a long catalogue of sins! And before he was able to make his confession he expired. In his sermons for Sundays Campadelli relates that a young nobleman addicted to sins of the flesh, was warned by God and by men to amend his life; but he despised all their admonitions. He afterwards fell into a severe illness, confessed his sins, and promised to change his life; but, after his recovery, he returned to the vomit. Behold the vengeance of God! Being one day in a field during the vintage, he took fever, went home, and feeling that the disease was far advanced, he sent in haste for a priest who lived near the house. The priest comes, enters the house, salutes the sick man, but sees a frightful spectacle, the eyes and mouth open, the face black as jet. He calls the sick man, but finds that he is dead. Dearly beloved brethren, take care that you, too, be not miserable examples of the justice of God. Give up sin; but give it up from this moment; for, if you continue to commit sin, the same vengeance which has fallen on so many others shall also fall on you. Let us come to the remedy.

SECOND POINT. THE REMEDY FOR THOSE WHO FIND THEMSELVES IN SIN, AND WISH TO SAVE THEIR SOULS.

9. Jesus Christ was one day asked, if the number of the elect is small. "Lord, are they few that are saved? But he said to them: Strive to enter by the narrow gate; for many, I say to you, shall seek to enter, and they shall not be able." (Luke 13:23, 24.) He says that many seek to enter heaven, but do not enter; and why? Because they wish to obtain eternal life without inconvenience, and without making strong efforts to abstain from forbidden pleasures. Therefore, he said: "strive to enter at the narrow gate." The gate of heaven is narrow: to enter it we must labour, and must do violence to ourselves. And we ought to be persuaded that what we can do to-day we shall not be always able to do hereafter. The delay of conversion sends many Christians to hell: the weakness, darkness, and obduracy of the soul are, as we have already said, daily increased, and the divine helps are diminished. Thus, the soul shall die in her sins. You say: I will hereafter return to God. Then you know that, to save your soul, you must renounce sin—why do you not give it up now that God calls you to repentance? If at some time, says St. Augustine, why not now? The time which you now have to repair the past shall not be given to you hereafter; and the mercy which God shows you at present will not be extended to you at a future time. If, then, you wish to save your soul, do immediately what you must one day do. Go to confession as soon as possible, and tremble lest every delay may be the eternal ruin of your soul.

10. "Nullus," says St. Fulgentius, "sub spe misericordiæ debet diutius in peccatis remanere, cum nolit in corpore sub spe diutius ægrotare." (St. Fulg. ad Petr. Diac.) Were a physician, says the saint, to offer you a remedy for sickness, would you say: I do not wish to be cured at present, because I hope to recover hereafter? And when there is a question of the salvation of your soul, you say: I will remain in sin, because I hope that God will be merciful to me at a future time. But if, according to his just judgments, the Lord should not show you mercy hereafter, what shall become of you?—shall you not be damned? Let us, says the Apostle, do good while we have time to do it. "Therefore," whilst we have time let us work good to all men." (Gal. 6:10.) For time may not be given to us to do good hereafter. Hence the Lord exhorts us to guard our souls with great care; because we know not the hour when he will come to demand an account of our life. "Watch ye, therefore, because you know not the day nor the hour." (Matt. 25:18.)

11. "My soul is continually in my hands." (Ps. 118:109.) He who wears on his finger a ring containing a diamond of great value, looks frequently at the ring to see if the diamond be secure: it is thus we ought to watch over our souls. And should we see that it has been lost by sin, we ought instantly to adopt every means in our power to recover it. We ought to turn immediately to Jesus, our Saviour, like Magdalene, who, as soon as she knew that he sat at meat, ran to him, cast herself at his feet, and by her tears obtained pardon. (Luke 7:37.) "Now the axe is laid to the root of the tree." (Luke 3:9.) For all who are found in sin, the axe of divine justice is at hand to take away their life as soon as the time of vengeance arrives. Arise, then Christian souls, and if you are bound by any bad habit, burst your chains, and remain no longer the slaves of Satan. "Loose the bonds from off thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion." (Isa. 52:2.) "Posuisti vestigium," says St. Ambrose, "supra voraginem culpæ, cito aufer pedem." You have placed your foot on the mouth of a vortex—that is, on sin, which is the mouth of hell: take away your foot, and retire; otherwise you shall fall into an unfathomable abyss.

12. I find myself subject to an evil habit. But, if you wish to give up sin, who can force you to commit it? All bad habits and all the temptations of hell are overcome by the grace of God. Recommend yourself to the heart of Jesus Christ, and he will give you grace to conquer all enemies. But should you be in any proximate occasion of sin you must immediately take it away, otherwise you shall relapse. "Potius præscinde," says St. Jerome, "quam solve." Do not wait to loose your bonds gradually; cut them by a single stroke. The devil seeks to make you slow in shaking off your fetters. Look for a good confessor; he will tell you what to do. And should you have the misfortune of falling hereafter into any mortal sin, go immediately to confession, even on the same day or the same night, if you can. Finally, listen to what I now say to you: God is ready to assist you: if you wish, it is in your power to save your souls. Tremble, brethren, lest these words of mine, if you despise them, should be for you so many swords in hell for all eternity.

Sermon LIII

TWENTY-FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER PENTECOST

ON BLASPHEMY

"When, therefore, you shall see the abomination of desolation."—MATT. 24:15.

ALL sins are hateful in the sight of God; but the sin of blasphemy ought more properly to be called an abomination to the Lord. Every mortal sin, as the Apostle says, dishonours God. "By transgression of the law, thou dishonourest God." (Rom. 2:23.) Other sins dishonour God indirectly by the violation of his law; but blasphemy dishonours him directly by the profanation of his most holy name. Hence St. Chrysostom teaches, that no sin exasperates the Lord so much as the sin of blasphemy against his adorable name. "Nihil ita exacerbat Deum, sicut quando nomen ejus blasphematur." Dearly beloved Christians, allow me, then, this day, to show you, first, the great enormity of the sin of blasphemy; and secondly, the great rigour with which God punishes it.

FIRST POINT. ON THE GREAT ENORMITY OF THE SIN OF BLASPHEMY.

1. What is blasphemy? It is the uttering of language injurious to God; it is, according to the definition of theologians, "contumeliosa in Deum locutio;" or, contumely against God. O God! whom does man assail when he blasphemes? He directly attacks the Lord. "He hath strengthened himself against the Almighty." (Job. 15:25.) Are you not afraid, O blasphemer, says St. Ephrem, that fire will come down from heaven and devour you? or that the earth shall open and swallow you up? "Non metuis ne forte ignis de cœlo descendat et devoret te, qui sic os adversus omnipotentem aperis? Neque vereris, ne terra te absorbeat?" (Paren. 3.) The devil, says St. Gregory Nazianzen, trembles at the name of Jesus: and we are not afraid to profane it. "Domones ad Christi nomen exhorrescunt, nos vero nomen adeo venerandum contumelia afficere non veremur." (Orat. xx.) The vindictive assail a man who is their own equal; but, by their blasphemies blasphemers appear to seek revenge against God, who does or permits what is displeasing to them. There is a great difference between an act of contempt towards the portrait of a king, and an insult offered to his person. Man is the image of God; but the blasphemer offends God himself. "He who blasphemes," says St. Athanasius, "acts against the very Deity itself." The man who violates the law is guilty of a crime; but he who attacks the person of his sovereign commits an act of treason; therefore he receives no mercy, but is chastised with the utmost severity. What, then, shall we say of the man who blasphemes and insults the majesty of God? "If," says the high-priest Heli, "one man shall sin against another, God may be appeased in his behalf; but if a man shall sin against the Lord, who shall pray for him?" (1 Kings 2:25.) The sin of blasphemy, then, is so enormous, that the saints themselves appear not to have courage to pray for a blasphemer.

2. Some sacrilegious tongues blaspheme the God who preserves their existence! "Tu Deo benefacienti tibi," says St. Chrysostom, "et tui curam agenti maledicis." O God! you stand with one foot at the gate of hell; and if God, in his marcy, did not preserve your life you should be damned for ever: and, instead of thanking him for his goodness, you, at the very time that he bestows his favours upon you, blaspheme his holy name. "If," says the Lord, "my enemy hath reviled me, I would verily have borne with it. (Ps. 54:13.) Had you treated me with contumely and insult at the time that I chastised you, I would be more willing to bear with your impiety; but you revile me at the time that I confer my favours upon you. O diabolical tongue! exclaims St. Bernardine of Sienna, what could have induced you to blaspheme your God, who has created you, and redeemed you with his blood? "O lingua diabolica, quid, potest te inducere ad blasphemandum Deus tuum qui te plasmavit, qui te pretioso sanguine redemit?" (Serm. xxxiii.) Some expressly blaspheme the name of Jesus Christ—of that God who died on a cross for the love of them. O God! if we were not subject to death, we should be glad to die for Jesus Christ, in order to make some little return of gratitude to a God who gave his life for us. I say, a little return of gratitude; for there is no comparison between the death of a miserable creature, and the death of a God. But instead of loving and blessing this God, you, as St. Augustine says, revile and curse him. "Christ was scourged by the lash of the Jews; but he is not less scourged by the blasphemies of false Christians." (S. Aug. in Joan.) Some have blasphemed and insulted the Virgin Mary, that good mother, who loves us so tenderly, and prays continually for us. Some of these blasphemers have received a horrible chastisement from God. Surius relates, in the 7th August, that a certain impious Christian blasphemed the blessed Virgin, and pierced her image with a dagger. As soon as he went out of the church to which the image belonged, he was struck by a thunderbolt, and reduced to ashes. The infamous Nestorious blasphemed, and induced others to blaspheme, most holy Mary, by asserting that she was not the mother of God. But, before death, his impious tongue was eaten away by worms, and he died in despair.

3. "Who is this who speaketh blasphemies?" (Luke 5:21.) He is a Christian who has received the holy sacrament of baptism, in which his tongue has been in a certain manner consecrated to God. A learned author says, that on the tongue of all who are baptized is placed blessed salt, "that the tongues of Christians may be made, as it were, sacred, and may be accustomed to bless God." (Clericat. tom. 1. Dec. Tract. 52.) And the blasphemer afterwards makes his tongue, as St. Bernardine says, a sword to pierce the heart of God. "Lingua blasphemantis efficitur quasi gladius cor Dei penetrans." (Tom. 4. serm. xxxiii.) Hence the saint adds that no sin contains in itself so much malice as the sin of blasphemy. "Nullum est peccatum quod habet in se tantem iniquitatem sicut blasphemia." St. Chrysostom says, that "there is no sin worse than blasphemy; for in it is the accumulation of all evils, and every punishment." St. Jerome teaches the same doctrine. "Nothing," says the holy doctor, "is more horrible than blasphemy; for every sin, compared with blasphemy, is small." (In Isa. 118.) And here it is necessary to observe, that blasphemies against the saints, against holy things or holidays—such as the sacraments, the Mass, Easter Sunday, Christmas Day, Holy Saturday—are of the same species as blasphemies against God; for St. Thomas teaches, that, as the honour paid to the saints, to holy things, and holidays, is referred to God, so an insult offered to the saints is injurious to God, who is the foundation of sanctity. "Sicut Deus, in Sanctis suis laudatur," as we read in the 150th Psalm, "laudate Dominum in Sanctis ejus, ita et blasphemia in sanctos in Deum redundat." (S. Thom. qu. 13, a 13, a 1, ad 2.) The saint adds, that blasphemy is one of the greatest of the sins against religion. (Ibid. a. 3.)

4. Thus, from the works of St. Jerome we may infer, that blasphemy is more grievous than theft, than adultery, or murder. All other sins, says St. Bernardine proceeds from frailty or ignorance; but the sin of blasphemy proceeds from malice. "Omnia alia peccata vindentur procedere partim ex fragilitate, partim ex ignorantia, sed peccatum blasphemiæ procedit ex propria malitia." (Cic. serm. xxx.) For it proceeds from a bad will, and from a certain hatred conceived against God. Hence the blasphemer renders himself like the damned, who, as St. Thomas says, do not now blaspheme with the mouth—for they have no body,—but with the heart, cursing the divine justice which punishes them. "The detestation of the divine justice is in them an interior blasphemy of the heart." (S. Thom. 2, 2, qu. 13, a. 4.) The saint adds, that we may believe that as the saints in heaven, after the resurrection shall praise God with the tongue, so the reprobates in hell shall also blaspheme him with the tongue. "Et credibile est quod post resurrectionem erit in eis etiam vocalis blasphemiæ sicut in sanctis vocalis laus Dei." Justly, then, has a learned author called blasphemy the language of hell; because, as God speaks by the mouth of the saints so the devil speaks by the mouth of blasphemers. "Blasphemia est peccatum diabolicum, loquela infernalis: sicut enim Spiritus Sanctus loquitur per bonos ita et diabolus per blasphemos." (Mansi. Discors, 7, num. 2.) When St. Peter denied Christ in the Palace of Pilate, and swore that he did not know him, the Jews said, that his language showed that he was a disciple of Jesus, because he spoke the language of his Master. "Surely," they said, "thou also art one of them; for even thy speech doth discover thee." (Matt. 26:73.) Thus we may say to every blasphemer: You are from hell; you are a true disciple of Lucifer; for you speak the language of the damned. St. Antonine writes, that the entire occupation of the damned in hell consists in blaspheming and cursing God. "Non aliud apus inferno exercent nisi blasphemare Deum et maledicere." (Part 2, tit. 7, cap. iii.) In proof of this doctrine the saint adduces the following text of the Apocalypse: "And they gnawed their tongues for pain: and they blasphemed the God of heaven." (Apoc. 16:10, 11.) The holy doctor afterwards adds, that he who indulges in the vice of blasphemy, already belongs to the number of the damned, because he practises their art. "Qui ergo hoc vitio detinetur ostendit se pertinere ad statum damnatorum, ex quo exercet artem corum." (Ibid.)

5. To the malice of blasphemy is added the malice of scandal, which generally accompanies blasphemy; for this sin is ordinarily committed externally and in presence of others. St. Paul reproved the Jews, because by their sins they caused the Gentiles to blaspheme our God, and to laugh at his law. "For the name of God, through you, is blasphemed by the Gentiles." (Rom. 2:24.) But how much more criminal are Christians, who, by their blasphemies, induce other Christians to imitate their example! How does it happen, that in certain provinces blasphemies are never, or at least very seldom, heard, and that in other places this horrible vice is so prevalent, that the Lord may say of them: "My name is continually blasphemed all the day long." (Isa. 52:5.) In the squares, houses, cities, villas, nothing is heard but blasphemies. How does this happen? Some of the inhabitants learn to blaspheme from others: children from their parents, servants from their masters, the young from the old. In some families particularly the vice of blasphemy seems to be transmitted as an inheritance. The father is a blasphemer; hence, the sons and nephews blaspheme: to this inheritance their descendants succeed. O accursed father! Instead of instructing your children to bless the name of God, you teach them to blaspheme him and his saint. "But I reprove them when they blaspheme in my presence." Of what use are these reproofs, when with your own mouth you give them bad example. For God's sake, for God's sake, O fathers of families, never blaspheme; but be particularly on your guard never to blaspheme in presence of your children. This is a crime which God can no longer bear in you. And whenever you hear any of your children utter a blasphemy, reprove them severely, and, in obedience to the advice of St. Chrysostom, strike him on the mouth, and you shall thus sanctify your hand. "Contere os ipsius, manum tuam percussione sanctificat." (Hom. i ad pop.) Certain fathers unmercifully beat a child for the neglect of some temporal business; but if he blaspheme the saints, they either laugh at his blasphemies, or listen to them in silence. St. Gregory relates (Dial. 4, cap. xvii.), that a child of five years, the son of a Roman nobleman, was in the habit of profaning the name of God. The father neglected to correct him; but he one day saw his son pursued by certain black men. The child ran to embrace his father; but they, who were so many devils, killed him in the father's arms, and carried him with them to hell.

SECOND POINT. ON THE GREAT RIGOUR WITH WHICH GOD PUNISHES THE SIN OF BLASPHEMY.

6. "Woe to the sinful nation . . . they have blasphemed the Holy One of Israel." (Isa. 1:4.) Woe to blasphemers, eternal woe to them: for, according to Tobias, they shall be condemned. "They shall be condemned that blaspheme thee." (Job 13:16.) The Lord has said by the mouth of Job, "Thou imitatest the tongue of blasphemers; thy own mouth shall condemn, and not I." (Job 15:5, 6.) In pronouncing the sentence of their condemnation, God will say: It is not I that condemn you to hell; it is your own mouth, with which you have dared to revile me and my saints, that condemns you. Poor miserable blasphemers! They shall continue to blaspheme in hell for their greater torment: their very blasphemies in hell shall always remind them that they are damned for ever in punishment of their blasphemies on earth.

7. But blasphemers are punished not only in hell, but even on this earth. In the Old Law they were stoned by the people. "And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, dying let him die; all the multitude shall stone him." (Lev. 24:16.) In the New Law they were condemned to death by the Emperor Justinian. St. Louis, King of France, ordered them to be punished by perforating their tongue, and by branding their forehead with a red hot iron; and when they afterwards relapsed into blasphemy, he ordained that they should die on the scaffold. (Homo Bon. de cas. res. p. 2, c. i.) Another author says, that the law renders blasphemers (as being infamous) incapable of giving testimony. (Navarr. cons. 11, de offic. ord.) By the constitution of Gregory the Fourteenth, they were deprived of Christian burial. In the Authentica ut non luxur hom., it is said that blasphemies bring on famine, earthquakes, and pestilence. "Propter blasphemias, et fames, et terræmotus et pestilentia fiunt." You, O blasphemer, complain that though you labour and submit to fatigue, you are always in poverty. You say: "I know not why I am always in misery: some malediction must have fallen on my family." No; the blasphemies which you utter are the cause of your wretchedness, and make you always an object of God's malediction.

8. O! how many melancholy examples could I mention of blasphemers who have died a bad death. Father Segneri relates, (Tom. 1, Rag. 8,) that, in Gascony, two men who had blasphemed the blood of Jesus Christ, were soon after killed in a quarrel, and torn to pieces by dogs. In Mexico, a blasphemer being once reproved, answered: "I will hereafter blaspheme more than I have hitherto done." During the night he found his tongue sowed under the palate, and died in that miserable state without giving the least sign of repentance. Dresselius relates, that a certain person was struck blind in the very act of blaspheming. Another, in uttering a blasphemy against St. Anthony, was seized by a flame which issued from the image of the saint, and was burnt alive. In his book against blasphemy, Sarnelli relates, that in Constantinople, a man called Simon Tornaco, who had blasphemed God, began like a mad dog to lacerate his own flesh, and died in his madness. Cantapratensis states (cap. xlviii.), that a person who had been guilty of blasphemy, had his eyes distorted, and that falling on the ground he bellowed like an ox, and continued to roar aloud until he expired. In the Gallician Mercury (lib. x.) we read that a man named Michael, who had been condemned to be hanged, when he felt the pain of the halter, burst out into blasphemies, and died instantly. After death his head fell from the body, and the tongue remained hanging o ut from the neck, as black as coal. I abstain from fatiguing you with other terrible examples: you can find a great many of them in the work of Father Sarnelli against blasphemy.

9. But to conclude. Tell me, O blasphemers, if there be any of you present, what benefit do you derive from your accursed blasphemies? You do not receive pleasure from them. Bellarmine says, that blasphemy is a sin which produces no pleasure. You derive no profit from them; for, as I have already said, your blasphemies are the cause of your poverty and wretchedness. You derive no honour from them; your fellow-blasphemers have a horror of your blasphemies, and call you a mouth of hell. Tell me, then, why you blaspheme. "Father, the habit which I have contracted is the cause of my blasphemies." But can this habit excuse you before God? If a son beat his father, and say to him: "My father, have compassion on me: for I have contracted a habit of beating you:" would the father take pity on him? You say that you blaspheme through the anger caused by your children, your wife, or your master. Your wife or your master put you into a passion, and you take revenge on the saints. What injury have the saints done to you? They intercede before God in your behalf, and you blaspheme them. But "the devil tempts me at that time." If the devil tempts you, follow the example of a certain young man, who, when tempted to blaspheme, went for advice to the Abbot Pemene. The abbot told him, that as often as the devil tempted him to commit this sin, his answer should be: Why should I blaspheme that God who has created me, and bestowed so many benefits upon me? I will for ever praise and bless him. The young man followed the advice, and Satan ceased to tempt him. When you are excited to anger, can you speak nothing but blasphemies? Say on such occasions: "Accursed sin, I hate thee: Lord, assist me: Mary, obtain for me the gift of patience." And if you have hitherto contracted the abominable habit of blaspheming, renew every morning, as soon as you rise, the resolution of doing violence to yourself to abstain from all blasphemies during the day: and then say three Aves to most holy Mary, that she may obtain for you the grace to resist every temptation by which you shall be assailed.

CONCLUSION

NOTICE

This volume is called Miscellany, containing various little works which, with the exception of the Letters to be published subsequently in five volumes, complete the collection of the ascetical works. Before giving these little works, we have thought it well to add briefly an historical sketch of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer as it now exists. This volume comprises all that which in the writings of St. Alphonsus has reference to the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer which he founded, regarded principally as a religious Institute. It will be particularly useful to those in the world who feel themselves called to the religious state, and who are desirous to become fully acquainted with the Institute for the purpose of examining their vocation.

We at first give the CONSTITUTIONS AND RULES OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER. Then follow the COUNSELS CONCERNING A RELIGIOUS VOCATION AND CONSIDERATIONS FOR PERSONS CALLED TO THE RELIGIOUS STATE; which the holy Founder addresses to aspirants, and to all those that wish to know and to follow the road on which divine Providence invites them to walk in order to sanctify themselves and to save their souls.

This part is followed by the EXHORTATIONS TO NOVICES, to fortify them in their holy resolutions, and to warn them against the snares of the enemy of salvation.

Then follow biographical sketches of two Fathers and a lay-brother, whose portraits the holy Founder delineates with his own hand, and whom, it seems, he wishes to hold up as models to all the rest.

Then comes a SERMON ON THE ROSARY, followed by a SERMON ON THE PASSION; NINE DISCOURSES FOR THE TIMES OF CALAMITIES; REFLECTIONS USEFUL TO BISHOPS TO GOVERN WELL THEIR CHURCHES; AND RULES FOR SEMINARIES.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

I. ST. ALPHONSUS BEFORE FOUNDING HIS INSTITUTE

A. D. 1696—1731

ALPHONSUS MARIA de LIGUORI was born, September 27, 1696, of noble and pious parents, Joseph de Liguori and Ann Catharine Cavalieri, at Marianella, the country-house of his family, near Naples. Soon great hopes were entertained in regard to him; for his parents having one day presented him to St. Francis Jerome, this man of God received him into his arms, affectionately blessed him, and then said: "This little one will not die before his ninetieth year; he will be a bishop, and do great things for Jesus Christ." The prophet and the subject of the prophecy were canonized on the same day.

Early one could remark in him those rare qualities with which nature and grace in emulation of each other had favored him. Frivolous amusements were repugnant to him; but he had above all great horror of what might offend God. He delighted in the frequentation of the sacraments and in the other practices of piety to which his mother had trained him. At the age of eleven his method of prayer was more than ordinary. One day, when he was in a country-house with some young companions for the sake of recreation, he withdrew quite alone into a thicket, while the rest were giving themselves up to play. In the evening search had to be made for him, and he was found in a solitary place, on his knees, absorbed in prayer before a small picture of the Blessed Virgin that he had fastened to a laurel tree.

Endowed with an active and penetrating mind, with a prompt and faithful memory, uniting with a perfect docility an ardent desire to acquire knowledge, sustained by an always increasing piety, Alphonsus made in a short time immense progress in belles-lettres, in the sciences and in the arts, the study of which was suitable to his rank, and corresponded to the lofty designs that his father had in regard to him. At the age of sixteen he was declared by acclamation doctor of civil and canon law. The young advocate soon exercised his profession with wonderful success before the tribunals of Naples, without, however, relaxing in the practice of virtue. When he was eighteen years old he conceived an ardent desire to attain sanctity; he joined pious congregations, of which as a member he distinguished himself by his regularity, his fervor, and his zeal for good works. It was his delight to kneel for hours in prayer before the Blessed Sacrament. In order to strengthen and increase his fervor still more, he went every year to some religious house to make the spiritual exercises.

His father, who was anxious to establish him in the world, proposed to him several most brilliant matrimonial alliances; but Alphonsus felt only aversion for marriage: and God, who had other designs in regard to him, did not delay to make him entirely disgusted with the world, from which he had already become so detached as to wish to renounce his birthright. In 1723 he undertook a very important suit. After having examined with the greatest care the minutest details of the case, he believed that he would surely succeed. God, however, permitted him to overlook an essential point, which secured the victory to the adverse party; for on the day on which the case was tried, after pleading in so brilliant a manner that it appeared as if the suit would be decided in his favor, he was obliged to acknowledge that he had made a mistake. Then, full of confusion, but at the same time enlightened by an interior light, he felt a lively sense of the vanity of the things of the world, as well as of the dangers of his profession as lawyer, and gave up the bar forever.

This was not enough. On August 28 of the same year, after having, according to his custom, exercised his charity to the sick poor in the hospital of the Incurables, he saw himself suddenly surrounded with resplendent light, and a heavenly voice repeated: "Forsake the world, and give thyself entirely to me." Recognizing the voice of God, who called him to a higher perfection, and strengthened interiorly by grace Alphonsus replied with tears of tenderness: "O Lord! here I am: do with me what Thou pleasest." He at once proceeded to the Church of our Lady of Mercy; there he prostrated himself before the altar of the Blessed Virgin, and consecrated himself unreservedly to God's service, promising to enter the Congregation of the Oratorians; then unbuckling his sword, he laid it at the feet of Mary as a pledge of his irrevocable resolution.

His father, who was greatly afflicted at this change, tried every means to prevent him from taking such a step; but as Alphonsus remained unshaken in his pious design, he finally permitted him to embrace the ecclesiastical state, provided, however, he did not leave the paternal mansion. October 23, 1723, the young lawyer, at the age of twenty-seven, joyfully laid aside the livery of the world in order to clothe himself in the livery of Jesus Christ; and three years later, December 21, 1726, after having diligently applied all his noble faculties and all the ardor of his soul to acquire the science and the virtues that make up apostolic men, he was promoted to the priesthood.

He at once devoted himself to the exercise of his holy ministry with wonderful success. In 1725, when scarcely ordained subdeacon, he had associated himself with the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions, or of the Propaganda, established at Naples; and in 1729, leaving the paternal house, he withdrew to the house of the Holy Family of the Chinese mission, in order to be more free to consecrate himself to his labors and to the practice of the austerities that he wished to impose upon himself. He did an immense deal of good, first, at Naples among all classes of society, but above all among the poor workmen, of whom he was especially fond. He then went through the villages and hamlets, making war upon vice by holy missions, and reanimating everywhere faith, piety, and good morals. More than once the Mother of God was pleased to second his zeal in a striking manner.

II. THE SAINT ESTABLISHES HIS CONGREGATION

A. D. 1731—1732

In the month of May, 1732, Alphonsus, exhausted by great fatigue, was induced by several ecclesiastics, his friends and usual companions, to retire with them for some time into the country, to take a little rest in solitude and prayer; and upon an invitation that was given to them, they went to Saint Mary's of the Mount, a hermitage situated in the neighborhood of Scala.[14126] When they had ornamented their chapel and placed therein the Blessed Sacrament in order to satisfy their piety, there came to them a crowd of shepherds from the surrounding country—poor people, who, deprived of all spiritual help, lived in such ignorance of the things of God, that they were not in a fit state to make their confession. Alphonsus felt his apostolic heart deeply moved when he saw this concourse of abandoned souls whom God was sending to him. With his companions he began to instruct and dispose them to receive the sacraments, so that the rest that he had come to seek in this place became a laborious mission, which produced marvellous fruits among all the people. He would then have wished to find some means to give assistance to so many lost sheep that were abandoned even in so Catholic a country!

The whole city of Scala was delighted to hear of the good that was done at St. Mary's. In order to respond to the desire that was expressed of hearing the holy missionary preach, the bishop invited Alphonsus to come at least once to preach a sermon in his cathedral; and the saint consented to do so. There was in this place a Community of fervent religious under the title of the Religious of the Holy Saviour; these manifested the same desire, and he gave them a conference. The people became so desirous of tasting the fruits of such apostolic preaching, that Alphonsus at his departure had to promise that he would return in the month of September to preach a novena in the cathedral, and afterwards to give a retreat to the nuns. This was done to the entire satisfaction of every one.

It is thus that the Lord was gradually conducting his servant to the end that his Providence had in view. Among the religious of the Holy Saviour there was one that was very far advanced in spirituality. Her name was Mary Celestine Crostarosa, whom God favored with extraordinary graces. On the 3d of October she saw in spirit a new Congregation of missionaries who were evangelizing a multitude of poor country people deprived of all spiritual help; Alphonsus was at their head, and she heard a voice saying to her: "It is this soul whom I have chosen to be the instrument of my glory in this great work." In an interview that she afterwards had with the saint, she communicated to him her vision by assuring him that God required this of him. Alphonsus, troubled and confused by hearing such a revelation, refused to take the matter seriously, and said that such a thing was impossible; but the religious, while humbling herself, did not cease to persist that such was the will of God.

After this conversation, Alphonsus, having become a prey to terrible agitation, shut himself up in his room, where he began to shed a torrent of tears. He saw himself plunged into extreme perplexity. On the one hand, lie considered that there was question of a good work; he had to admit that the vision of this humble religious could come from God; he recalled to mind the consolation that he felt at the hermitage of St. Mary's; he experienced more strongly than ever his interior attraction to a similar undertaking; and he feared to resist a divine vocation. On the other hand, lie saw insurmountable difficulties: he found himself alone, without resources, and the idea of being a founder frightened his humility. A young and worthy priest, John Mazzini, his intimate friend, who accompanied him, perceived his painful state of mind, and asked him the cause of it. When he learned about what there had been question, he saw therein a work that was to be most pleasing to Jesus Christ; then fully convinced that if it were God's will he would furnish the necessary means, he generously placed himself at the disposal of the saint, as his first companion in the enterprise. This afforded great consolation to Alphonsus, and restored his serenity.

There was then at Scala Mgr. Falcoia, Bishop of Castellammare, a prelate of well-tried sanctity and skilled in spirituality. The two friends judged it proper to consult him as well as the Bishop of Scala about this matter. After a close examination the two prelates agreed that the inspiration came from God, and they urged Alphonsus to hasten the execution of the project. The saint, however, did not wish yet to decide. He did not omit to pray, and to have as many prayers said as possible; to these prayers he united the most rigorous austerities, in order to obtain the light and the protection of heaven.

On his return to Naples lie rendered an account of all that had occurred to his spiritual director, Father Pagano of the Oratory. This prudent man, after having maturely considered the matter proposed, saw in it only the work of God; but not wishing to be the only judge in so grave an affair, he urged Alphonsus to ask the advice of Abbé Cutica, a Lazarist; of Father Manulio, a Jesuit; and above all of Father Fiorillo, a Dominican; for these were most competent authorities in such matters. All agreed that the finger of God was in this project, and that it should be encouraged. Fathers Fiorillo and Pagano then counselled the new founder to place himself entirely under the guidance of Mgr. Falcoia—a counsel that was supported by the Blessed Virgin herself. From this moment the saint had no longer any doubt, and his resolution was formed. He put himself unreservedly into the hands of the learned and pious Bishop of Castellammare by engaging himself by a formal vow to obey him in all things. It was thus that, full of confidence in Jesus Christ and in his divine Mother, he launched upon the boisterous waves in which his frail vessel was to be unceasingly agitated by storms.

As soon as our saint's determination became known at Naples, the news produced a revolution against him in most minds; as a general thing, he was spoken of only with contempt or indignation as a visionary who gave himself up to foolish under-takings. His relatives and his old friends, especially those of the Congregation of the Propaganda and of the Chinese College, became his enemies; he was abused in every possible manner. This was the beginning of his trials; but Heaven soon showed that he was not abandoned. This outcry against him spread, and penetrated even the convent of the Holy Saviour at Scala, in which one of the religious one day said, in the presence of Sister Mary Celestine, that she had serious doubts in regard to the work about which so much was spoken. Sister Celestine, however, answered her in ecstatic transport: "It is the work of God; you will recognize it as such by its effects." "Yes," replied the incredulous religious, "I will believe it when our Sister Magdalene is cured." Hardly were the words uttered when this poor Sister Magdalene, who had been deranged for many years, perfectly recovered her senses.

Very great was the regret felt at Naples on account of the intended departure of Alphonsus, on whom had been founded great hopes, and it was rightly feared that other most esteemed subjects would follow him; hence every means was tried to dissuade him from his purpose. His parents, on their part, were extremely afflicted; for his father one day seized him in his arms and held him close to his heart for three hours. But all was in vain; what should naturally have shaken his constancy, only confirmed him more and more in his resolution.

Finally, on November 8, 1732, freed from all obstacles, the holy founder modestly left the capital and set out for Scala, where the bishop, the clergy, and all the people received him with joy. Several of his companions, whom he expected, came to join him on the same day. The dwelling prepared for him was very simple, very small, and very poor, and was destitute even of what was most necessary. Jesus Christ, however, was with them, and filled them with consolation. The day after their arrival all assembled in the cathedral, and after a prolonged meditation, the Mass of the Holy Ghost was chanted in thanksgiving to God. Thus began the Congregation which they styled "CONGREGATION OF THE HOLY SAVIOUR," [14127] placing it under the protection of the chief of all missionaries.

III. FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE INSTITUTE TILL THE APPROBATION OF THE RULES

A.D. 1732–1749

The rising Community labored with great ardor to establish itself. Some new subjects increased the number of members; but two of them, John Mazzini and Januarius Sarnelli, on whom the holy founder mostly depended to help him in beginning his work, were not able to join him at once. All were animated with a good spirit, but this spirit was not the same in all, for when there was question of establishing the groundwork of the Institute, there were manifested among them irreconcilable differences of opinion. Alphonsus, faithful to his divine vocation, wished to apply himself only to the exercise of the apostolic ministry; but most of his companions desired that the education of youth should also be connected therewith. All the efforts that Alphonsus made could not conquer their obstinacy, and the dispute ended in the withdrawal of all except two of them. This was the situation of affairs after four months' stay at Scala.

When those that were opposed to the new Congregation heard of this unfortunate issue, they felt triumphant, being persuaded that it was all over with such an enterprise, which they had looked upon as foolish. The blow was indeed crushing; but Alphonsus, without allowing himself to be dejected, humbled himself profoundly before God, and fortified by grace, made a vow, binding under the penalty of grievous sin, to devote himself during his whole life, even though he might be left quite alone, to the salvation of the most abandoned souls. His director could not but admire his heroic act, and Heaven blessed it. This was another victory over hell; and it was a decisive victory. Little by little other subjects arrived who were truly stones chosen to constitute the foundations of the edifice; and Alphonsus could resume those so fertile apostolic labors, that needed but to be extended in order to produce everywhere more and more abundant fruits, in the midst of every kind of opposition that was constantly raised by the enemy of all good.

In 1734, in the month of March, the Bishop of Caiazzo established in his diocese a house of the Congregation, in a place called Villa,[14128] where there was a church dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

The following year, in April of 1735, saw the establishment of another foundation, which became more important and more solid than the first two. It was that of the Blessed Trinity at Ciorani,[14129] due to the generosity of a worthy priest, Andrew Sarnelli, brother of Januarius. In 1737 a violent persecution arose against the house at Villa, and the holy founder resolved to abandon it. This was done June 10. The same thing took place later on at Scala; the Fathers relinquished it August 24, 1738.

The whole Congregation became thus reunited at Ciorani, its only establishment during four years. It was yet, so to speak, in its infancy, only forming a reunion of pious and zealous missionaries, without any formal engagement, under the guidance of a beloved and venerated chief, their father, their master, and their model, who, little by little, disposed them to constitute the religious family that he had in view in accordance with their vocation. In 1742 the holy founder believed that the moment had arrived when the Rule of the Congregation should be definitely established, and on July 22, the feast of St. Mary Magdalene, all the members of the Institute formally accepted this Rule by pronouncing the simple religious vows with the vow and oath of perseverance till death. The Congregation assumed then greater stability and made further progress.

In the same year, October 13, was opened the celebrated house of Nocera,[14130] situated in the suburb, and called Pagani. The church that was afterwards built there in the midst of great opposition, was dedicated to the archangel St. Michael, who did not cease to protect it. The whole Congregation was not only persecuted without intermission, but each house had to submit to special trials, and at this time the attack was even carried as far as Rome; but it served only to make the holy founder and his work better known and esteemed.

In December, 1744, after a mission given at Iliceto,[14131] there was offered him an old church dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, under the title of Our Lady of Consolation, with an old convent situated about a league and a half from the city, that he might establish there a house of his Institute. The offer was at accepted. At first the novices were sent to this new foundation; but the extreme poverty that reigned there was the reason why in February, 1747. they were withdrawn and sent back to Ciorani.

Another sanctuary of Mary, under the title of Mother of God, situated at Caposele, was also offered to St. Alphonsus for a foundation, which was accepted June 4, 1746.

The Congregation had at this time four houses, each of which had been established with the special sanction of the king; the Institute, however, had not yet been formally approved, and had no legal existence in the eyes of the government; and this was the reason of the incessant attacks made upon it by its enemies. Hence in the summer of 1747, and at the beginning of 1748, the holy founder set out for Naples in order to have his Congregation acknowledged and approved by sovereign authority. He did all in his power and spared no pains to attain his end; but the current of politics was at that time against Religious Orders: he was allowed the maintenance of what existed, with the promise of royal protection.

He was more successful at Rome, where he solicited with still greater interest the same favor from the Holy See; for it was above all important that his work should be invested with the solemn and authentic approbation of the Church. In November, 1748, Father Villani was sent to the Eternal City to urge on the successful issue of this most important matter. Everything having been maturely examined and discussed in the Congregation of the Council, the requisite decree was finally presented to Benedict XIV. The Sovereign Pontiff remarked that the title "of Holy Saviour" given to the new Institute was precisely that of the Chapter of Regulars existing at Venice, and he ordained that the name Holy Saviour be replaced by that of Holy Redeemer. Finally, by a brief dated February 25, 1749, he approved and confirmed by his apostolic authority the Constitutions and the Rules of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, raised by this act to the rank of the religious Institutes throughout the Church. One could not express how much this happy event rejoiced the heart of the holy founder and of his children, as well as of all those that were the friends of the good work.

IV. FROM THE APPROBATION OF THE RULES TILL THE SECOND GENERAL CHAPTER

A. D. 1749–1764

The high approbation given by the Holy See reflected new glory upon the Congregation. Those that had not known it or had but little appreciated it up to that time, were desirous of learning more about it. It was eulogized, and its good reputation extended very far. God sent to it many subjects, among whom were found priests of great merit; and it could thus enlarge the circle of its good deeds.

But before resuming their apostolic labors the Fathers had to constitute themselves canonically by virtue of the approved Rule. Hence in the month of October of 1749 all the Fathers of the four houses assembled in General Chapter at Ciorani. First, those that were in office handed in their resignation; St. Alphonsus gave the first example, although the Pope had confirmed him in the office of perpetual Rector Major. The Rules were then read, and each one renewed his vows. Then after a retreat of three days they proceeded to the elections. It is needless to say that the holy founder was re-elected Superior-General, and confirmed unanimously in this office; the other elections followed in accordance with what is prescribed. Finally the statutes and the most necessary rules were drawn up in order to assure the execution and faithful application of the Rule in its main details.

At this time, thanks to the generosity of the inhabitants of Nocera, it was also a source of happiness to the Fathers to be able to transfer to this house the students hitherto kept jointly with the novices at Ciorani, when both had become more and more numerous.

The temporal existence of the Congregation was, however continually threatened. The saint had still to proceed several times to Naples, in order to dissipate the new calumnies that had been raised against it. Not satisfied with having fully vindicated it and with making others appreciate the good that it was effecting, he again undertook by great and painful efforts to have it approved by the government; but all that he obtained was a half measure, namely, a royal decision, dated November 9, 1752, that maintained its four houses, but did not recognize them as religious Communities.

About this time the services of the missionaries of the Most Holy Redeemer were very much in demand in the State of Benevento, belonging to the Holy See. The Archbishop offered them a house at Sant' Angelo, and they were installed there, April 6, 1755. This was the first establishment outside of the territory of the Neapolitan Government.

The same desire manifested itself in many dioceses of the kingdom; but the necessary permission could not be obtained. It was, however, obtained at last by the Bishop of Girgenti, in Sicily, where the Fathers arrived, December 10, 1761, to begin a new foundation.

Thus, in 1762, the Congregation, after thirty years of labor, of continual struggle, possessed six houses, each of which numbered twenty excellent missionaries. Moreover, a good number of young men, full of the happiest dispositions, were diligently applying themselves to their studies so as to prepare themselves for the priesthood. They werc$_4$distributed among the different houses: in one house they devoted themselves to the study of the humanities, to which the holy founder attached great importance; in another, they were taught philosophy and history; in another, dogmatic theology; and finally, in another, moral theology. This course comprised all the other sciences that usually complete the training of evangelical laborers. In every house regular observance flourished in a most edifying manner. The Fathers could not satisfy all the demands that were continually addressed to them for missions, novenas, and other apostolic labors. Their services were required chiefly in poor country places, yet also in cities in which special retreats were often given to ecclesiastics, to seminarians, to the candidates or ordination, to nuns, to religious, to Congregations, to the nobility, to soldiers, etc. Heaven blessed all these works, which produced wonderful fruits.

The holy founder had reached old age, broken down much more by trials, by fatigue, and by infirmities than by his years He had no other thought than how he might perfect his cherished work by putting the finishing touch to it in another General Chapter that was to complete the interior organization of the Institute. Such was his intention, which he wished to carry out before his death, when on March 9, 1762, he was as it were struck by a thunderbolt on hearing that Clement XIII. had appointed him Bishop of St. Agatha of the Goths. He had before been chosen for the Archiepiscopal See of Palermo, and he was able to escape this dignity; but this time he was obliged to submit to the formal order of the Sovereign Pontiff, and he was consecrated June 20, at Rome. His children, however, succeeded in obtaining the permission for him to retain his title and office of Rector Major of the Congregation. This greatly consoled him; for in his humility he was convinced that God had removed him from his spiritual family on account of his sins. He named Father Andrew Villani his Vicar-General of the Institute, to take his place in regard to the supervision and dispatch of ordinary and pressing business; yet he did not himself cease to govern his dear family in Jesus Christ, as we may see in the collection of his letters.

In 1764, when the second General Chapter could be convened, the saint went to Nocera to begin it on September 3. He presided over this assembly, in which, under his inspiration and direction, there was canonically regulated, even to the smallest details, all that could be desired for the wise government of the Institute; and on October 15, the feast of St. Teresa, his venerated patroness, he closed the Chapter with thanksgiving to God. The important acts of this Chapter may in some way be regarded as the crowning of his work.

V. FROM THE SECOND GENERAL CHAPTER TILL THE DEATH OF ST. ALPHONSUS

A.D. 1764–1787

After the year 1764, it seemed that the Congregation, having reached the stage of a perfect body, needed but to extend and to multiply its fruits of salvation; and this it did in fact, but always in the midst of sufferings, in continual combats, and cruel and bitter sorrows. About this time two men of great influence, Francis Anthony Maffei at Iliceto, and Nicholas Sarnelli. Baron of Ciorani, the brother of Andrew and of Januarius Sarnelli, declared themselves the mortal enemies of the Congregation. Having conspired with each other, and sustained by impious and self-interested men in the kingdom, they did all in their power and used every means to put an end to the Congregation; through their machinations it was for twelve years kept between life and death.

In the month of July, 1767, the danger became so great that the holy bishop was himself obliged to proceed to Naples. He had no difficulty in dissipating the clouds of calumny that had gathered, and the enemies of the Institute were covered with confusion; but their discomfiture rendered them more furious, and they meditated new conspiracies.

In the month of February, 1769, the storm burst upon the house at Girgenti in Sicily, which had already been placed in a critical situation on account of the death of the bishop; for this event deprived them of the means of subsistence. The Congregation had, besides, to suffer from the cruel malady that afflicted the holy founder since the month of August, 1768. Towards the end of 1771 he decided to withdraw his missionaries from Sicily, to the great sorrow of the clergy and of the people—not, however, without the hope of seeing them return.

This bitterness was sweetened by the esteem and sympathy that the Congregation enjoyed among all good people, as well as by the blessings that Heaven shed upon its labors. In 1773 its missionaries were called to the Campagna of Rome, where they were so well liked that the people were anxious to retain them. St. Alphonsus accepted a house at Scifelli,[14132] under the title of St. Cecilia, in the diocese of Veroli. The following year he accepted another at Frosinone, under the title of Our Lady of Grace, belonging to the same diocese; and there was question about several other new foundations, but for want of sufficient resources they could not be accepted. A house might have even been established at Rome, in accordance with the wish of Clement XIV., but the saint thought that the time marked by Providence had not yet arrived.

The houses established in the Pontifical States were a source of great consolation and encouragement to the Congregation; on them the holy founder rested his hopes for the Future, because regular observance, free from the difficulties that impeded it elsewhere, could flourish in them in all its fulness. In the kingdom of Naples even the existence of his Institute was always menaced. The king, however, recognizing the justice of its cause, and yielding to the solicitations of the inhabitants of Girgenti, authorized the return of the Fathers to Sicily, and they re-entered it in the month of April, 1775.

Three months afterwards, July 27, St. Alphonsus having obtained from Pius VI. permission to resign his episcopal office, returned to his dear house at Nocera, there to pass the rest of his days in the midst of the severest trials. He had predicted that he would die in his Congregation, and that he would then be no more Superior;—a prediction that he renewed six months after his return to Nocera, at the moment when he was thought to be dying. “Do not fear,” he said to those around him, “I shall not yet die; for God wishes me to die under obedience, and not in the capacity of Rector Major.”

He did not long enjoy repose. On October 3 the government ordered that the suit against the Congregation should begin in all its forms. It was now thought that all was over with the Congregation. Its enemies triumphed; but the holy founder put his trust in God by having recourse to prayer with all his subjects, without however neglecting the ordinary means of defence.

During this long war God did not leave him without consolation. The Redemptorists were asked for by the inhabitants of Benevento, although the Fathers had an establishment at Sant’ Angelo. The saint disliked to settle his Fathers in the centre of so large a city; but he had to yield to the entreaties of the Cardinal Archbishop, which were strengthened by the approval of the Sovereign Pontiff. The Fathers were solemnly installed, June 6, 1777, on the feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Towards the end of the same year Pius VI. granted to the missionaries of the whole Congregation the same privileges that the Passionists enjoyed in their missions.

The enemies of the Congregation profited, on their part, by the months and the years during which the suit lasted, in order to combine their plans, to win accomplices, and to draw up a list of base accusations for the purpose of defaming and destroying it; but divine Providence watched over it, powerful friends Intervened in its favor, and the saintly bishop remembered that he had been a lawyer. In 1779 he presented to the king in justification a memorial that he had written himself. On August 21, after an impartial examination of the cause, Ferdinand IV. rendered a decision that authorized again, and in a more explicit manner, the four houses of the kingdom with their Superiors, as well as the house of studies and the novitiate. Moreover, on October 22, having obtained from Pius VI the graces and the privileges of the jubilee, the king chose the children of St. Alphonsus to announce this favor to his people, with the promise to recompense them for their labors, "in consideration of their zeal to spread everywhere the principles of sound morality, that ought to regulate the life of the good Christian and the good citizen." This prince thereby gave them a striking proof of his esteem, of his confidence, and of his protection. This was not yet a formal approbation of the Institute; but it was enough to disconcert and discourage its enemies. It is needless to mention the joy and thankfulness with which the whole Congregation received this news.

The wise and saintly old man profited by the first moment of calm in order to reanimate the zeal for regular observance, asking only that his work might be left in a good state before he died; but this calm was soon followed by a new storm and a real disaster.

Circumstances were thought to be favorable to make a new attempt to obtain from the king the important favor that had been solicited for so many years, namely, the recognition of the Rule approved by Benedict XIV. Father Maione, Consultor—General, represen ted the Congregation at Naples, and all were satisfied with the manner in which everything had been hitherto done. He was charged with negotiating this delicate affair, by receiving all the necessary powers, being a man in whom all had full confidence. But through a motive of prudence which was thought to be well founded, he asked and obtained that all the Consultors, as well as the Rector Major, should bind themselves under oath to keep his enterprise a profound secret.

Unfortunately, yielding on this occasion to wrong-headedness Father Maione proved faithless. Having persuaded Father Cimino, also a Consultor General who accompanied him, to enter into his views, he had the fatal temerity to take upon himself the modification of the Rule by introducing into it grave and arbitrary changes, without doubt to accommodate it to his own ideas and to those who took the lead in the government.

When everything had been thus arranged in the month of September, 1779, Father Maione boldly presented his scheme to St. Alphonsus; but it was so badly written that the poor old man, full of sufferings, could not decipher it, and was obliged to send it to Father Villani, his Vicar and confessor, that he might report his opinion to him. The Father was amazed at seeing the Rule altered in this way; but perceiving that great inconveniences would arise on both sides, and blinded to the consequences of his act, he had not the courage to make the truth known. He therefore answered that all was well; and the saint, relying upon the word of his Vicar, who was at the same time his confessor, gave his consent. Thereupon Father Maione easily obtained the royal approbation of this pretended copy of the Rule.

The new Rule, approved since the month of January, 1780, was not forwarded to Nocera till the 27th of February. St. Alphonsus was informed of it on the following day, and was struck with consternation at seeing the changes that had been made; and when the news of this sad affair spread among the houses of the Institute, it caused general confusion: every one was indignant at the conduct of the two Consultors, and even at the holy founder himself. For these evils the saint found no other remedy than what might bring on a still greater evil, namely, the convening of a General Chapter.

There was then at Frosinone a restless and turbulent yet able spirit named Leggio, who nourished a secret ill-feeling against the saint, his Superior. He knew how to profit by the confusion which then existed in order to wound the bosom of his mother and the heart of his father. Assuming the mask of zeal, he succeeded in forming a dominant party in the houses of the Pontifical States, and persuaded them to ask of Rome the permission to hold a special Chapter, and to choose a Superior to be independent of the authority of the holy founder, whose character they did not fail to blacken as much as they could. They were, however, obliged to send their deputies to the General Chapter convoked at Nocera; and Leggio was of the number.

When this assembly was opened on May 12, one could see that trouble and discord would ensue. The six Consultors were deposed. St. Alphonsus was compelled to resign his office, and this he did with profound humility; but he was reelected Rector Major, and as his Vicar was nominated Father Bartholomew Corrado, who accepted this charge only at the command of the saint.

On his return to Frosinone, Leggio, who was dissatisfied with the result, pursued his project of separation. He went to Rome, where he carried on his intrigue so well that he succeeded in obtaining a favorable hearing from the Cardinals and even from the Pope himself, and in throwing discredit upon St. Alphonsus, who, owing to a singular concourse of circumstances, was placed in the position of not being able to defend himself. Thus deceived, God having permitted this, Pius VI. rendered a decision, dated September 22, by which he declared that Father Francis de Paul was named President of the houses situated in the Pontifical States, with all the powers of Rector Major, and that the other houses, not belonging any more to the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, were deprived of the favors of the Holy See. The holy founder thus saw himself excluded from his own Institute. His affliction was extreme; but he humbly resigned himself to the will of God, and hastened to write to Father Francis de Paul, to express his submission to him as to his Superior.

It was remarkable that during all these troubles the missionaries of the Congregation did not fail to labor with wonderful success in the kingdom of the two Sicilies, as well as in the Pontifical States. What above all afflicted the heart of the saint was the privation of the spiritual faculties that the missionaries had before enjoyed; for the faculties having been reduced to the simple powers given by the Bishops, they were not able to do so much good. He adopted various means to recover the good graces of the Holy See; the Cardinal Archbishop of Benevento and other prelates interceded in his favor; but so strong were the prejudices against him that all was useless. Father Leggio, who was always in high credit at Rome, paralyzed all his efforts.

But God permitted evil only in order that good might be drawn from it; and this alleviated the distress of mind into which the holy founder was plunged. The Congregation being divided in so unequal a manner, the favors that were enjoyed by the houses situated in the Pontifical States attracted thither many subjects from the kingdom of Naples, and this aided the extension of the Institute. Besides, in 1781, Pius VI., happy in being able to propagate it, bestowed upon it, even in Rome itself, the house and the church of St. Julian, near St. Mary Major; then he founded a house at Gubbio, another at Spello near Foligno; and there was also question of a foundation at Ravenna.

On the other hand, many Neapolitan Bishops seeing with regret what was going on, and reflecting on the injury that was being done to their dioceses, addressed to Rome respectful claims, in which they eulogized the missionaries and their venerated chief, and gave testimony of their perfect innocence. Moreover, the Nuncio of the Holy See at Naples, who had been charged to make an exact inquiry, at last sent in his report, which arrived October 17, 1782, and completely justified their conduct. Then the dark clouds were scattered; the Sovereign Pontiff acceded to the request made by St. Alphonsus in the month of March of the following year, and bestowed upon his missionaries the spiritual favors of which they had been deprived for two years and a half.

Peace was now established both on the part of Rome and on the part of Naples, where at this time the recent suit was brought to an end; but the Congregation remained still divided. During this same year, 1783, the Fathers of the kingdom of Naples elected for the Coadjutor of St. Alphonsus, with the right of succession, Father Villani. In 1785, on the 15th October, those of the Pontifical States assembled by the authority of the Pope, and elected for their Rector Major Father Francis de Paul; then those of Girgenti imitated them by choosing Father Blasucci to be the Superior in Sicily. The saint one day said: "I have been wishing to see things arranged during my life; this I have asked, and am still asking the Blessed Virgin every day; but it is not the will of God.

Things will be arranged, but only after my death." He finished his glorious career August 1,1787, after blessing all his children.

He left twelve houses well established; namely, four in the kingdom of Naples, that is, at Ciorani, at Nocera, at Iliceto, and at Caposele; one at Girgenti in Sicily; and seven in the Pontifical States, that is, at Sant' Angelo, at Benevento at Scifelli, at Frosinone, at Rome, at Gubbio, and at Spello. These houses were poor, and divided in regard to their government but were rich in good subjects, and were united by the same Rule, the same spirit, the same zeal as well as by the same love, and the same veneration for their glorious founder, who from heaven was going to watch over his Institute, and to direct it by his spirit till the end of the world, according to his prophecy and the promise that he made.

VI. FROM THE DEATH OF ST. ALPHONSUS TILL THE DEATH OF BLESSED FATHER CLEMENT MARIA HOFBAUER

A. D. 1787–1820

In order to establish itself outside of Italy the Congregation had still to pass through many vicissitudes. The life of Blessed Clement Hofbauer,[14133] who in 1784 was called in a marvellous way to be a member of the Institute, resembled very much the life of St. Alphonsus, whose great work he was to continue and to propagate. At the end of 1787, with his friend Father Thaddeus Hubl, he departed from Frosinone for Warsaw, where the Apostolic Nuncio received them with joy, and the king had the Church of St. Benno assigned to them; hence they were called Bennonites. They were at once able to begin their labors, owing to the Germans who frequented this church, and whose language they spoke. Their work was so successful, that it appeared to be a continual mission, to which people of all nations were constantly flocking.

During this time the happy change predicted by the holy founder was accomplished in Italy. Ferdinand IV., by a decree of October 29, 1790, permitted the houses in his kingdom to observe the Rule approved by Benedict XIV., and by another decree consented to their reunion with the Fathers of the Pontifical States. On his part, Pius VI., on August 5, 1791, authorized this reunion, and wished that in a General Chapter there should be elected by common consent the Rector Major; this was done, for Father Blasucci was chosen Rector Major of the whole Institute. But as he resided in the kingdom of Naples, it became too difficult for the Fathers of Warsaw to correspond directly with him; therefore in 1793 he appointed Blessed Clement Hofbauer his Vicar-General for the countries of the North, communicating to him with some exceptions all his powers.

At Warsaw there was very great suffering caused by extreme poverty; nevertheless the house became filled after a short time with excellent Polish, German, and French subjects. God blessed this work by manifest signs. About the year 1794, Blessed Clement Hofbauer was able to settle some of his missionaries at Mittau in Courland, where they had been in request for a long time. Soon after he formed two other establishments in Poland—at Lukow and Radomyn. But persecutions, as always, had to arise, and they had to be expected, especially at this time, when the governments were anything but disposed to favor religious Institutes. In 1798, the Russian Government, on which Courland depended, forbade all the religious to communicate with their confreres outside the empire.

On the other hand, the Prussian Government, which had become master of Warsaw, prohibited religious profession before the age of twenty-four; this compelled Blessed Clement Hofbauer to adopt measures to have a novitiate elsewhere. In 1803 Providence furnished him with a house at Iestetten in Switzerland, on the Rhine, in the neighborhood of Schaffhausen. To this place he sent as Superior Father Joseph Passerat. But during several years the Fathers did nothing but encamp, now in this place, now in that: for example, in 1805, at Triberg, a village of the Black Forest; then at Babenhausen, which soon after passed into the hands of Bavaria; in 1806, at the monastery of St. Lucius, near Coire; in 1807, at Viege, in the Valais. The wolves everywhere followed the flock that had been intrusted to Father Passerat, and gave it no rest.

While it was with difficulty that the Fathers could find in the Valais the means of subsistence, desolation reigned elsewhere At Warsaw, in 1808, the house was suppressed by violence all the members of the Community were sent away by force, then dispersed The other establishments also ceased to exist; that of Radomyn had already been abandoned; that of Lukow met with a fate like that of the mother-house; and that of Mittau was closed by the Russian Government. Blessed Clement retired to Vienna, where the Archbishop appointed him, in 1809, Rector of the Italian church.

This same year, 1809, the French having invaded the States of the Holy See, the houses that were there were soon suppressed, with the exception of the house of Scifelli, in which the Fathers by a special protection of God were able to live together and exercise their ministry. The Congregation saw itself almost at death's door, while the Sovereign Pontiff, stripped of all his possessions, was an exile and a captive.

At Vienna Blessed Clement exercised with apostolic zeal and with much fruit the office that had been confided to him by the Archbishop, but he did not abandon his own work; the government being ignorant that he was a religious, allowed him to correspond with his confreres, who had been dispersed. Father Passerat with his students supported himself as well as he could at Viege; but in 1810, the French Empire having taken possession of the Valais, he saw himself forced to remove, and withdrew in 1811 to the canton of Friburg, where in the following year an asylum was, to a certain extent, procured for him at Farvagnies.

In 1813, Blessed Clement Hofbauer became Director of the Ursuline Sisters at Vienna, and continued his apostolic ministry in their little church. The following year, after so many trials, the Institute began finally to revive; Pius VII., delivered by the hand of Providence, entered his States, and the Redemptorists partly recovered what belonged to them. In 1815 the Holy Father gave them at Rome the house of Our Lady of the Assumption in Monterone to replace that of St. Julian. At this time Blessed Clement Hofbauer sent some of his missionaries to Wallachia, where for six years they accomplished much good.

The year 1816 was a glorious year for the Congregation, which attracted to itself the attention of the whole world. September 15 its illustrious founder was declared Blessed, and judged worthy of public veneration. This event reanimated the joy and the hopes of all its children. But during the same year the Congregation lost its chief, Father Blasucci, who had been Rector Major for twenty-five years. He was replaced the following year by Father Nicholas Mansione.

A little while afterwards the Congregation was able to make some progress. In 1818 the cantonal government of Friburg formally recognized the Institute, and permitted Father Passerat to reunite his companions in the old Trappist convent of Valsanta.

At Vienna, the following year, divine Providence arranged a still more important success, which was brought about in an unexpected manner. The police discovered that Blessed Clement Hofbauer belonged to a religious Institute not recognized in the empire, and that he was a subject of a foreign Superior; this the laws of Joseph II. did not tolerate. Upon this accusation the order was given to him that he should either give up the Congregation or leave at once the empire. The Father did not hesitate to choose the latter; but when his friends, especially the old Archbishop, who loved him tenderly, heard of this, the sorrow became general. The worthy prelate went to the emperor, who, in ignorance of what had happened, suspended at first the order that had been given. After an examination of the facts he authorized Blessed Clement not only to remain at Vienna, but to found there a house of his Institute; and for this purpose he assigned to him for his use the beautiful church of Santa Maria della Scala.

But, like St. Alphonsus, Blessed Clement was not to see his work prospering entirely during his life; anti this he knew, for he had several times said to his companions and to his disciples: "Have patience, and remain steadfast; my eyes will scarcely have closed in death when you will have houses and foundations that will abundantly satisfy you." The moment of death, which he had so ardently desired, at last arrived. March 15, 1820, laden with merits, he gave up his soul to God, at the age of sixty-five. At present the many Redemptorist convents in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, France, Belgium, Holland, Spain, Poland, Great Britain, Ireland, North and South America, the West Indies, all trace their descent from the House in Vienna founded in that city shortly after Blessed Clement's death. With good reason, then, he may be called the St. Alphonsus of the north, or the second father and founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

VII. FROM THE DEATH OF BLESSED CLEMENT HOFBAUER TILL THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE MOTHER-HOUSE OF THE INSTITUTE AT ROME

A. D. 1820–1855

The death of Blessed Clement seemed at first to interfere with the project of founding a house at Vienna, the authorization of which was due to his personal merit; but the contrary happened, which made every one admit his power in heaven and his growing influence on earth. April 30, 1820, the emperor approved of the establishment of not only a house, but of the Institute itself, in all his States.

Father Joseph Passerat was named Vicar-General in place of Father Hofbauer, and he set out for Vienna, July 26, after having obtained possession of an old convent situated on a mountain called Bischenberg, in the diocese of Strasburg Thither he sent some of his companions, who were installed August 2; this was the first establishment of the Redemptorists in France. In the month of November he himself conducted his Community from Vienna to Santa Maria della Scala, where he fixed his residence. His position was not, however, without its difficulties.

In 1824, the Congregation lost its Rector Major, Father Mansione, who was succeeded by Father Celestine Cocle.

In 1826, the King of Portugal called the Redemptorists into his kingdom, and gave them the house and church of St. John Nepomucene at Lisbon. The same year Pope Leo XII. established them at Spoleto, and intrusted to them the parochial church of St. Ansan.

The father of Vienna founded a house in 1827 at Mautern in Styria, and another in 1828 at Innsbruck, the capital of Tyrol.

In 1830, the house at Bischenberg, which could hardly support itself, was suppressed by order of King Louis Philippe, and France was again closed to the congregation; but at the same time Belgium was opened to it by the revolution that occurred in it. The first house offered was at Tournai, in 1831, where the Fathers established themselves on November 1.

In 1832, Father Camillus Ripoli succeeded Father Cocle in the office of Rector Major.

The same year, at the instance of the Apostolical Nuncio at Vienna, Father Passerat consented to send some of his subjects to Philippopoli in Bulgaria, where during eight years they had to suffer much without being able to gain a footing among a population that was addicted to the Greek schism. It was, however, just at this time that the Congregation really began to spread; its progress became so rapid, and at so many different points, that we can scarcely enumerate the details of it.

In 1833, two new houses were founded in Belgium, at Liege and at St. Trond, and one in Austria, at Eggenburg. The same year, Father Passerat sent some missionaries to the United States of America; but they had to struggle for three years against many obstacles before they could plant the Congregation in this new soil. The same year, Don Pedro in Portugal, after having dethroned his brother, banished the Redemptorists from the country.

In 1834, the Fathers were established at Leoben in Styria; they had now five houses in the Austrian Empire.

In 1835, the Duke of Modena called them to his States, where they settled at Finale. The same year, they left Valsanta, and established themselves in the city of Friburg itself.

In 1836, they took possession of an old convent at Wittem in Limburg belonging to Holland, and they founded their first house in America,—at Rochester, in the State of New York.

In 1838, France seemed to become more accessible, and the Community of Bischenberg could re-enter it.

May 26, 1839, was another day of triumph for the Congregation on account of the solemn canonization of its holy founder.—The same year, it formed a second establishment in America, namely, at Pittsburg in the State of Pennsylvania.

In 1841, called to Bavaria by the king himself, who offered them the celebrated pilgrimage of Alt-Œtting, the Fathers formed there a double establishment under the titles of St. Mary Magdalene and St. Alphonsus. Moreover, they founded a fourth house at Brussels in Belgium, also under the title of St. Mary Magdalene, and a third in Baltimore, in America, under the title of St. Alphonsus.

This development of the Institute necessitated some changes in its organization. Hence Gregory XVI. by a decree dated July 2, 1841, divided the Congregation into six Provinces, namely the Roman, the Neapolitan, the Sicilian, the Swiss, the Austrian, and the Belgian province. The Sovereign Pontiff then wished to fix at Rome the residence of the Rector Major; but grave difficulties raised by the pretensions of the Neapolitan Government caused the project to be deferred.

In 1842, a second house was founded at Landser in Strasburg and a fourth in the United States, at New York, under the title of the Most Holy Redeemer.

In 1843. Father Passerat sent some missionaries to England, and the fifth house in America was established at Philadelphia.

In 1844, there arose at Liege, through the care of the Re—demptorists, a pious institution that deserves special mention. It was the Archconfraternity of the Holy Family, a work that has produced happy fruits wherever it was established and maintained.

In 1845, the third house was established in France, namely, at St. Nicolas du Port, in the diocese of Nancy, and another house at Buffalo in America.

In 1846, another foundation was made in Bavaria, the third, at Vilsbiburg in the diocese of Ratisbon, and another at Detroit, the seventh, in America.

In 1847, three new houses were established: one in France, the fourth, at Teterchen in the diocese of Metz one in Savoy, at Contamine-sur-Arve, in the diocese of Annecy; and one in America, the eighth, at New Orleans. But on November 15 of this same year the revolutionists entered Friburg and sacked the convent occupied by the Redemptorists, who had also to leave Switzerland. This was but a prelude of the ravages that were to follow.

In 1848, the revolution disturbed nearly the whole of Europe. On April 6, Father Passerat was expelled from Vienna with his whole Community; a decree was then issued for the suppression of the Institute in Austria and in the whole Germanic Confederation. The same kind of decree was issued in Sicily, where the Congregation had three establishments. Other houses in Italy had likewise to suffer from this storm. Father Passerat withdrew to Belgium, to the house at Tournai.

These trials, however, were not without their consolation. Several of the Fathers expelled from their country went to Norway, and succeeded in building at Christiania a beautiful Catholic Church, the first in this country since the so-called reformation. Moreover, the same year, 1848, three new houses were founded: one in England, the first in this kingdom, at Clapham, near London; one in Belgium, the fifth, at Mons; and one in Bavaria, the fourth, at Fuchsmuhl, in the diocese of Ratisbon.

May 14, 1849, Father Ripoli, the Rector Major, being in a state of health that rendered him incapable of fulfilling his duties, His Holiness Pius IX. associated with him Father Vincent Trapanese to be his Vicar-General for the whole Institute.

In the same year another house was added in Belgium, the sixth, that of St. Joseph at Brussels; one in Bavaria, the fifth, at Niederachdorf, also belonging to the diocese of Ratisbon one in the United States, the ninth, at Cumberland in the diocese of Baltimore.

Father Ripoli, the Rector Major, died March 14, 1850; on account of the revolution that agitated Europe, and the difficulties that were made by the Neapolitan Government, the Sovereign Pontiff himself appointed his successor, not for life, but only for the time it would please the Holy See; this was Father Vincent Trapanese. Moreover, Father Passerat, worn out by age and very many trials, having resigned the office of Vicar-General, was replaced by Father Rudolph Smetana. June 29 of the same year, Pius IX. erected the American house into a special Province.

In 1850 two more houses were added in Europe, that of Bornhofen, in Rhenish Prussia, diocese of Limburg, and that of Amsterdam.

The following year, 1851, four houses were established, one in England at Bishop-Eton near Liverpool, one at Treves, one at Luxemburg, and one at Puchheim in Austria, diocese of Lintz.

In 1852, a fifth house was founded at Douai in France.

January 10, 1853, the Holy Father erected a Province of the Institute in Germany, called Germania Superior, that is Bavaria. The same year a house was established at Limerick in Ireland, and one in America, the tenth, at Annapolis, in the diocese of Baltimore.

In 1854, a new house was founded in Holland, at Bois-le-Duc, and two in France, that of Dunkerque, and that of Chateauroux, which were the sixth and the seventh.

We have now arrived at one of the most remarkable periods in the history of the Congregation. In consequence of the obstacles that the Neapolitan Government did not cease to oppose to the proper organization of the Institute, the Sovereign Pontiff authorized the two Sicilies to choose for themselves a special Superior; then by a decree of October 8, 1853, he ordained that the Mother-house of the Congregation was to be established at Rome, and that a General Chapter should there elect a Rector Major, who was thenceforward to reside there. To carry out this order a suitable place was bought, known as Villa Caserta, in which the General Chapter was canonically opened, April 26, 1855. Father Nicholas Mauron was chosen Superior-General and Rector Major, and the Chapter only separated after providing for all that was necessary to secure exact and regular observance in all parts of the Institute, in accordance with the spirit of the holy founder. Villa Caserta, situated by the side of the old house of St. Julian, became the Mother-house of the Congregation, after having been dedicated to the Most Holy Redeemer and in honor of St. Alphonsus.

As the continuation of recital of the successive establishment of Redemptorist convents up to the present time 1890, would take too long and would prove monotonous, we would merely mention that in the year 1871 the children of St. Alphonsus had the happiness to see their holy founder raised to the summit of glory in the Church. By a decree of March 23, afterwards confirmed by an apostolic brief of July 7, the Sovereign Pontiff, yielding to the urgent prayers of a great number of illustrious prelates and of learned men, and following the unanimous advice of the Cardinals of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, after a mature examination of the cause, decreed to St. Alphonsus Maria de Liguori, founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, and Bishop of St. Agatha of the Goths, the title and the honors of Doctor of the universal Church. This decree, commended in the whole Catholic world, appeared as the crowning of the memorable acts of the Vatican Council, and as a monument of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the glorious pontificate of Pius IX.

DOMINUS NOS BENEDICAT ET AB OMNI MALO DEFENDAT ET A.D. VITAM PERDUCAT AETERNAM. AMEN.-ED.

RULES AND CONSTITUTIONS

These constitutive Rules of the Congregation were written in Italian, and Benedict XIV. approved them by a Brief dated February 25, 1749. As Parts I. and II. of these Rules already exist in an authorized translation, we only reproduce them together with a translation of Part III., adding to them some useful notes that we think necessary for the better understanding of the text.—Ed.

RULES AND CONSTITUTIONS OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER.[14134]

THE END OF THE INSTITUTE

As the end of the Institute of the Most Holy Redeemer is to unite secular priests[14135] who are to live in Community and are earnestly to strive to imitate the virtues and examples of our Redeemer, Jesus Christ, by consecrating themselves specially to the preaching of the Word of God to the poor, the members of this Congregation, with the permission of the Ordinaries, to whom they are always to be subject,[14136] shall make it their special aim, by means of missions, catechetical Instructions, and spiritual exercises, to assist the people who live scattered in the country and small villages, and who are for the most part abandoned, and destitute of the aids of religion. For this end shall their houses be founded as far as possible outside of the centres of population, and, moreover, at such distances from one another as shall seem fitting to the Ordinaries and to the Rector Major; so that the members of the Congregation, being less distracted and hindered, may endeavor to acquire the spirit that is so necessary to evangelical laborers, and may devote themselves to the spiritual relief of the most abandoned souls.[14137]

PART I

Missions and Other Exercises

Chapter I

THE MISSIONS

I. As the giving of missions is one of the principal ends of our Institute, all shall make them their special study. The missions shall be given at the expense of the Congregation, and it is forbidden ever to ask the payment of these expenses either from communities or from individuals; all that is permitted is to receive such support from individuals, so long as the houses of the Congregation have not sufficient revenues.

II. The local Rectors shall appoint the subjects for the missions, to be given by their houses, unless the Rector Major, whose duty it is to govern the whole Congregation, has otherwise decided. Several subjects, at least two, shall always go together on missions, and they shall always travel, where it is possible, on foot, or at most on horseback; the use of carriages is permitted only when necessary.

III. After four or five months at most, they shall return to the places where our Congregation has given missions, to preach another course of sermons. But these exercises shall not last so long as the missions, shall be conducted by fewer Fathers than were at the mission, and shall have for their aim to consolidate the fruits of the mission which was given before.

IV. The custom of giving these Renewals, which have proved so useful and profitable to the good of souls shall always be maintained in our Institute; and it is on this account especially that all our houses should be situated rather in the centre of dioceses, and not very far from the places to the spiritual welfare of which our subjects are in the habit of devoting themselves.

V. In order that this exercise of the missions may not be neglected, and that the subjects may never lose sight of their vocation, which is to devote themselves to the spiritual help of the most abandoned souls, they shall not occupy themselves with distracting duties, they shall not take part in processions or public ceremonies; they shall not undertake the direction of seminaries, nor the direction of nuns, whether of entire communities or of individuals, living in cloistered convents, or in conservatories; nor shall they give them retreats, as this is allowed only on occasion of missions or other exercises, which are given in the places in which, or near which, such monasteries are situated.[14138] For the same reason it is forbidden to the subjects to have curacies, or to preach courses of Lenten sermons.

VI. The members of this Institute shall especially take the greatest care not to give even the shadow of bad example; and they shall behave in such a manner as always to merit the esteem and the veneration of the people. They shall not allow themselves to be induced through a motive of charity to meddle with marriage affairs, contracts, or wills; nor shall they become sponsors, nor occupy themselves with those things from which arise contempt for evangelical laborers and party-strife. The Superiors have the special and grave obligation to watch over the observance of this rule, as it is of the utmost importance.

Chapter II

OTHER EXERCISES

IN order not to leave entirely abandoned the souls of the people among whom the houses of our Institute are established, the subjects should also assume the spiritual care bf those souls. Hence, in their churches they shall preach every Sunday, and on every Saturday there shall be a sermon on the Blessed Virgin. Moreover in their houses they shall give, especially at the time of ordinations, the spiritual exercises to the ecclesiastics and seculars who may come there, provided in the places of their foundations there is no house of the missionary priests of Saint Vincent de Paul, who devote themselves specially to this kind of work. If, however, the houses of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer have already been established, and are in possession of the right to give the spiritual exercises when new foundations of the above-mentioned Fathers are begun, they shall remain in the possession of their right.

PART II

The Particular Obligations of the Members of the Congregation

Chapter I

THE VOWS OF POVERTY, CHASTITY, OBEDIENCE, AND PERSEVERANCE

1. THE VOW OF POVERTY

I. THE members of the Congregation shall lead a perfect community life, and be uniform in all things. Hence every house shall provide them with all things necessary. As poor men they must be content with frugal fare, in regard to which no distinction shall be made on account of their qualities or offices; and while they are nourishing the body, they shall also nourish the mind by the reading of a spiritual book.

II. The clothing of the members of the Congregation shall likewise be poor, but suitable for respectable priests. Hence the use of silk, half-silk, as well as of everything that savors of vanity and levity, is forbidden. Except in the churches, the use of articles of gold or silver is also forbidden, either in common or in private. Their habit, cloak, and stockings shall be of ordinary wool; however, the use of under-stockings of linen or cotton is allowed; and the shoes shall be simple.

III. The rooms shall be small, and the furniture of the rooms shall be poor, but uniform in all things; namely, a small table with a drawer without a lock; three chairs; four paper pictures; a crucifix of simple wood; two or three spiritual books besides the Holy Scriptures. Other books which any one may need can be taken from the common library with the permission of the Superior; a similar permission is required for any other little convenience which may be necessary.

IV. Although every member of the Congregation must be promoted to Holy Orders under the title of his patrimony, yet the use of this patrimony is forbidden to all. This prohibition also extends to the life-annuities which the subjects may have, and to every other kind of property that they may possess. Hence, all the revenues that the subjects derive from whatever belongs to them, under whatever title, shall be administered and expended by the Superiors.

V. Of the little things that are allowed them for their convenience, they shall make only that use for which they were granted by the Superiors. Without the permission of the Superior it is even forbidden to give to others anything that they have, or to receive from others anything as a gift or as a loan for their own use.

VI. Conformably to this vow, they shall bind themselves not to aspire, either directly or indirectly, to any dignities, benefices, and offices outside of the Congregation; and even should these be offered them they must refuse and renounce them, unless the Sovereign Pontiff or the Rector Major obliges them by a formal command of obedience to accept them. All this must be observed with the most scrupulous exactness under the gravest penalties; those who transgress in this point can even be expelled from the Congregation. Any Superior, even the Rector Major himself, who should be clearly convicted of having through weakness allowed any innovation to the injury of poverty, can be deposed from office and be deprived of the right of voting and of being voted for.

VII. It shall never be allowed them to beg, no matter how great their distress may be; they must expect to receive help from divine Providence. Only in a case of grave necessity is it permitted to apply to one of their benefactors.

VIII. As every member of the Congregation always retains the ownership of his property, he can dispose of it in favor of his relatives. If he does not dispose of it in their favor, he is obliged to do so in favor of the Congregation. But the Congregation shall never accept legacies or gifts from subjects who have poor relatives; and in case of doubt as to the poverty of such relatives, the matter must be referred to the Ordinary of the member of the Congregation.

IX. The income of each house shall not exceed the sum of fifteen hundred ducats,[14139] as this income is sufficient for the maintenance of the Church, of the building, of twelve priests, and of seven lay-brothers: this is the largest number that shall live in one house. An exception, however, is made in favor of the houses of students, of the novitiates, and of the house in which the Rector Major lives, as these houses have a larger number of subjects, and may therefore have an income of two thousand ducats.

2. THE VOW OF CHASTITY

As this virtue is so very dear to the Son of God, and so necessary to the evangelical laborer, the subjects of this Congregation shall be very careful to preserve it inviolate. Hence they shall use the greatest caution while treating with persons of the other sex. They shall not go to the houses of their penitents or of other seculars without an urgent reason, without the express permission of the Superior, and without a companion who has to be assigned to them by the Superior.

3. THE VOW OF OBEDIENCE

I. To the Ordinaries of the place where they are, the subjects of this Congregation shall render entire obedience in everything that appertains to their apostolic labors, and is not forbidden by the Constitutions.

II. They shall, besides, render exact obedience, in the first place, to their Rules and Constitutions, of which they ought to be most faithful observers; then to all the orders and regulations of their Superiors, so that it may be said of them that they have no will of their own, but that their will is in the hands of those who govern them. They shall show all respect to their Superiors; they shall not excuse or defend themselves in their presence, and shall receive their admonitions with humility.

III. Without the express permission of the Superiors, it is not allowed them to write letters to any one except to the Rector Major or his Consultors; and, without the same permission, to receive letters from any one, except from those just mentioned. In like manner, they shall not eat or drink out of meal-time, nor go into the garden or to the porches (logge), nor enter the refectory, kitchen, or the room of another.

IV. It is, above all, forbidden to the members of the Congregation to bring strangers into the house, and much more, to their own rooms. When necessary, they must converse with strangers in those places that are set apart for this purpose.

4. THE VOW OF PERSEVERANCE

To the vows above-mentioned the members of the Congregation shall add the vow[14140] of perseverance, by which they oblige themselves to live in the Community till death, and not to ask for a dispensation from their vows except from the Sovereign Pontiff or from the Rector Major. But the Rector Major is always free to send away those subjects whose conduct is not edifying, although in this matter he should before God seriously weigh his motives, and proceed conscientiously and without passion.

Chapter II

THE FREQUENTATION OF THE SACRAMENTS, PRAYER, AND CERTAIN EXERCISES OF HUMILITY

1. THE FREQUENTATION OF THE SACRAMENTS

I. THE priests shall strive to give all possible edification, and to live in such a manner that they may be able daily to celebrate worthily the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. They ought, therefore, to go to confession at least once a week; and the Rector of the house with his Consultors shall appoint for this purpose two confessors.

II. Those who are not priests shall receive Holy Communion on all feasts of obligation, and on Wednesdays and Fridays of every week, and shall go to confession twice a week. For the greater progress of the Brothers, there shall also be appointed in every house a spiritual Prefect, who shall instruct them in the elements of the faith and in regular observance.

III. The Rector shall take very great care that the last Sacraments of Holy Viaticum and Extreme Unction, be administered to the sick at the right time; and that, should any one be in danger of death, he be never left without a priest to console and assist him.

2. PRAYER AND EXERCISES OF HUMILITY

I. In every house, where it can be conveniently done, the Canonical Hours shall be recited together in choir with recollection of mind and without chant or modulation of voice.

II. They shall devote themselves to mental prayer three times a day, namely, in the morning and in the evening in common; in the afternoon every one shall make a meditation privately in his room; and every time the meditation is to last half an hour. These meditations shall be made chiefly on the theological virtues, on the life and the virtues of Jesus Christ, of which they should make themselves living images; and every month they shall direct particular attention to one of these virtues, in order that they may the better exercise themselves in it and practise it more in detail, by making their particular examination and giving spiritual conferences on it. In the afternoon, every one shall also make in private a half-hour's spiritual reading, and a visit to the Most Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin, for whom all should entertain a special devotion and a tender affection, and should, therefore, recite every day the third part of the Rosary. Twice a day they shall make in common the examination of conscience, namely, in the morning, before dinner, and in the evening before going to bed; and after the examination of conscience in the evening, they shall recite the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, and ask the Superior's blessing.

III. Every year, every member of the Congregation shall make the spiritual exercises during ten days, in total retirement and in strict silence; and every month, every one shall make a similar day of recollection.

IV. Every member of the Institute should, above all deem it the highest honor to perform even the lowliest work of the house, in order to acquire the virtue of holy humility. Hence even the priests shall by turns serve at table and wash the dishes. To set an example to the rest, the Rector may serve at table on one day of the week, and on one day the Minister shall serve at table, and on another day shall wash the dishes. Moreover, among the members of the Congregation there should never be any contention as regards precedence, since every one should desire to occupy the lowest place.

Chapter III

SILENCE, RECOLLECTION, MORTIFICATION, AND CORPORAL PENANCES

1. SILENCE AND RECOLLECTION

THE life of the members of the Congregation should be a life of continual recollection; in order to acquire it, they shall bestow great care on the exercise of the presence of God by frequently exciting themselves to short but fervent ejaculatory prayers. They shall also be very fond of retirement; they shall not leave their rooms without necessity, and shall above all observe silence, which is so praiseworthy in all Institutes. In the evening after the ringing of the Angelus,[14141] till the following morning after meditation, it is positively forbidden, except during the hour of recreation after suppers, to speak or to send messages to one another without the express permission of the Superior. Moreover, they shall observe silence for three consecutive hours after the afternoon recreation. In the church, the choir, the sacristy, the kitchen, the refectory, and the dormitories, they shall speak only when necessary, in a few words, and in a low tone of voice. The Superiors shall rigidly exact from their subjects the observance of this rule.

2. MORTIFICATION AND CORPORAL PENANCES

The evangelical laborers should also have much at heart Christian mortification, in order that they may reap abundant fruit from their apostolic labors. Hence the members of this Institute shall especially devote themselves to interior mortification, to the conquering of their passions and to the abnegation of self-will, seeking like the Apostle to find pleasure in the sorrows, in the contempt, and in the humiliations of Jesus Christ.

II. With regard to corporal penances, they shall fast on all the vigils of the feasts of the Blessed Virgin; they shall abstain from flesh-meat during Advent and the Novena of the Holy Ghost; but the refection in the evening shall be more abundant than on the fasting days of the Church. On two days of every week—on Wednesdays and Fridays—all shall take the discipline in common. They shall sleep on straw; woollen pillows and sheets of ordinary linen are, however, allowed, The beds, as a rule, shall be seven palms[14142] in length by three and a half in breadth.

III. In order that the evangelical laborers may not be too indiscreet in mortifying their bodies, they shall take part in all the prescribed recreations, which usually consist in an hour after dinner and an hour after supper, when all shall assemble in one and the same place. There shall also be one day's recreation every week. Moreover, it is not allowed them, without the permission of the Superior and their spiritual directors, to perform any corporal penance or to burden themselves with too much labor.

IV. It is forbidden them to use any kind of vain perfume, to go hunting, to play at any game whatsoever, and especially to go to the house of their parents. This is only allowed, with the express permission of the Superiors, in the case of the serious illness of the father or the mother, or on account of some other urgent necessity. The Superiors shall most zealously watch that this rule be observed.

Chapter IV

THE DOMESTIC MEETINGS

I. ON the Ember Days of each year every Rector shall assemble his subjects, and after the reading in common of these Constitutions, he shall direct attention to the faults that have been committed against them, and shall give paternal advice in regard to what he thinks expedient for the observance of them. Furthermore, these Constitutions must be read every Saturday at supper, and every member of the Congregation must have a copy of them, must frequently meditate on them, and must render himself familiar with them.

II. Moreover, the Rector shall give every week a spiritual conference to all his subjects, and every one shall accuse himself of the faults which he has committed against the Rule. The Rector shall also call together every week the priests and the students of the house, in order to confer with them on the right manner of giving missions, about the faults to be avoided in giving them, and about the means successfully to attain this most holy end of our Institute. Lastly, in every house there shall be held every week a conference about cases of conscience or about dogmatic theology; to these conferences all the priests shall come well prepared to answer the questions proposed.

PART III

GOVERNMENT of the Congregation

Chapter I

THE RECTOR MAJOR AND OTHER OFFICIALS

I. THE RECTOR MAJOR AND HIS CONSULTORS

I. THE Congregation shall be governed by a Superior General, who shall be perpetual, and shall bear the title of RECTOR MAJOR. He shall be elected by the General Chapter, and must obtain for his election two thirds of the votes. To be elected Rector Major one must have lived ten years an edifying life in the Congregation, have completed one's thirty-fifth year, and, besides laboring in the mission, one must have filled the office of local Rector or Consultor.

II. The Rector Major may choose for his residence any house that may appear most suitable to him.[14143] He shall have absolute authority over all the houses and all the subjects of the Congregation in regard to the interior or domestic government, since in regard to the exterior they are to be always subject to the jurisdiction of the bishops; and if subjects are to be promoted to Holy Orders, they shall always be promoted by those bishops that would promote them if they did not live in the Congregation.

III. It shall be incumbent on the Rector Major to appoint all the Rectors of the houses, the Admonitors, the two Consultors of every local Rector, the Masters of Novices, the Prefects of the Students, the Visitors, and the Lectors.[14144] He may remove these at will, provided he has sufficient cause for doing so; ordinarily, however, he shall not change them before the expiration of three years.[14145]

IV. It shall also be his duty to accept new foundations and to determine their location. He shall also be charged with the office of admitting or dismissing subjects. If the subjects that ask to be admitted are subdeacons they may be received by the Rector Major without the vote of his Consultors; if they are not subdeacons, there will be necessary for their admission a majority of the votes of the Consultors, whose vote in this case shall be decisive. Never, however, shall be admitted young men that have not yet completed their eighteenth year.

V. The principal duty of the Rector Major shall be, to watch with the greatest care over the obs ervance of the Rules and Constitutions of the Institute, and to give the example himself by being the first to observe them. He shall, therefore, severely punish transgressors, above all if they are Superiors, without any regard to persons; and for this purpose he shall make, either himself or through the Visitors whom he shall appoint, the visitation of all the houses.

VI. It shall not be permitted to the Rector Major to resign his office without a very grave reason, and without the acceptation of his resignation by the General Chapter.

VII. The Rector Major shall have six Consultors, who shall be given to him by the Chapter; he shall every month deliberate with them on the most important affairs of the Congregation, especially when there is question of appointing the local Rectors, the Visitors, the Masters of Novices, of founding new houses or of abandoning one already founded, of dismissing from the Institute subjects already received, and the like. He shall not be obliged to follow the advice of the Consultors, since their votes are only consultive; but it will be expedient that he should usually conform to the major or sounder part of them.

VIII. During life, the Rector Major shall secretly designate in writing and appoint his Vicar-General, who shall be charged with governing the Congregation after his death; but this must be done under an inviolable secret. The government of the Vicar shall last till the election of a new Rector Major, and the election shall be held by the General Chapter. If this designation is found not to have been made, the Consultors of the deceased Rector Major shall at once proceed to the election of a Vicar.

IX. Hence, after the death of the Rector Major the Vicar named by him, or elected by the Consultors, shall assemble the General Chapter within the space of six months at the farthest. At this chapter shall be present the Procurator-General, the Consultors of the deceased Rector Major, and the local Rectors, each one of the latter with a companion delegated for this purpose by the Chapter of each house, which shall be composed of all the professed priests of the Community.[14146] All the members of the Chapter shall have the right to vote, and each one may propose what he thinks to be useful for the maintenance of the observance and for the greater good of the Institute.

X. While the General Chapter lasts, six Consultors of the Rector Major shall be elected; they shall remain in office as long as the Rector Major holds his; among them should necessarily be the Admonitor of the Rector Major and the Secretary of the Chapter, who shall be elected by the same Chapter.

XI. If any one of the Consultors be wanting, in every case one shall be provided by the Rector Major and his other Consultors with a majority of votes, the Rector Major of himself not being allowed to provide for one.

XII. To obviate the abuses that usually arise in Communities and unceasingly to renew more and more the strict observance of these Rules, the General Chapter should assemble every nine years in the place that the Rector Major shall designate; and then shall also be examined the state of each house. The Chapter shall have the power to form new statutes concerning the common good of the Congregation, but always conformably, and by no means contrary, to the Constitutions and the Rules. It may, however, for reasonable motives annul and change the ordinances of the Rector Major and of other Chapters.

XIII. If the conduct of the Rector Major becomes such as to make him appear worthy of being deposed, his six Consultors shall have the right to assemble for this purpose the General Chapter, which may depose the Rector Major, provided two thirds of the votes are in favor of the deposition. If ever one of the Consultors summons the others for this purpose, all are obliged to come together; and if they unanimously decide that the Chapter should be assembled, they shall be free to assemble it.

II. THE ADMONITOR OF THE RECTOR MAJOR

The General Chapter shall assign to the Rector Major an Admonitor, who shall be Consultor natus of the same Rector, and shall watch over his conduct. If he finds that his conduct is not conformable to the Rules and Constitutions of the Institute in matters, however that are important, whence grave injury might result for the Congregation; especially if through his weakness relaxation should creep into any regular observance,—he shall admonish the Rector Major with great humility and charity. If the Rector Major, however, does not amend, and if the disorder is gr ave, the Admonitor shall be obliged to inform the other Consultors, so that they may proceed to the adoption of those remedies that they judge to be most suitable; and they may even proceed to the assembling of the Chapter.

III. THE PROCURATOR-GENERAL

In the Chapter in which the Rector Major is elected, there shall also be elected a Procurator-General for the whole Congregation; he as well as the Consultors shall remain in office as long as the Rector Major holds office. It shall be his duty to transact all the affairs of the Congregation that are intrusted to him by the Rector Major or by the Chapter. He shall take care of the income left to the entire body of the Congregation that he may use according to the intention of the benefactors, or if their intention was not specified, that he may use it in the manner that the Rector Major and his Consultors may judge to be expedient. Every six months he shall render to the Rector Major and his Consultors an account of his administration of the income. If the Procurator-General dies, he shall be replaced by an election similar to that of a Consultor who is wanting.

IV. THE VISITORS

I. As it is the duty of the Rector Major to make every year the visitation of all the houses of the Congregation, he may if he is prevented depute for this purpose other Visitors of the same Institute, but they must be men of mature age and of an exemplary life.

II. The Visitors shall have the powers that are given them by the Rector Major; they shall, therefore, leave in every house that they visit suitable ordinances for the good government of the Community and for the greater stability of regular observance; and then they shall render an account of all to the Rector Major.

V. THE LOCAL RECTOR AND OTHER OFFICIALS.[14147]

I. The local Rectors shall take care of their respective houses. The Rector Major shall assign to them an Admonitor, who is to watch over their conduct. If the Admonitor perceives that the Rector fails in his duty, that he cares very little about exacting regular observance, he shall at first admonish him fraternally and humbly, and if the latter does not amend, the Admonitor shall inform the Rector Major about the matter. The Rector Major shall also assign to the Rectors two Consultors with whom they shall deliberate once a month about the affairs of the house, and examine the accounts and the book of Masses.

II. The Rector shall not expend any money exceeding the sum of ten scudi[14148] without the consent of the Admonitor and Consultors; and if the sum exceeds a hundred scudi, they must have the permission of the Rector Major.

III. In regard to business transactions, agreements, acceptance of legacies, or the pledging in any way of the property of the house, especially the taking of money on which interest is to be paid, the Rectors or their Procurators, besides the consent of the Holy See or of the Ordinary, must have in writing the consent of the Rector Major.

IV. The local Rector shall choose an assistant, who shall bear the name Minister. The Minister shall assist the Rector in taking care of the house, and shall govern it in his absence, during which he shall conform in everything to the ordinances and the practice of the Rector.

V. In every house or Community, besides the Rector, there shall not be more than eleven Fathers and seven lay-brothers. There can, however, be a larger number in the houses of the novitiate and in the houses of studies, as well as in the house in which the Rector Major lives.

I. Every month the local Rector shall exact an account of conscience from all his subjects, and shall visit the rooms of each.

Chapter II

THE QUALITIES REQUISITE IN THOSE THAT ARE TO BE ADMITTED

I. THE admission of subjects, clerics, or others into the body of the Congregation shall rest with the Rector Major, as has been said. Hence he himself, or another named by him, shall gather exact information in regard to the capacity and the character of those that ask to be admitted, and especially as to the motive of their vocation; he shall inquire whether they have poor sisters or relatives; whether they have contracted debts or have committed any misdemeanors; whether they are of legitimate birth; for those should never be admitted that might bring any reproach or dishonor upon the sacred ministry. The Consultors shall seek the same information for the admission of young men that are not subdeacons, their vote, as has been said, being necessary in this case.

II. The Secretary of the Congregation shall distinctly note down in a book the day, the month, and the year of the admission of subjects.

III. Having been thus received, the young men shall be put on trial for some time while wearing their own secular dress; then, after having made a retreat of fifteen days, they shall be admitted into the novitiate, in which the clerics during an entire year, the lay-brothers during two years, and the priests of a mature age at least during six months, if the Rector thinks fit, shall devote themselves under the direction of a Master of Novices to the acquisition of the virtues proper to their vocation. If they have behaved well during this year of trial, they shall with the permission of the Rector Major again make a more rigorous retreat of fifteen days; then they shall be admitted to profession by making the simple vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience with the vow and the oath of perseverance in favor of the Congregation that accepts them. This vow and oath cannot be relaxed nor be dispensed from except by the Sovereign Pontiff or the Rector Major; and it is always on this condition that they are made.

IV. After the profession, the subjects shall apply themselves to study, but shall, nevertheless, be under the care of a spiritual Prefect till they are ordained. For the ordinations the permission of the Rector Major shall always be required. Usually, the subjects shall not go out to labor before their thirtieth year; but in the mean while the Rector of the house may employ them in case of necessity, with the consent of the Rector Major.

V. Although the transgression of these Rules and Constitutions superinduces no sin, yet the Superiors shall most zealously do all that they can to see that they be observed. They shall not easily grant dispensations: these shall be granted only in case of necessity, which should be inquired into by the local Superiors and their Consultors whenever this necessity has reference to any individual subject. As for the dispensations that regard the whole Congregation, recourse must be had to the Rector Major, who, after having advised with his Consultors, may grant them, but not in perpetuity, inasmuch as only the General Chapter has the power for very grave reasons to give general and perpetual dis—pensations.

Counsels Concerning a Religious Vocation

St. Alphonsus published in 1750 COUNSELS CONCERNING A RELIGIOUS VOCATION, followed by CONSIDERATIONS ON THE RELIGIOUS STATE. In the first edition he had in view only those young men that might present themselves to enter his Congregation; but afterwards in a new edition he modified the last two paragraphs (IV. and V.) of the Counsels, and adapted them to all religious Institutes in which regular observance is maintained.

Although this little work is found in Volume III. for the generality of readers, we thought it necessary to reproduce it in this volume, to which it chiefly belongs, but with some changes in the notes that we have added.—Ed.

I. WE OUGHT TO CONFORM TO THE DESIGNS OF GOD IN THE CHOICE OF A STATE OF LIFE, WHATEVER IT MAY BE

IT is evident that our eternal salvation depends principally upon the choice of our state of life. Father Granada calls this choice the chief wheel of our whole life. Hence, as when in a clock the chief wheel is deranged, the whole clock is also deranged, so in the order of our salvation, if we make a mistake as to the state to which we are called, our whole life, as St. Gregory Nazianzen says, will be an error.

If, then, in the choice of a state of life, we wish to secure our eternal salvation, we must embrace that to which God calls us, in which only God prepares for us the efficacious means necessary to our salvation. For, as St. Cyprian says: "The grace of the Holy Spirit is given according to the order of God, and not according to our own will;"[14149] and therefore St. Paul writes, Every one hath his proper gift from God.[14150] That is, as Cornelius a Lapide explains it, God gives to every one his vocation, and chooses the state in which he wills him to be saved. And this is the order of predestination described by the same apostle: Whom He predestined, them He also called; and whom He called, them He also justified, . . . and them He also glorified.[1415114152]

We must remark that in the world this doctrine of the vocation is not much studied by some persons. They think it to be all the same, whether they live in the state to which God calls them, or in that which they choose of their own inclination, and therefore so many live a bad life and damn themselves.

But it is certain that this is the principal point with regard to the acquisition of eternal life. He who disturbs this order and breaks this chain of salvation will not be saved. With all his labors and with all the good he may do, St. Augustine will tell him, "Thou runnest well, but out of the way,"[14153] that is, out of the way in which God has called you to walk for attaining to salvation. The Lord does not accept the sacrifices offered up to him from our own inclination, But to Cain and his offerings he had no respect.[14154] Rather he threatens with great chastisement those who, when he calls them, turn their backs on him in order to follow the whims of their own caprice. Woe to you apostate children, he says through Isaias, that you would take counsel and not from Me, and would begin a web and not by My Spirit.[14155]

II. THE VOCATION TO THE RELIGIOUS STATE HOW IMPORTANT IT IS TO FOLLOW IT PROMPTLY

1. MISERY TO WHICH ONE EXPOSES ONE'S SELF BY NOT CORRESPONDING TO IT

The divine call to a more perfect life is undoubtedly a special grace, and a very great one, which God does not give to all; hence he has much reason to be indignant against those who despise it. How greatly would not a prince think himself offended if he should call one of his vassals to serve him near his person, and this vassal should refuse to obey the call! And should God not resent such conduct? Oh, he resents it but too much, and threatens such persons by saying, Woe to him that gainsayeth his Maker.[14156] The word Woe in Scripture signifies eternal damnation. The chastisement of the disobedient will begin even in this life; in which he will always be unquiet, for, says Job, Who hath resisted Him and hath had peace?[14157] Therefore he will be deprived of those abundant and efficacious helps necessary to lead a good life. For which reason Habert, a divine, writes: "He will with great difficulty be able to work out his salvation."[14158] He will with great difficulty save himself; for, being like a member out of his proper place, he will with great difficulty be able to live well. "In the body of the Church," adds the learned author, "he will be like a limb of the human body out of its place, which may be able to perform its functions, but only with difficulty and in an awkward manner." Whence he concludes: "And though, absolutely speaking, he may be saved, he will with difficulty enter upon and advance in the road, and use the means of salvation."[14159] The same thing is taught by St. Bernard[14160] and St. Leo.[14161] St. Gregory,[14162] writing to the Emperor Maurice, who by an edict had forbidden soldiers to become religious, says that this was an unjust law, which shut the gates of paradise to many, because many would save themselves in religion who would otherwise perish in the world.

Remarkable is the case related by F. Lancicius. There was in the Roman college a youth of great talents. Whilst he was making the spiritual exercises, he asked his confessor whether it was a sin not to correspond with the vocation to the religious life. The confessor replied that in itself it was no grievous sin, because this is a thing of counsel and not of precept, but that one would expose one's salvation to great danger, as it had happened to many, who for this reason were finally damned. He did not obey the call. He went to study in Macerata, where he soon began to omit prayer and Holy Communion, and finally gave himself up to a bad life. Soon after, coming one night from the house of a wicked woman, he was mortally wounded by a rival; certain priests ran to his assistance, but he expired before they arrived, and, moreover, in front of the college. By this circumstance God wished to show that this chastisement came upon him for having neglected his vocation.

Remarkable also is the vision had by a novice, who, as F. Pinamonti relates in his treatise of the victorious vocation, had resolved on leaving his Order. He saw Christ on a throne in wrath, ordering his name to be blotted out of the book of life; by this vision he was so terrified that he persevered in his vocation.

How many other similar examples are there, not to be found in books! And how many unhappy youths shall we not see damned on the day of judgment for not having followed their vocation! Such are rebels to the divine light, as the Holy Ghost says: They have been rebellious to the light, they have not known His ways,[14163] and they will be justly punished by losing the light; and because they would not walk in the way shown them by the Lord, they shall walk without light in that chosen by their own caprice, and perish. Behold, I will utter My Spirit to you.[14164] Behold the vocation, but because they fail to follow it, God adds: Because I called and you refused; . . . you have despised all My counsel. . . . I also will laugh in your destruction, and I will mock when that shall come upon you which you feared.[14165] Then shall they call upon Me, and I will not hear: they shall rise in the morning, and shall not find Me. Because they have hated instruction and received not the fear of the Lord. Nor consented to My counsel, but despised all My reproof.[14166].[14167] And this signifies that God will not hear the prayers of him who has neglected to obey his voice. St. Augustine says, "They who have despised the will of God which invited them, shall feel the will of God when it becomes its own avenger."[14168]

2. WE MUST OBEY THE VOICE OF GOD WITHOUT DELAY

Whenever God calls to a more perfect state, he who does not wish to expose his eternal salvation to great danger must then obey, and obey promptly. Otherwise he will hear from Jesus Christ the reproach he made to that young man who, when invited to follow him, said, I will follow Thee, Lord, but let me first take my leave of them that are at my house.[14169] And Jesus replied to him that he was not fit for paradise: No man putting his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God.[14170]

The lights which God gives are transient, not permanent, gifts. Whence St. Thomas says that the vocation of God to a more perfect life ought to be followed as promptly as possible.[14171] He proposes in his summary[14172] the question whether it be praiseworthy to enter religion without having asked the counsel of many, and without long deliberation? He answers in the affirmative, saying that counsel and deliberation are necessary in doubtful things, but not in this matter, which is certainly good; because Jesus Christ has counselled it in the Gospel, since the religious state comprehends most of the counsels of Jesus Christ. How singular a thing it is, when there is question of entering religion to lead a life more perfect and more free from the dangers of the world, the men of the world say that it is necessary to deliberate a long time before putting such resolutions in execution, in order to ascertain whether the vocation comes from God or from the devil! But they do not talk thus when one is to accept of a place in the magistracy, of a bishopric, etc., where there are so many dangers of losing the soul. Then they do not say that many proofs are required whether there be a true vocation from God.

The saints, however, do not talk thus. St. Thomas says that if the vocation to religion should even come from the devil, we should nevertheless follow it, as a good counsel, though coming from an enemy. St. John Chrysostom, as quoted by the same St. Thomas, says that God, when he gives such vocations, wills that we should not defer even a moment to follow them. Christ requires from us such an obedience that we should not delay an instant.[14173] And why this? Because as much as God is pleased to see in a soul promptitude in obeying him, so much he opens his hand and fills it with his blessings. On the contrary, tardiness in obeying him displeases him, and then he shuts his hand and withdraws his lights, so that in consequence a soul will follow its vocation with difficulty and abandon it again easily. Therefore, St. John Chrysostom says that when the devil cannot bring one to give up his resolution of consecrating himself to God, he at least seeks to make him defer the execution of it, and esteems it a great gain if he can obtain the delay of one day only, or even of an hour.[14174] Because, after that day or that hour, other occasions presenting themselves, it will be less difficult for him to obtain greater delay, until the individual who has been thus called, finding himself more feeble and less assisted by grace, gives way altogether and loses his vocation. Therefore St. Jerome gives to those who are called to quit the world this advice: "Make haste, I beseech you, and rather cut than loosen the cable by which your bark is bound fast to the land."[14175] The saint wishes to say that as a man who should find himself in a boat on the point of sinking, would seek to cut the rope, rather than to loosen it, so he who finds himself in the midst of the world ought to seek to get out of it as promptly as possible, in order to free himself from the danger, which is so great in the world, of losing his own soul.[14176]

Let us also hear what St. Francis de Sales writes in his works, on religious vocation, because the whole of it will go to confirm what has already been said, and what will be said hereafter: "To have a sign of a true vocation, it is not necessary that our constancy be sensible, it suffices if it be in the superior part of our soul. And therefore we must not judge that a vocation is not a true one, if the individual thus called, before putting it in execution, does not feel any longer those sensible movements which he felt in the beginning,—even should he feel a repugnance and coldness, which sometimes bring him to waver, and make it appear to him that all is lost. It is enough that the will remains constant in not abandoning the divine call, and also that there remains some affection for this call. To know whether God will have one become a religious, one ought not to expect that God himself should speak or send to one an angel from heaven to signify his will. And as little necessary is it that ten or twelve Doctors should examine whether the vocation is to be followed or not. But it is necessary to correspond with the first movement of the inspiration, and to cultivate it, and then not to grow weary if disgust or coldness should come on; for if one acts thus, God will not fail to make all succeed to his glory. Nor ought we to care much from what quarter the first movement comes. The Lord has many means to call his servants. Sometimes he makes use of a sermon, at other times of the reading of good books. Some, as St. Anthony and St. Francis, have been called by hearing the words of the Gospel; others by means of afflictions and troubles that came upon them in the world, and which suggested to them the motive for leaving it. These persons, although they come to God only because they are disgusted with the world or out of favor with it, nevertheless, failing not to give themselves to him with their whole will, become sometimes greater saints than those who entered religion with a more apparent vocation. Father Platus relates that a nobleman, riding one day on a fine horse, and striving to make a great display in order to please some ladies whom he saw, was thrown from the horse into the mire, from which he rose besmeared and covered with mud. He was so full of confusion at this accident that at the same moment he resolved to become a religious, saying, 'Treacherous world, thou hast mocked me, but I will mock thee. Thou hast played me a game, I will play thee another; for I will have no more peace with thee, and from this hour I resolve to forsake thee and to become a friar.' And, in fact, he became a religious, and lived in religion a holy life."[14177]

III. MEANS TO BE EMPLOYED FOR PRESERVING A RELIGIOUS VOCATION IN THE WORLD

He, then, who wishes to be faithful to the divine call ought not only to resolve to follow it, but to follow it promptly, if he does not wish to expose himself to the evident danger of losing his vocation; and in case he should by necessity be forced to wait, he ought to use all diligence to preserve it, as the most precious jewel he could have.

The means to preserve vocation are three in number: secrecy, prayer, and recollection.

1. SECRECY

First, generally speaking, he must keep his vocation secret from everybody except his spiritual Father, because commonly the men of the world scruple not to say to young men, who are called to the religious state, that one may serve God everywhere, and therefore in the world also. And it is wonderful that such propositions come sometimes out of the mouth of priests, and even of religious; but of such religious only as have either become so without vocation, or do not know what vocation is. Yes, without doubt, he who is not called to the religious state may serve God in every place, but not he who is called to it, and then from his own inclination wishes to remain in the world; such a one, as I have said above, can with difficulty serve God and lead a good life.

It is especially necessary to keep the vocation secret from parents.

It was, indeed, the opinion of Luther, as Bellarmine relates,[14178] that children entering religion without the consent of their parents commit a sin. For, said he, children are bound to obey their parents in all things. But this opinion has generally been rejected by Councils and the holy Fathers. The tenth

Council of Toledo expressly says: "It is lawful for children to become religious without the consent of their parents, provided they have attained the age of puberty;" these are the words: "It shall not be lawful for parents to put their children in a religious order after they have attained their fourteenth year. After this age, it shall be lawful for children to take upon themselves the yoke of religious observance, whether it be with the consent of their parents, or only the wish of their own hearts."[14179] The same is prescribed in the Council of Tribur,[14180] and is taught by St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, St. Bernard, St. Thomas, and others, with St. John Chrysostom, who writes in general: "When parents stand in the way in spiritual things, they ought not even to be recognized."[14181]

Some Doctors then say that when a child called by God to the religious state could easily and securely obtain the consent of his parents, without any danger on their part of hindering him from following his vocation, it is becoming that he should seek to obtain their blessing. This doctrine could be held speculatively, but not so in practice, because in practice such a danger always exists. It will be well to discuss this point fully, in order to do away with certain pharisaical scruples which some entertain.

It is certain that in the choice of a state of life children are not bound to obey parents. Thus the Doctors, with common accord, teach with St. Thomas, who says: "Servants are not bound to obey their masters, nor children their parents, with regard to contracting matrimony, preserving virginity, and such like things.[14182] Nevertheless, with regard to the state of marriage, F. Pinamonti, in his treatise on religious vocation, is justly of the opinion of Sanchez, Comminchio, and others, who hold that a child is bound to take counsel of his parents, because in such matters they may have more experience than the young. But speaking then of religious vocation, the above-mentioned Pinamonti wisely adds that a child is not bound at all to take counsel of his parents, because in this matter they have not any experience, and through interest are commonly changed into enemies, as St. Thomas also remarks, when speaking of religious vocation. "Frequently," he says, "our friends according to the flesh are opposed to our spiritual good.[14183] For fathers often prefer that their children should be damned with themselves, rather than be saved away from them. Whence St. Bernard exclaims, "O hard father, O cruel mother, whose consolation is the death of their son, who wish rather that we perish with them than reign without them!"[14184]

God, says a grave author, Porrecta, when he calls one to a perfect life, wishes one to forget one's father, saying, Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thine ear; and forget thy people and thy father's house. [14185] "By this, then," he adds, "the Lord certainly admonishes us that he who is called ought by no means to allow the counsel of parents to intervene." "If God will have a soul, who is called by him, forget its father and its father's house, without doubt he suggests by this, that he who is called to the religious state ought not, before he follows the call, to interpose the counsel of the carnal friends of his household."[14186]

St. Cyril, explaining what Jesus Christ said to the youth mentioned above, No man putting his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God,[14187] comments on it, and says that he who asks for time to confer with his parents in reference to his vocation is exactly the one who is declared by our Lord to be unfit for heaven. "In order to confer with his parents, he looks back who seeks for delay."[14188] Whence St. Thomas absolutely advises those who are called to religion, to abstain from deliberating on their vocation with their relatives: "From this deliberation, the relatives of the flesh are before all to be excluded; for it is said, Treat thy cause with thy friend (Prov. xxv. 9); but the relatives of the flesh are in this affair not our friends, but our enemies, according to the saying of our Lord: A man's enemies are those of his household."[14189]

If, then, for following one's vocation it would be a great error to ask the counsel of parents, it would be a greater one still to ask their permission, and to wait for it, for such a demand cannot be made without an evident danger of losing the vocation, as often as there is a probable fear that parents would exert themselves to prevent it. And, in fact, the saints, when they were called to leave the world, left their homes without giving their parents so much as an intimation of it. Thus acted St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Francis Xavier, St. Philip Neri, St. Louis Bertrand. And we know that the Lord has even by miracles approved of these glorious flights.

St. Peter of Alcantara, when he went to the monastery to become a religious, and was fleeing from the house of his mother, under whose obedience he had lived since the death of his father, found himself prevented by a wide river from advancing any farther. He recommended himself to God, and at the same instant saw himself transported to the other side.

Likewise, when St. Stanislaus Kostka fled from home, without the permission of his father, his brother set out after him in great haste in a carriage, but having almost overtaken him, the horses, in spite of all the violence used against them, would not advance a step farther, till turning towards the city, they began to run at full speed.

In like manner the Blessed Oringa of Waldrano, in Tuscany, b eing promised in marriage to a young man, fled from the house of her parents in order to consecrate herself to God; but the river Arno opposing itself to her course, after a short prayer she saw it divide and form, as it were, two walls of crystal, to let her pass through with dry feet.

Therefore, my very beloved brother, if you are called by God to leave the world, be very careful not to make your resolution known to your parents, and, content to be thus blessed by God, seek to execute it as promptly as you can, and without their knowledge, if you would not expose yourself to the great danger of losing your vocation. For, generally speaking, relatives, as has been said above, especially fathers and mothers, oppose the execution of such resolutions; and although they may be endowed with piety, interest and passion nevertheless render them so blind that under various pretexts they scruple not to thwart with all their might the vocation of their children.

We read in the life of Father Paul Segneri the younger, that his mother, though a matron much given to prayer, left nevertheless no means untried to prevent her son from entering the religious state to which he was called. We also read in the life of Mgr. Cavalieri, Bishop of Troja, that his father, although a man of great piety, used every means to prevent his son from entering the Congregation of Pious Workmen (which, notwithstanding, he afterwards did), and even went so far as to bring against him a lawsuit in the ecclesiastical court. And how many other fathers, notwithstanding they were men of piety and prayer, have not in such cases been seen to change, and to become possessed, as it were, of the devil! For under no other circumstance does hell seem to employ more formidable arms than when there is question of preventing those who are called to the religious state from executing their resolution.

For this reason be also very careful not to communicate your design to your friends, who will not scruple to dissuade you from it, or at least to divulge the secret, so that the knowledge of it will easily come to the ears of your parents.

2. PRAYER

In the second place, it is necessary to know that these vocations are only preserved by prayer; he who gives up prayer will certainly give up his vocation. It is necessary to pray, and to pray much; and therefore let him who feels himself called, not omit to make every morning after rising an hour of mental prayer, or at least half an hour, in his own room, if he can do so there without molestation, and if not, in the church, and likewise half an hour in the evening.

Let him not neglect also to make every day, without fail, a visit to the Most Holy Sacrament, as also to the Most Blessed Virgin Mary, in order to obtain the grace of perseverance in his vocation. Let him likewise not omit to receive Holy Communion thrice, or at least twice, a week.

His meditations ought almost always to be on this point of the vocation, considering how great a favor from God he has received in being thus called by him; how much more easily he will secure his eternal salvation, if he be faithful to God in following his vocation; and on the contrary, to how great a danger of being damned he exposes himself if he be unfaithful. Let him then especially place before his eyes the hour of death, and consider the contentment that he will then feel if he shall have obeyed God, and the pains and the remorse he would experience if he should die in the world. To this end I shall add at the end of this some considerations on which he may make his mental prayer.

It is, moreover, necessary that all his prayers to Jesus and Mary, and especially those after Communion and in the visits, be directed to obtain perseverance. In all his prayers and Communions let him always renew the offering of himself to God, by saying, "Behold, O Lord! I am no more mine, I am Thine. Already have I given myself to Thee, and now I renew this my offering of my whole self. Accept of me, and give me strength to be faithful to Thee and to retire as quickly as possible into Thy house."

3. RECOLLECTION

In the third place, it is necessary that he be recollected, which will not be possible for him unless he withdraws from worldly conversations and amusements. What, in short, as long as we are in the world, is enough to cause the loss of vocation? A mere nothing. One day of amusement, a word from a friend, a passion we do not mortify, a little attachment, a thought of fear, a resentment we do not overcome, suffices to bring to nought all our resolutions of retiring from the world, or of giving ourselves entirely to God. Wherefore we ought to keep perfectly recollected, detaching ourselves from everything of this world. We ought during this time to think of nothing but prayer and frequenting the sacraments, and to be nowhere but at home and in church. Let him who will not do so, but distracts himself by pastimes, be persuaded that he will without doubt lose his vocation. He will remain with the remorse of not having followed it, but he certainly will not follow it. Oh, how many by neglecting these precautions have lost, first their vocation, and afterwards their souls!

IV. DISPOSITION REQUIRED FOR ENTERING RELIGION

He who feels himself to be called by God to a religious Institute in which reigns exact observance[14190] ought to know that the end of every regular observance is, to follow as exactly as possible the footsteps and examples of the most holy life of Jesus Christ, who led a life entirely detached and mortified, full of suffering and contempt. He, then, who resolves to enter such a holy state must at the same time resolve to enter it for the sake of suffering and denying himself in all things, as Jesus Christ himself has declared to those who wish perfectly to follow him: If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me.[14191] He, then, who wishes to enter religion must firmly establish within himself this resolution to go to suffer, and to suffer much, so that afterwards he may not give way to temptations, when, having entered, he feels depressed under the hardships and privations of the poor and mortified life which is there led.

Many, on entering Communities of exact observance, take not the proper means of finding peace therein, and of becoming saints, because they only place before their eyes the advantages of the Community life, such as the solitude, the quiet, the freedom from the troubles caused by relatives, from strife and other disagreeable matters, and from the cares consequent on being obliged to think of one's lodging, food, and clothing.

There is no doubt that every religious is only too much indebted to his Order, which delivers him from so many troubles, and thus procures for him so great a facility to serve God perfectly in peace, continually furnishing him with so many means for the welfare of his soul, so many good examples from his companions, so much good advice from his Superiors who watch for his benefit, so many exercises conducive to eternal salvation. All this is true; but with all this he must also, in order not to be deprived of so blessed a lot, resolve to embrace all the sufferings he may, on the other hand, meet with in the Order; for if he does not embrace them with love, he will never obtain that full peace which God gives to those who overcome themselves: To him that overcomes I will give the hidden manna.[14192] For the peace which God gives his faithful servants to taste is hidden; nor is it known by the men of the world, who, seeing their mortified life, know not how to envy them, but pity them and call them the unhappy ones of this earth. But "they see the cross, the unction they do not see,"[14193] says St. Bernard; they see their mortification, but they do not see the contentment that God gives them to enjoy.

It is true that in the spiritual life one has to suffer but, says St. Teresa, when one resolves to suffer, the pain is gone. Nay, the pains themselves turn into joy. "My daughter," so the Lord said one day to St. Bridget, "the treasure of my graces seems to be surrounded with thorns; but for him who overcomes the first stings, all is changed into sweetness." And then those delights which God gives to his beloved souls to enjoy in their prayers, in their Communions, in their solitude, Those lights, those holy ardors and embraces, that quiet of conscience, that blessed hope of eternal life, who can ever understand them, if he does not experience them? "One drop of the consolations of God," said St. Teresa, "is worth more than all the consolations and the pleasures of the world." Our most gracious God knows well how to give to him who suffers something for his sake, even in this valley of tears, the experience of the foretaste of the glory of the blessed; for in this is properly verified that which David says: Thou who framest labor in commandment.[14194] In the spiritual life, God, announcing pains, tediousness, death seems to frame labor, but, in fact, afterwards it is not so; for spiritual life brings to them who entirely give themselves to God that peace which, as St. Paul says, Surpasseth all understanding.[14195] It surpasses all the pleasures of the world and of worldlings. Whence we see a religious more content in a poor cell than all the monarchs in their royal palaces. O taste, and see that the Lord is sweet.[14196]

But, on the other hand, he must be persuaded that he who does not resolve to suffer and to overcome himself in the things contrary to his inclinations, will never be able to enjoy this true peace, though lie should have already entered religion. To him that overcomes, I will give the hidden manna.[14197] It is, then, necessary that he who wishes to be admitted into an Order of exact observance should enter with a mind determined to overcome himself in everything, by expelling from his heart every inclination and desire that is not from God, nor for God, so that he must detach himself from all things, and especially from the four following: 1. From his comforts. 2. From his parents. 3. From self-esteem. 4. From his own will.

DETACHMENT FROM HIS COMFORTS

In religion, after the year of novitiate, one makes, besides the vows of chastity and obedience, also the vow of poverty, in consequence of which one can never possess anything as one's individual property, not even a pin, no income, no money or other things.[14198] The Community will provide him with all that he needs. But the vow of poverty does not suffice to make one a true follower of Jesus Christ if one does not afterwards embrace with joy of spirit all the inconveniences of poverty. "Not poverty, but the love of poverty, is a virtue,"[14199] says St. Bernard; and he means to say that for one to become a saint it is not enough to be poor only, if one does not love also the inconveniences of poverty. "Oh how many would wish to be poor and similar to Jesus Christ!" says Thomas a Kempis; "they wish to be poor, but without any want,"[14200] but so that they be in want of nothing. In a word, they would wish the honor and the reward of poverty, but not the inconveniences of poverty.

It is easy to understand that in religion no one will seek for things that are superfluous,—cloths of silk, costly food, furniture of value, and the like; but he may desire to have all things that are necessary, and these he may be unable to get. For then it is he gives proof that he truly loves poverty, when things that are needful—such as his necessary clothing, bed-covering or food—happen to be wanting, and yet he remains content and is not troubled. And what kind of poverty would that be to suffer if he were never in want of anything necessary? F. Balthasar Alvarez says that in order truly to love poverty we must also love the effects of poverty; that is, as he enumerates them, cold, hunger, thirst, and contempt.[14201]

In religion, every one ought not only to be content with that which is given to him, without ever asking for anything of which, through the neglect of the stewards, he should be in want, which would be a great defect, but he ought also to prepare himself sometimes to bear the want even of those simple things that the Rule allows. For it may happen that sometimes he is in want of clothes, coverings, linen, or such-like things, and then he has to be satisfied with that little which has been given him, without complaining or being disquieted at seeing himself in want even of what is necessary. He who has not this spirit, let him not think of entering religion, because this is a sign that he is not called thereto or that he has not the will to embrace the spirit of the Institute. He who goes to serve God in his house, says St. Teresa, ought to consider that he is going not to be well treated for God, but to suffer for God.

DETACHMENT FROM HIS PARENTS

He who wishes to enter religion must detach himself from his parents and forget them altogether. For, in religious houses of exact observance, detachment from parents is put in practice in the highest degree, in order perfectly to follow the doctrine of Jesus Christ, who said, I came not to send peace, but the sword; I came to set a man at variance with his father, etc.;[14202] and then added the reason: A man's enemies shall be they of his own household.[14203] And this is especially the case, as has been remarked above, in this point of religious vocation. When one's leaving the world is in question, there are no worse enemies than parents, who, either through interest or passion, prefer to become enemies of God, by turning their children away from their vocation, rather than to give their consent to it. Oh! how many parents shall we see in the valley of Josaphat damned for having made their children or nephews lose their vocation! and how many youths shall we see damned who, in order to please their parents, and by not detaching themselves from them, have lost their vocation and afterwards their souls! Whence Jesus declares to us, If any man hate not his father, etc., he cannot be My disciple.[14204] Let him, then, who wishes to enter a religious Order of perfect observance, and to become a true disciple of Jesus Christ, resolve to forget his parents altogether.

When any one has already entered religion, let him remember that he must practise then the same detachment from parents. Let him know that he cannot go to visit his parents in their own house, except in the case of some dangerous illness of his father or mother, or of some other urgent necessity, though always with the permission of the Superior. Otherwise to go to the house of one's parents without the most express permission would be considered in religion as a most notable and scandalous fault. In religion it is also considered a great defect even to ask permission or to show a desire of seeing parents or of speaking with them.

St. Charles Borromeo said that when he visited the house of his parents he always, after his return, found himself less fervent in spirit. And thus, let him who goes to the house of his parents by his own will and not through a positive obedience to his Superiors, be persuaded that he will leave it either under temptation or be cold and lukewarm.

St. Vincent of Paul could only be induced once to visit his country and his parents, and this out of pure necessity; and he said that the love of home and country was a great impediment to his spiritual progress, he said also that many, on account of having visited their country, had become so tender towards their relatives that they were like flies, which being once entangled in a cobweb, cannot extricate themselves from it. He added, "For that one time that I went, though it was for a short time only, and though I took care to prevent in my relatives every hope of help from me, notwithstanding, I felt at leaving them such a pain that I ceased not to weep all along the road, and was for three months harassed by the thought of succoring them. Finally, God in his mercy took that temptation from me."

Let him know, moreover, that no one may write to his parents without permission, and without showing the letter to the Superior. Otherwise, he would be guilty of a most grievous fault that is not to be tolerated in religion, and should be punished with severity; for from this might come a thousand disorders tending to destroy the religious spirit. Let especially the new—comer know that during the novitiate this is observed with the greatest rigor; for novices during their year of novitiate do not easily obtain permission to talk to their parents, or to write to them.

Finally, let him know that in case a subject should become sick, it would be a notable defect to ask or to show an inclination to go to his own house for his restoration to health, under the plea of being better taken care of, or of enjoying the benefit of his native air. The air of his own country becomes almost always, or rather always, hurtful, and pestilential to the spirit of the subject. And if he should ever say that he wishes to be cured at home in order not to subject the Order to expenses for remedies, let him know that the Order has charity enough to take sufficient care of the sick. As to the change of air, the Superiors will think of that; and if that of one house is not beneficial to him, they will send him to another. And as for remedies, they will even sell the books, if need be, to provide for the sick. And so let him be sure that divine Providence will not fail him. And if the Lord should decree against his recovery, he ought to conform to the will of God, without even mentioning the word "home." The greatest grace that he who enters an Order can desire is to die, when God wills it, in the house of God, assisted by the brethren of his Order, and not in a secular house in the midst of his relatives.

DETACHMENT FROM SELF-ESTEEM

He must also be altogether detached from all self-esteem. Many leave their country, their comforts, and parents, but carry with them a certain esteem for themselves; but this is the most hurtful attachment of all. The greatest sacrifice that we can make to God is to give to him not only goods, pleasures, and home but ourselves also, by leaving ourselves. This is that denying of one's self which Jesus Christ recommends above all to his followers. And in order to deny one's self, one must first place under foot all self-esteem, by desiring and embracing every imaginable contempt that he may meet with in religion; as, for instance, to see others, whom perhaps he thinks less deserving, preferred to himself, or to be considered unfit to be employed, or only employed in lower and more laborious occupations. He ought to know that in the house of God those charges are the highest and the most honorable that are imposed by obedience. God forbid that any one should seek for or aspire to any office or charge of pre-eminence. This would be a strange thing in religion and he would be noted as proud and ambitious, and as such should be put in penance, and should especially be "mortified in this point. Better would it be, perhaps, that a religious Order should be destroyed than that there should enter into it that accursed pest of ambition which, when it enters, disfigures the most exemplary Communities, and the most beautiful works of God.[14205]

But he ought to feel even consoled in spirit when he sees himself mocked and despised by his companions. I say consoled in spirit, for as to the flesh this will be impossible, nor need a subject be uneasy when he sees that he resents it; it is enough that the spirit embraces it, and that he rejoices at it in the superior part of the soul. Thus also seeing himself continually reprimanded and mortified by all, not only by Superiors, but also by equals and inferiors, he ought heartily, and with a tranquil mind, to thank those who thus reprimand him, and have the charity to admonish him, answering that he will be more attentive not to fall into that fault again.

One of the greatest desires of the saints in this world was to be contemned for the love of Jesus Christ. It was this that St. John of the Cross asked for, when Jesus Christ appeared to him with a cross on his shoulder, and said, "John, ask from me what thou wishest," and St. John answered, "O Lord, to suffer and to be despised for Thee."[14206] The Doctors teach, with St. Francis de Sales, that the highest degree of humility we can have is to be pleased with abjections and humiliations. And in this consists also one of the greatest merits we can have with God. One contempt suffered in peace for the love of God is of greater value in his sight than a thousand disciplines and a thousand fasts.

It is necessary to know that to suffer contempt either from Superiors or from companions is a thing unavoidable even in the most holy Communities. Read the lives of the saints, and you will see how many mortifications were encountered by St. Francis Regis, St. Francis of Jerome, Father Torres, and others. The Lord sometimes permits that even among saints there should exist, though without their fault, certain natural antipathies, or at least a certain diversity of character among subjects of the greatest piety, which will cause them to suffer many contradictions. At other times false reports will be spread and believed. God himself will permit this, in order that the subjects may have occasion to exercise themselves in patience and humility.

In short, he will gain little in religion and lose much who cannot quietly put up with contempt and contradiction; and, therefore, he who enters religion to give himself entirely to God ought to be ashamed not to know how to bear contempt when he appears before Jesus Christ, who was "filled with opprobriums"[14207] for love of us. Let every one be attentive to this, and resolve to be pleased in religion with all abjections, and to prepare himself to suffer many of them, for without the least doubt he will have many to bear. Otherwise, the disquiet caused by contradictions, and contempt badly borne with, might trouble him so much as to make him lose his vocation, and chase him out of religion. Oh, how many have lost their vocation on account of such impatience in humiliations! But of what service to the Order or to God can he be who does not know how to bear contempt for his sake? And how can one ever be said to be dead according to that promise which he made to Jesus Christ, on entering religion, to die to himself if he remained alive to resentment and disquiet, when he sees himself humbled? Out of the Order with such subjects, so attached to their own esteem! out with them! It is well for them to go as soon as possible, that they may not infect the rest also with their pride. In religion every one ought to be dead, and especially to his own self-esteem, otherwise it is better for him not to enter, or to depart again if he has already entered.

DETACHMENT FROM HIS OWN WILL

He who enters religion must altogether renounce his own will, consecrating it entirely to holy obedience. Of all things, this is the most necessary. What does it avail to leave comforts, parents, and honors, if we still carry into religion our own will? In this principally consists the denial of ourselves, the spiritual death, and the entire surrender of ourselves to Jesus Christ. The gift of the heart-that is, of the will—is what pleases him most, and what he wishes from the children of religion. Otherwise, if we do not entirely detach ourselves from our own will and renounce it in all, all mortifications, all meditations and prayers, and all other sacrifices, will be of little avail.

It is, then evident that this is the greatest merit we can have before God, and this is the only and sure way pleasing God in all things, so that then we can, each one of us, say what Jesus our Saviour said: I do always the things that please Him.[14208] Certainly, he who in religion lives without self-will may say and hope that in all that he does he pleases God, whether he studies or prays, or hears confessions, whether he goes to the refectory or to recreation, or to rest; for in religion not a step is made, not a breath drawn, but in obedience to the Rule, or to Superiors.

The world does not know, and even certain persons given to spirituality have little idea of, the great value of a Community life under obedience. It is true that outside of religious Communities there are to be found many persons who do much, and, may be, more than those who live under obedience; they preach, do penance, pray and fast, but in all this they consult more or less their own will. God grant that at the day of judgment they may not have to lament as those mentioned in Scripture: Why have we fasted and Thou hast not regarded, have we humbled ourselves, and Thou hast not taken notice? Behold, in the day of your fast, your own will is found.[14209] On which passage St. Bernard remarks: "Self-will is a great evil, for through it that which is good in itself may be for you no good at all."[14210] This to be understood when in all these exercises we seek not God, but ourselves. On the contrary, he who does all by obedience is sure that in all he pleases God. The Venerable Mother Mary of Jesus said that she prized so much her vocation to religion principally for two reasons: the first was that in the monastery she enjoyed always the presence and company of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, and the other was that there by obedience she entirely belonged to God, sacrificing to him her own will.

It is related by Father Rodriguez that after the death of Dositheus, the disciple of St. Dorotheus, the Lord revealed that in those five years he had lived under obedience, though by reason of his infirmities he could not practise the austerities of the other monks, yet by the virtue of obedience he had merited the reward of St. Paul the Hermit and of St. Anthony the Abbot.

He, then, who wishes to enter religion must resolve to renounce altogether his own will, and to will only what holy obedience wills. God preserve any religious from ever letting escape from his mouth the words, I will or I will not. But in all things, even when asked by Superiors what he desires, he should only answer, I wish that which holy obedience wills. And, provided there is no evident sin, he ought in every command imposed on him to obey blindly and without examination, because the duty of examining and deciding the doubts belongs not to him, but to his Superiors. Otherwise, if in obeying he does not submit his own judgment to that of the Superior, his obedience is imperfect. St. Ignatius of Loyola said that prudence in things of obedience is not required in subjects, but in Superiors; and if there is prudence in obeying, it is to obey without prudence. St. Bernard says, "Perfect obedience is indiscreet,"[14211] and in another place he says, "For a prudent novice to remain in the Congregation is an impossible thing;" and, adding the reason for it, he says, "To judge belongs to the Superior; and to obey, to the subject."[14212]

But to make progress in this virtue of obedience, on which all depends, he must always keep his mind ready to do all that for which he feels the greatest repugnance, and, on the contrary, he must be prepared to bear it quietly when he sees that all he seeks or desires is refused to him. It will happen that when he wishes to be in solitude, to apply himself to prayer or study, he will be the most employed in exterior occupations. For though it is true that in religion one leads as much as possible a solitary life when at home, and that for this end there are many hours of silence,—the retreat each year of ten days in perfect silence, and of one day each month, besides the fifteen days before the receiving of the habit, and one of fifteen before the profession when the vows are made,—nevertheless, if it is an Order of priests called to work and to be employed for the salvation of souls, the subject, if he is continually employed in this by obedience, ought to be content with the prayers and exercises of the Community. He must be prepared sometimes to go even without these when obedience will have it so, without either excusing himself or being disquieted, being well persuaded of that of which St. Mary

Magdalene of Pazzi was so confident when she said that "all the things which are done through obedience are but so many prayers."[14213]

V. TRIALS THAT WE MUST EXPECT TO HAVE IN THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

When, then, any one has thus entered religion, however truly he may be called, and though he may have conquered all his passions and his earthly affections, let him not imagine that he will be exempt from other temptations and trials, which God himself will send him, such as tediousness, darkness, various fears, in order to establish him more firmly in his vocation. We must remember that even the saints, who have loved their vocation the most, have sometimes suffered great darkness with regard to it, and that it seemed to them as if they were deceived, and would not be able to save themselves in that state. So it happened with St. Teresa, St. John of the Cross, the Venerable Mother Frances de Chantal. But by recommending themselves to God, that darkness was dissipated, and they recovered their peace of mind. Thus the Lord tries his most beloved children, as it was said to Tobias: Because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee.[14214] And in the book of Deuteronomy, The Lord your God trieth you, that it may appear whether you love him or not.[14215] Let each one therefore prepare himself to suffer in religion this obscurity. It will sometimes appear to him that he cannot bear the observance of the Order, that he will have no more peace of mind, or will not even be able to save himself. But, most of all, every one must be on his guard when the temptation presents specious scruples or pretexts of greater spiritual good, in order to make him abandon his vocation.

The principal remedies in such temptations are two in number.

FIRST REMEDY: TO HAVE RECOURSE TO GOD

The first is prayer: Go ye to Him and be enlightened.[14216] For as it will not be possible for temptation to overcome him who has recourse to prayer, so he who does not recommend himself to God will surely be overcome by it. And let it be remarked that sometimes it will not suffice to have recourse to God once, or for a few days, to become victorious. Perhaps the Lord will permit the temptation to continue, even after we have prayed for several weeks, months, and even years; but let us be assured that he who ceases not to recommend himself to God will certainly be enlightened and victorious; and thereafter he will have more peace and be more firm in his vocation.

Until we have gone through that storm, which for the most part comes over all, let none of us think himself secure. Let us be persuaded, however, that in this time of temptation we ought not to expect a fervor and a clearness of reason sufficient to tranquillize ourselves; for in the midst of this darkness we see nothing but confusion. We have nothing then to do but to say to the Lord, O Lord, help me! O Lord, help me! and also to have frequently recourse to Most Holy Mary, who is the mother of perseverance, confiding in that divine promise, Ask and you shall receive.[14217] And it is certain that he who, with the help of divine grace, is victorious in such a combat finds afterwards a double calm and peace in his vocation.

SECOND REMEDY: TO HAVE RECOURSE TO THE SUPERIORS

The second remedy, and a principal and necessary one in such temptations, is to communicate to the Superiors, or to the spiritual Father of the Community, the temptation which afflicts you, and this at once, before the temptation becomes strong. St. Philip Neri said that when a temptation is thus manifested it is half vanquished. On the contrary, there is in such a case no greater evil than to conceal the temptation from Superiors; for then, on the one hand, God withdraws his light because of the little fidelity shown by the subject in not disclosing it, and, on the other, whilst the mine is not sprung, the temptation gains strength. W hence it may be held for certain that he will surely lose his vocation who, when he is tempted against it, does not disclose his temptations.

And let it be understood that in religion the most dangerous temptations that hell can bring against a subject are those against vocation, in which, if it should succeed and conquer, by that one stroke it will have gained many victories; for when a subject has lost his vocation and left religi0n, what good he any more able to do in the service of God? Though the enemy may make him believe that out of religion he will have more peace and be able to do more good, nevertheless let him hold for certain that as soon as he is out of it he will feel such a remorse in his heart that he will never-more have peace. And God grant that such a remorse may not torment him afterwards through all eternity in hell, into which, as has already been said, he who through his own fault loses his vocation falls so very easily. He will be so lukewarm and discouraged in doing good that he will not even have the courage to raise his eyes to heaven. It will be an easy thing for him to give up prayer altogether, because as often as he begins it he will feel a hell of remorse, hearing his conscience reproach him, and saying, "What hast thou done? Thou hast abandoned God; thou hast lost thy vocation; and for what? To follow thine own caprice, to please thy parents." Let him be certain that he will have to hear this reproach through his whole life, and still more shall he hear it made to him at the hour of his death, when, in sight of eternity, instead of dying in the house of God, and in the midst of good brethren in religion, he will have to die outside of the Community, perhaps in his own house, in the midst of his relatives, to please whom he has displeased God. Let religious always beseech God to let them die rather than to permit that greatest of disgraces, the greatness of which they will better understand at the point of death and to their greater torment, because then there will be no more any remedy for their error. For him, then, who is tempted against his vocation, this is the best meditation he can make in the time of the temptation, namely, to reflect what torment the remorse of having lost his vocation, and of having to die outside of religion, through his own caprice, through his own fault, will cause him at the hour of death.

CONCLUSION

Finally, let him who wishes to enter religion not forget to resolve to become a saint, and to suffer every exterior and interior pain, in order to be faithful to God, and not to lose his vocation. And if he be not resolved to this, I exhort him not to deceive the Superiors and himself, and not to enter at all, for this is a sign that he is not called, or, which is a still greater evil, that he wishes not to correspond, as he ought, with the grace of his vocation. Hence, with so bad a disposition it is better to remain without, in order to acquire a better disposition, to resolve to give himself entirely to God, and to suffer all for God. Otherwise he will do an injury both to himself and to the Order; for he will easily go back to the world, and then, being disgraced before the world as well as before God, he will be guilty of a still further infidelity to his vocation, and will lose the confidence in the power of taking another step in the way of God. God only knows into what other misfortunes and sins he may afterwards fall.

On the other hand, a beautiful sight it is to see in religion souls wholly given to God, who live in the world as if out of the world, without any other thought than that of pleasing God.

In religion each one has to live only for eternal life. What happiness for us, if we spend these few days of or life for God! And to this he is most especially obliged who has perhaps already spent much of his life in the service of the world. Let us set eternity before our eyes, and then we shall suffer all with peace and joyfulness.

Let us thank God, who gives us so much light and so many means to serve him Perfectly, since he has chosen us, from among so many, to serve him in religion having bestowed on us the gift of his holy love. Let us make haste to please him in the practice of virtue, reflecting that, as St. Teresa said to her daughters, we have already by his grace done the principal thing necessary to become saints, by turning our backs on the world and all its goods, the least yet remains to be done, and we shall be saints. I hold it for certain that for those who die in religion, Jesus Christ has prepared a prominent place in paradise. On this earth we shall be poor, despised, and treated as fools, as imprudent men, but in the other life our lot will be changed.

Let us always recommend ourselves to our Redeemer hidden in the Sacrament, and to Most Holy Mary, because in religion all subjects must profess a most special love for Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, and for the Immaculate Virgin Mary; and let us have great confidence, Jesus Christ has chosen us to be princes of his court, as we may confidently conclude from the protection he extends to all religious Orders, and to each member of them. The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?[14218]

O Lord! finish Thy work, and, for Thy glory, grant us to be all Thine, so that all the members of Thy Orders may until the day of judgment be pleasing to Thee, and gain over to Thee an immense number of souls. Amen. Amen.

Consideration I

HOW THE SALVATION OF THE SOUL IS SECURED BY ENTERING THE RELIGIOUS STATE

To know how important is the eternal salvation of our soul, it suffices to have faith, and to consider that we have but one soul, and when that is lost, all is lost. What does it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his soul.[14219] This great maxim of the Gospel has induced many youths either to shut themselves up in cloisters or to live in deserts, or by martyrdom to give up their lives for Jesus Christ. For, said they, what does it profit us to possess the whole world, and all the goods of this world, in this present life, which must soon finish, and then be damned and be miserable in that life to come, which will never end? All those rich men, all those princes and emperors, who are now in hell, what have they now of all they enjoyed in this life, but a greater torment and a greater despair? Miserable beings, they lament now and say, All those things are passed like shadows.[14220] For them all is passed like a shadow, like a dream, and that lamentation which is their lot has lasted already many years and shall last throughout all eternity. The fashion of this world passeth away.[14221] This world is a scene which lasts but a short time; happy he who plays on tins scene that part which will afterwards make him happy in the life which will never end. When he shall then be contented, honored, and a prince in paradise, so long as God shall be God, little will he care for having been in this world poor, despised, and in tribulation. For this end alone has God placed us on this earth, and keeps us here in life, not to acquire transitory but eternal goods: The end is life everlasting.[14222]

This is the sole end, which all men who live in the world ought to have in view. But the misfortune is, that in the world one thinks little or nothing of everlasting life. In the midst of the darkness of this Egypt, the greatest number of men bestow all their care on acquiring honor and pleasures; and this is the reason why so many perish. With desolation is all the land made desolate, because there is none that considereth in his heart.[14223] How few are they who reflect on death, by which for us the scene is closed; on the eternity which awaits us; on what God has done for our sake! And thence it comes that these miserable beings live in blindness and at random, far from God, having their eyes, like the beasts, intent only on earthly things, without remembering God, without desiring his love, and without a thought of eternity. Therefore they die afterwards an unhappy death, which will be the beginning of an eternal death and an endless misery. Having arrived there, they will open their eyes; but it will be only to lament for their own foolishness.

This is the great means of salvation which is found in religion, to wit: the continual meditation on eternal truths. Remember thy last end, and thou shall never sin.[14224] In all well-regulated religious houses this is done every day, and even several times a day. And therefore in this light of divine things, which there shines continually, it is morally impossible to live, at least for a long time, far from God, and without keeping one's account ready for eternity.

PRAYER

O my God! how have I ever deserved this great mercy, that, having left so many others to live in the midst of the world, Thou hast willed to call me, who have offended Thee more than others, and deserved, more than they, to be deprived of Thy divine light, to enjoy the honor of living as a friend in Thy own house! O Lord! grant that I may understand this exceeding grace which Thou hast bestowed on me, that I may always thank Thee for it, as I purpose and hope to do always during my life and throughout eternity, and do not permit me to be ungrateful for it. Since Thou hast been so liberal towards me, and hast in Thy love preferred me to others, it is but just that more than others I should serve and love Thee. O my Jesus! Thou wouldst have me to be wholly Thine, and to Thee I give myself wholly. Accept me, and henceforward keep me as Thy own, since I am no more mine. Finish Thou the work which Thou hast begun. Thou hast called me to Thy house, because Thou wilt have me become a saint. Make me then what Thou wilt have me. Do it, O eternal Father! for the love of Jesus Christ, in whom is all my confidence. I love Thee, my sovereign good, I love Thee. O infinite goodness! I love Thee alone, and will love Thee forever. O Mary, my hope, come to my assistance, and obtain for me to be always faithful and thankful to my Lord.

THE HAPPY DEATH OF THE RELIGIOUS

Happy are the dead who die in the Lord.[14225] And who are those blessed dead who die in the Lord, but the religious, who at the end of their lives are found already dead to the world, having already detached themselves by their holy vows from the world and all its goods?

Consider, my brother, how content you will feel if following your vocation, it will be your good fortune to die in the house of God. The devil will certainly represent to you that if you retire into the house of God, you may perhaps afterwards repent of having left your own house and your own country, and deprived your parents of that succor which they might have expected from you. But say to yourself: Shall I, at the point of death, repent of having put my resolution in execution, or shall I be content? I beseech you, therefore, to imagine yourself now already at the point of death, about to appear before the tribunal of Jesus Christ. Reflect what then, reduced to that state, you would wish to have done. Perhaps to have contented your parents, to have worked for your own family and your country, and then to die surrounded by brothers, and nephews, and relatives, after having lived in your own house with the title of pastor, of canon, of bishop, of a member of the cabinet, and after having done your own will? or rather, to die in the house of God, assisted by your good brethren in religion, who encourage you on the great passage to eternity, after having lived many years in religion, humbled, mortified, poor, far from parents, deprived of your own will, and under obedience, and detached from everything in the world,—all these things render death sweet and agreeable? "He who has been accustomed to deprive himself of the delights of the world," says St. Bernard, "will not regret having done so when he has to leave it."[14226] Pope Honorius II., when dying, wished that he had remained in his monastery, occupied in washing the plates, and had not been Pope. Philip II. wished at his death that he had been a lay-brother in some religious Order, intent on serving God, and had not been a king. Philip III., also King of Spain, said when he was dying, "Oh that I had been in a desert, there to serve God, and that I had never been a monarch! for had such been the case, I should now appear with more confidence before the tribunal of Jesus Christ."

When, then, hell tempts you about your vocation, think of the hour of death, and set before your eyes that all-important moment "upon which eternity depends."[14227] Thus you will overcome all temptations; you will be faithful to God; and certainly you will not repent of it at the point of death, but will give thanks to the Lord, and die contented. Gerard, brother of St. Bernard, died singing, at the very thought of dying in the house of God.

Father Suarez, of the Company of Jesus, felt at his death so great consolation and sweetness at dying in religion that he said, "I never thought it was so sweet to die."[14228]

Another good religious, of the same society, when at the point of death, laughed; and being asked why he laughed, answered: "And why should I not laugh? Has not Jesus Christ himself promised paradise to him who leaves everything for his sake? Was it not he who said, Every one that has left house, or brethren, or father, etc., shall receive a hundred-fold, and shall possess life ever-lasting?[14229] I have left all for God; God is faithful, he cannot fail to fulfil his promises; and so," he said, "why should I not rejoice and laugh, seeing myself assured of paradise?

A certain lay-brother, who died some years ago, was asked, at his death in which house he would rather be. He answered, "I desire nothing but to die and to be united with God.

Father Januarius Sarnelli, a short time before his death, when conversing with God, uttered the following words: "O Lord, Thou knowest that all I have done, all I have thought, has been for Thy glory; now I wish to go to see Thee face to face, if it please Thee so;" then he said, " Come, I will begin a sweet agony;" and began to converse affectionately with God, and shortly after placidly expired, preserving the smile on his lips, and the body began to give forth a sweet odor, which, as they attested, was perceived for several days in the room in which he had died.

St. Bernard, then, speaking of the happy state of religious, had good reason to exclaim: "O secure life, in which death is expected without fear,—ay, sweetly desired and devoutly accepted!"[14230]

PRAYER

O my Lord Jesus Christ! who, in order to obtain a happy death for me, hast chosen so bitter a death for Thyself; since Thou hast loved me to such an extent as to have chosen me to follow more closely Thy holy life, to have me thus more intimately united with Thy loving heart, bind me, I beseech Thee, wholly to Thee with the sweet cords of Thy love, that I may no more separate myself from Thee. O my beloved Redeemer! I wish to be grateful to Thee, and to correspond with Thy grace, but I fear my weakness may render me unfaithful; O my Jesus! do not permit this. Let me die rather than abandon Thee, or forget the peculiar affection Thou hast shown me.

I love Thee, O my dear Saviour! Thou art and shalt always be the only Lord of my heart and of my soul. I leave all and choose Thee alone for my treasure, O most pure Lamb of God. O my most ardent lover! My beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands.[14231] Begone, ye creatures, my only good is my God, he is my love, my all. I love Thee, O my Jesus! and in loving Thee I will spend the remainder of my life, be it short, or be it long. I embrace Thee, I press Thee to my heart, and I wish to die united with Thee. I wish nothing else. Make me live always burning with Thy love, and when I shall have arrived at the end of my life, make me expire in an ardent act of love towards Thee.

Immaculate Virgin Mary, obtain thou this grace for me; I hope it from thee.

THE ACCOUNT WHICH HE WILL HAVE TO RENDER TO JESUS CHRIST, ON THE DAY OF JUDGMENT, WHO DOES NOT FOLLOW HIS VOCATION

The grace of vocation to the religious state is not an ordinary grace; it is a very rare one, which God grants only to a few. He hath not done so to every nation.[14232] Oh, how much greater is this grace, to be called to a perfect life and to become one of the household of God, than if one were called to be the king of any kingdom on this earth! for what comparison can there be between a temporal kingdom of this earth and the eternal kingdom of heaven?

But the greater the grace is, the greater will be the indignation of the Lord against him who has not corresponded with it, and the more rigorous will be his judgment at the day of account. If a king were to call a poor shepherd to his royal palace, to serve him among the noblemen of his court, what would not be the indignation of this king were he to refuse such a favor, through willingness to leave his miserable stable and his little flock? God knows well the value of his graces, and therefore he chastises with severity those who despise them. He is the lord; when he calls, he wishes to obey, and obeyed promptly. When, therefore, by his inspiration, he calls a soul to a perfect life, if it does not correspond, he deprives it of his light, and abandons it to its own darkness. Oh, how many poor souls shall we see among the reprobate on the day of judgment for this very reason, that they were called and would not correspond!

Give thanks, then, to the Lord, who has invited you to follow him; but if you do not correspond, fear. Since God calls you to serve him nearer to his person, it is a sign that he wishes to save you. But he will have you to be saved in that path only which he indicates to you and has chosen for you. If you wish to save yourself on a road of your own choosing, there is great danger that you will not be saved at all; for if you remain in the world, when God wishes you to be a religious, he will not give you those efficacious helps prepared for you had you lived in his house, and without these you will not save yourself. My sheep hear My voice.[14233] He who will not obey the voice of God shows that he is not, and will not be, one of his sheep, but in the valley of Josaphat he will be condemned with the goats.

PRAYER

O Lord, Thou hast shown me such an excess of bounty as to choose me from among so many others, to serve Thee in Thy own house with Thy most beloved servants. I know how great is that grace, and how unworthy of it I have been. Behold. I am willing to correspond to so great a love. I will obey Thee. Since Thou hast been towards me so liberal as to call me when I did not seek Thee, and when I was so ungrateful, permit it not that I should offer to Thee that greater excess of ingratitude, to embrace again my enemy, the world, in which heretofore I have so oftentimes forfeited Thy grace and my eternal salvation, and thus to forsake Thee, who hast shed Thy blood and given Thy life for my sake. Since Thou hast called me, give me also the strength to correspond to the call. Already have I promised to obey Thee. I promise it again, but without the grace of perseverance I cannot be faithful to Thee. This perseverance I ask from Thee, and through Thy own merits it is that I wish it and hope to obtain it. Give me the courage to vanquish the passions of the flesh, through which the devil seeks to induce me to betray Thee. I love Thee, O my Jesus! to Thee I consecrate myself entirely. I am already Thine, I will be always Thine. O Mary, my mother and my hope, thou art the mother of perseverance. This grace is only dispensed through thy hands; do thou obtain it for me. In thee do I confide.

THE TORMENT WHICH IN HELL WILL BE THE LOT OF HIM WHO IS DAMNED FOR HAVING LOST HIS VOCATION

The pain of having through one's own fault lost some great good, or of having brought upon one's self voluntarily some great evil, is a pain so great that even in this life it causes an insupportable torment. But what torment will that youth, called by the singular favor of God to the religious state, feel in hell when he then perceives that if he had obeyed God he would have attained a high place in paradise, and sees himself nevertheless confined in that prison of torments, without hope of remedy for this his eternal ruin! Their worm dieth not.[14234]

This will be that worm, which, living always, will always gnaw his heart by a continual remorse. He will say then, What a fool I was! I might have become a great saint. And if I had obeyed, I would certainly have become so; and now I am damned without remedy.

Miserable being! Then for his greater torment, on the day of judgement he will see and recognize at the right hand, and crowned as saints, those who have followed their vocation, and, leaving the world, have retired to the house of God, to which he also had been once called. And then will he see himself separated from the company of the blessed, and placed in the midst of that innumerable and miserable crew of the damned, for his disobedience to the voice of God.

We know well, as we have considered above, that to this most unhappy lot he exposes himself who, in order to follow his own caprice, turns a deaf ear to the call of God. Therefore, my brother, you who have already been called to become a saint in the house of God, consider that you will expose yourself to a great danger should you lose your vocation through your own fault. Consider that this very vocation which God in his sovereign bounty has given you, in order, as it were, to take you out from among the populace and place you among the chosen princes of his paradise, will, through your own fault, should you be unfaithful to it, become an especial hell for you. Make your choice then, for God leaves it in your own hands, either to be a great king in paradise, or a reprobate in hell, more despairing than the rest.

PRAYER

No, my God, permit me not to disobey Thee and to be unfaithful. I see Thy goodness, and thank Thee for that instead of casting me away from Thy face, and banishing me into hell, as I have so often deserved, Thou callest me to become a saint, and preparest for me a high place in paradise. I see that I should deserve a double torment, should I not correspond with this grace, which is not given to all. I will obey Thee. Behold, I am Thine, and always will be Thine. I embrace with joy all the pains and discomforts of the religious life, to which Thou invitest me. And what are these pains in comparison with the eternal pains, which I have deserved? I was entirely lost through my sins; now I give myself entirely to Thee. Dispose of me and my life as Thou pleasest. Accept. O Lord! of one already condemned to hell, as I have been, to serve Thee and love Thee in this life and in the next. I will love Thee as much as I have deserved to be doomed to hate Thee in hell, O God, worthy of an infinite love! O my Jesus! Thou hast broken those chains by which the world held me bound; Thou hast delivered me from the servitude of my enemies. I will love Thee much, then, O my love! and for the love I bear Thee, I will always love Thee and obey Thee. Always will I thank Thee, O Mary, my advocate, who hast obtained this mercy for me. Help me, and suffer me not to be ungrateful to that God who has loved me so much. Obtain for me that I may die rather than be unfaithful to so great a grace. Thus I hope.

Consideration V

THE IMMENSE GLORY WHICH RELIGIOUS ENJOY IN HEAVEN

Consider, in the first place, that which St. Bernard says, that it is difficult for religious who die in the religious state to be damned. "From the cell to heaven the way is easy; one scarcely ever descends from his cell into hell." And the reason which the saint adduces is, "because one scarcely ever perseveres in it until death, unless he be predestinated."[14235] For a religious with difficulty perseveres until his death, if he be not of the number of the elect of paradise. Therefore, St. Laurence Justinian called the religious state the gate of paradise. "Of that heavenly city this is the gate."[14236] And he said that "therefore the religious have a great sign of their predestination."[14237]

Consider, moreover, that the reward of heaven, as the Apostle says, is "a crown of justice;" [14238] wherefore God, though he rewards us for our works more abundantly than we deserve, rewards us nevertheless in proportion to the works we have done, He will render to every one according to his works.[14239] From this consider how exceedingly great will be the reward which God will give in heaven to good religious, in consideration of the great merits they daily acquire.

The religious gives to God all his goods of this earth, and is content to be entirely poor, without possessing anything. The religious renounces all attachment to his parents, friends, and country, in order to unite himself more closely to God. The religious continually mortifies himself in many things which he would enjoy in the world. The religious, finally, gives to God his whole self, by giving him his will through the vow of obedience.

But the dearest thing that we have is our own will, and what God, of all other things, requires of us most is our heart; that is to say, our will. My son, give Me thy heart.[14240] He who serves God in the world will give him his possessions, but not himself; he will give him a part and not the whole, for he will give him indeed his goods by alms-deeds, his food by fasting, his blood by disciplines, etc.; but he will always reserve for himself his own will, fasting when he pleases, praying when he likes. But the religious, giving him his own will, gives himself and gives all, gives not only the fruits of the tree, but the whole tree itself. Whence he may then truly say to him, O Lord! having given Thee my will, I have nothing more to give to Thee.

And, therefore, in all that he does through obedience he is sure to do the will of God perfectly, and merits by all, not only when he prays, when he hears confessions, when he preaches, or fasts, or practises other mortifications, but also when he takes his food, when he sweeps his room, when he makes his bed, when he takes his rest, when he recreates himself; for, doing all this through obedience, in all he does the will of God. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi said that all that is done through obedience is a prayer. Hence, St. Anselm, speaking of those who love obedience, asserted that all that religious do is meritorious for them. St. Aloysius Gonzaga said that in religion one sails, as it were, in a vessel, in which he even advances who does not row.

Oh, how much more will a religious gain in one month by observing his Rule than a secular, with all his penance and prayers, in a year! Of that disciple of Dorotheus called Dositheus, it was revealed that for the five years he had lived under obedience there was given to him in heaven the glory of St. Paul the Hermit and of St. Anthony the Abbot, both of whom had for so many years lived in the desert. Religious, it is true, have to suffer the inconveniences of regular observance: Going, they went and wept. But when they are called to the other life, they will go to heaven, but, coming, they shall come with joyfulness, carrying their sheaves.[14241] Whence they shall then sing, The lines are fallen unto me in goodly places, for my inheritance is goodly to me.[14242] These bonds which have bound me to the Lord have become for me exceedingly precious, and the glory they have acquired for me is exceedingly great.

PRAYER

Is it possible, O my God and my true lover! that Thou desirest so much my good, and to be loved by me, and that I, miserable that I am, desire so little to love and to please Thee? For what end hast Thou favored me with so many graces, and taken me out of the world? O my Jesus! I understand Thee. Thou lovest me much, Thou wilt have me love Thee much also and be all Thine, in this life and in the next. Thou wishest that my love should not be divided with creatures, but wilt have it to be wholly for Thyself, the only good, the only lovely one, and worthy of infinite love. Ah! my Lord, my treasure, my love, my all, yet I pant and truly desire to love Thee, and to love no other but Thee. I thank Thee for this desire Thou hast given me; preserve it in me, always increase it in me, and grant that I may please Thee, and love Thee on this earth as Thou desirest, so that I may come hereafter to love Thee face to face, with all my strength in paradise. Behold, this is all that I ask from Thee. Thee will I love, O my God! I will love Thee, and for Thy love I offer myself to suffer every pain. I will become a saint, not that I may enjoy great delight in heaven, but to please Thee much, O my beloved Lord! and to love Thee much forever. Graciously hear me, O eternal Father! for the love of Jesus Christ.

My Mother Mary, for the love of this thy Son, help thou me. Thou art my hope; from thee I hope every good.

Consideration VI

THE INTERIOR PEACE THAT GOD GIVES GOOD RELIGIOUS TO ENJOY

The promises of God cannot fail. God has said, Every one that has left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, . . . or lands for My name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall possess life everlasting.[14243] That is, the hundredfold on this earth, and life everlasting in heaven.

The peace of the soul is a good which is of greater value than all the kingdoms of the world. And what avails it to have the dominions of the whole world without interior peace? Better is it to be the poorest villager, and to be content, than to be the lord of the whole world, and to live a discontented life. But who can give this peace? The unquiet world? Oh no, peace is a good that is obtained only from God. "O God!" prays the Church, "give to Thy servants that peace which the world cannot give."[14244] Therefore he is called the God of all consolation. But if God be the sole giver of peace, to whom shall we suppose will he give that peace but to those who leave all, and detach themselves from all creatures, in order to give themselves entirely to their Creator? And therefore is it seen that good religious shut up in their cells, though mortified, despised, and poor, live a more contented life than the great ones of the world, with all the riches, the pomps, and diversions they enjoy.

St. Scholastica said that if men knew the peace that good religious enjoy, the whole world would become a monastery; and St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi said that all, if they knew it, would scale the walls of the monasteries, in order to get into them. The human heart having been created for an infinite good, all creatures cannot content it, they being finite, imperfect, and few; God alone, who is an infinite good, can render it content. Delight in the Lord and He will give thee the request of thy heart.[14245] Oh no; a good religious united with God envies none of the princes of the world who possess kingdoms, riches, and honors. "Let the rich," he will say with St. Paulinus, "have their riches, the kings have their kingdoms: to me Christ is my kingdom and my glory."[14246] He will see those of the world foolishly glory in their displays and vanities; but he, seeking always to detach himself more from earthly things, always to unite himself more closely to his God, will live contented in this life, and will say, Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will call upon the name of the Lord, our God.[14247]

St. Teresa said that one drop of heavenly consolation is of greater value than all the pleasures of the world. Father Charles of Lorraine, having become a religious, said that God, by one moment of the happiness that he gave him to feel in religion, superabundantly paid him for all he had left for God. Hence his joyfulness was sometimes so great that, when alone in his cell, he could not help beginning to leap. The Blessed Seraphino of Ascoli, a Capuchin lay-brother, said that he would not exchange a foot length of his cord for all the kingdoms of the world.

Oh, what contentment does he find who, having left all for God, is able to say with St. Francis, "My God and my all!"[14248] and with that to see himself freed from the servitude of the world, from the thraldom of worldly fashion, and from all earthly affections. This is the liberty that is enjoyed by the children of God, such as good religious are. It is true that in the beginning, the deprivation of the conversations and pastimes of the world, the observances of the Community, and the rules, seem to be thorns; but these thorns, as our Lord said to St. Bridget, will all become flowers and delights to him who courageously bears their first sting, and he will taste on this earth that peace which, as St. Paul says, surpasseth all the gratifications of the senses, and all the enjoyments of feasts, of banquets, and of the pleasures of the world: The peace of God which surpasseth all understanding.[14249] And what greater peace can there be than to know that one pleases God?

PRAYER

O my Lord and my God, my all! I know that Thou alone canst make me contented in this and in the next life. But I will not love Thee for my own contentment, I will love Thee only to content Thy heart. I wish this to be my peace, my only satisfaction during my whole life, to unite my will to Thy holy will, even should I have to suffer every pain in order to do this. Thou art my God, I am Thy creature. And what can I hope for greater than to please Thee, my Lord, my God, who hast been so partial in Thy love towards me? Thou, O my Jesus! hast left heaven to live, for the love of me, a poor and mortified life. I leave all to live only for the love of Thee, my most blessed Redeemer. I love Thee with my whole heart; if only Thou wilt give me the grace to love Thee, treat me as Thou pleasest.

Mary, Mother of my God! protect me and render me like to thee, not in thy glory, which I do not deserve, as thou dost, but in pleasing God, and obeying his holy will, as thou didst.

Consideration VII

THE DAMAGE DONE TO RELIGIOUS BY TEPIDITY

Consider the misery of that religious who, after having left his home, his parents, and the world with all its pleasures, and alfter having given himself to Jesus Christ, consecrating to him his will and his liberty, exposes himself at last to the danger of being damned, by falling into a lukewarm and negligent life, and continuing in it. Oh, no, not far from perdition is a lukewarm religious, who has been called into the house of God to become a saint. God threatens to reject such, and to abandon them if they do not amend. But because thou art lukewarm, I will begin to vomit thee out of My mouth.[14250]

St. Ignatius of Loyola, seeing a lay-brother of his become lukewarm in the service of God, called him one day and said to him, Tell me, my brother, what did you come in religion to do? He answered, To serve God. O my brother! replied the saint, what have you said? If you had answered that you came to serve a cardinal, or a prince of this earth, you would be more excusable; but you say that you came to serve God, and do you serve him thus?

Father Nieremberg says that some are called by God to be saved only as saints, so that if they should not take care to live as saints, thinking to be saved as imperfect Christians, they will not be saved at all. And St. Augustine says that such are in most cases abandoned by God: "Negligent souls God is accustomed to abandon."[14251] And how does he abandon them? By permitting them from lighter faults, which they see and do not mind, to fall into grievous ones, and to lose divine grace and their vocation. St. Teresa of Jesus saw the place prepared for her in hell had she not detached herself from an earthly, though not a grievously culpable, affection. He that contemneth small things, shall fall by little and little.[14252]

Many wish to follow Jesus Christ, but from afar, as St. Peter did, who, when his Master was arrested in the garden, says St. Matthew, followed Him afar off.[14253] But by doing so that will easily happen to them which happened to St. Peter; namely, that, when the occasion came, he denied Jesus Christ. A lukewarm religious will be contented with what little he does for God; but God, who called him to a perfect life, will not be contented, and, in punishment for his ingratitude, will not only deprive him of his special favors, but will sometimes permit his fall. "When you said, It is enough, then you perished,"[14254] says St. Augustine. The fig-tree of the Gospel was cast into the fire, only because it brought forth no fruit.

Father Louis de Ponte said, "I have committed many faults, but I have never made peace with them. Miserable is that religious who, being called to perfection, makes peace with his defects. As long as we detest our imperfections, there is hope that we may still become saints; but when we commit faults and make little of them, then, says St. Bernard, the hope of becoming saints is lost. He who soweth sparingly skull also reap sparingly.[14255] Common graces do not suffice to make one a saint; extraordinary ones are necessary. But how shall God be liberal with his favors towards that one who acts sparingly and with reserve in his love towards him?

Moreover, to become a saint, one must have courage and strength to overcome all repugnances; and let no one ever believe, says St. Bernard, that he will be able to attain to perfection if he does not render himself singular among others in the practice of virtue. "What is perfect cannot but be singular."[14256] Reflect, my brother, for what have you left the world and all? To become a saint. But that lukewarm and imperfect life which you lead, is that the way of becoming a saint? St. Teresa animated her daughters by saying to them, "My sisters, you have done the principal thing necessary to become saints; the least remains yet to be done." The same I say to you; you have, perhaps, done the chief part already; you have left your country, your home, your parents, your goods, and your amusements; the least remains yet to be done to become a saint; do it.

PRAYER

O my God! reject me not, as I deserve, for I will amend. I know well that so negligent a life as mine cannot satisfy Thee. I know that I have myself, by my lukewarmness, shut the door against the graces which Thou didst desire to bestow upon me. O Lord! do not yet abandon me, continue to be merciful towards me; I will rise from this miserable state. I will for the future be more careful to overcome mv passions, to follow Thy inspirations, and never will I through slothfulness omit my duties, but I will fulfil them with greater diligence. In short. I will, from this time forward, do all I can to please Thee, and I will neglect nothing which I may know to be pleasing to Thee. Since thou, O my Jesus! hast been so liberal with Thy graces towards me, and hast deigned to give Thy blood and Thy life for me, there is 110 reason I should act with such reserve towards Thee. Thou art worthy of all honor, all love, and to please Thee one ought gladly to undergo every labor, every pain. But, O my Redeemer! Thou knowest my weakness, help me with Thy powerful grace; in Thee I confide. O immaculate Virgin Mary! thou who hast helped me to leave the world, help me to overcome myself and to become a saint.

Consideration VIII

HOW DEAR TO GOD IS A SOUL THAT GIVES ITSELF ENTIRELY TO HIM

God loves all those who love him: I love them that love Me.[14257] Many, however, gives themselves to God, but preserve still in their hearts some attachment to creatures, which prevents them from belonging entirely to God. How, then, shall God give himself entirely to that one who, besides his God, loves creatures still? It is just that he should act with reserve towards those who act with reserve towards him. On the contrary, he gives himself entirely to those souls, who, driving from their hearts everything that is not God, and does not lead them to his love, and giving themselves to him without reserve, truly say to him: My God and my all.[14258] St. Teresa, as long as she entertained an inordinate affection, though not an impure one, could not hear from Jesus Christ what afterwards she heard, when, freeing herself from every attachment, she gave herself entirely to the divine love; namely, the Lord saying to her, "Now, because thou art all mine, I am all thine.

Consider that the Son of God has already given himself entirely to us: A child is born to us, and a son is given to us.[14259] He has given himself to us through the love he bears tons. He hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us.[14260] It is, then, just, says St. John Chrysostom, that when a God has given himself to you, without reserve—"he has given thee all, nothing has he left to himself,"[14261]—you also should give yourself to God, without reserve; and that always henceforth, burning with divine love, you should sing to him:

Thine wholly always will I be;
Thou hast bestowed Thyself on me,
Wholly 1 give myself to Thee.

St. Teresa revealed to one of her nuns, appearing to her after her death, that God loves a soul that, as a spouse, give itself entirely to him, more than a thousand tepid and imperfect ones. From these generous souls, given entirely to God, is the choir of Seraphim completed. The Lord himself says that he loves a soul that attends to its perfection, so much that he seems not to love any other. One is My dove, My perfect one is but one.[14262] Hence Blessed Giles exhorts us, "One for one,"[14263] by which he wishes to Say that this one soul we have we ought to give wholly, not divided, to that One who alone deserves all love, on whom depends all our good, and who loves us more than all. "Leave all and you shall find all,"[14264] says Thomas a Kempis. Leave all for God, and in God you will find all. "O soul!" concludes St. Bernard, "be alone, that you may keep yourself for him alone."[14265] Keep yourself alone, give no part of your affections to creatures, that you may belong alone to Him who alone deserves an infinite love, and whom alone you ought to love.

PRAYER

My beloved to Me and I to him.[14266] As then, O my God! Thou hast given Thyself entirely to me, I should be too ungrateful if I should not give myself entirely to Thee; since Thou wouldst have me belong wholly to Thee, behold, O my Lord! I give myself entirely to Thee. Accept me through Thy mercy, disdain me not. Grant that this my heart, which once loved creatures, may turn now wholly to Thy infinite goodness. "Let me henceforth die," said St. Teresa, "let another than myself live in me. Let God live in me, and give me life. Let him reign, and let me be his slave, for my soul wishes no other liberty." This my heart is too small, O God most worthy of love, and it is too little able to love Thee, who art deserving of an infinite love. I should then commit against Thee too great an injustice, should I still divide it by loving anything besides Thee. I love Thee, my God, above everything. I love only Thee; I renounce all creatures, and give myself entirely to Thee, my Jesus, my Saviour, my love, my all. I say, and always will say, What have I in heaven, and besides Thee, what do I desire on earth? . . . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever.[14267] I desire nothing, either in this life or in the next, but to possess the treasure of Thy love. I am unwilling that creatures should have any more a place in my heart; Thou alone must be its master. To Thee only shall it belong for the future. Thou only shalt be my God, my repose, my desire, all my love. "Give me only Thy love and Thy grace, and I am rich enough."[14268] O most holy Virgin Mary! obtain for me this, that I may be faithful to God, and never recall the donation which I have made of myself to him.

Consideration IX

HOW NECESSARY IT IS, IN ORDER TO BECOME A SAINT, TO HAVE A GREAT DESIRE FOR SUCH A THING

No saint has ever attained to sanctity without a great desire. As wings are necessary to birds in order to fly, holy desires are necessary to the soul in order to advance in the road of perfection. To become a saint, we must detach ourselves from creatures, conquer our passions, overcome ourselves, and love crosses. But to do all this, much strength is required, and we must suffer much. But what is the effect of holy desire? St. Laurence Justinian answers us: "It supplies strength, and makes the pain easier to be borne."[14269] Hence the same saint adds, that he has already vanquished who has a great desire of vanquishing. "A great part of the victory is the desire of vanquishing."[14270] He who wishes to reach the top of a high mountain will never reach it if he has not a great desire to do so. This will give him courage and strength to undergo the fatigue of ascending, otherwise he will stop at the foot, wearied and discouraged.

St. Bernard asserts that we acquire perfection in proportion to the desire for it which we preserve in our heart. St. Teresa said that God loves generous souls that have great desires; for which reason the saint exhorted all in this way, "Let our thoughts be high, . . . for thence will come our good. We must not have low and little desires, but have that confidence in God that, if we make the proper efforts, we shall by little and little attain to that perfection which, with his grace, the saints have reached." In this way, the saints attained, in a short time, a great degree of perfection, and were able to do great things for God. Being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time.[14271] Thus St. Aloysius Gonzaga attained in a few years (he lived not over twenty-three years) such a degree of sanctity that St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, in an ecstasy seeing him in heaven, said it seemed to her, in a certain way, that there was no saint in heaven who enjoyed a greater glory than Aloysius. She understood at the same time that he had arrived at so high a degree by the great desire he had cherished of being able to love God as much as he deserved, and that, seeing this beyond his reach, the holy youth had suffered on earth a martyrdom of love.

St. Bernard, being in religion, in order to excite his fervor, used to say to himself, "Bernard, for what did you come here?"[14272] I say the same to you: What have you come to do in the house of God? To become a saint? And what are you doing? Why do you lose the time? Tell me, do you desire to become a saint? If you do not, it is sure that you will never become one. If, then, you have not this desire, ask Jesus Christ for it; ask Mary for it; and if you have it, take courage, says St. Bernard, for many do not become saints, because they do not take courage. And so I repeat, let us take courage, and great courage. What do we fear? What inspires this diffidence in us? That Lord, who has given us strength to leave the world, will also give us the grace to embrace the life of a saint. Everything comes to an end. Our life, be it a contented or a discontented one, will also come to an end, but eternity will never terminate. Only that little we have done for God will console us in death and throughout eternity. The fatigue will be short, eternal shall be the crown, which is already, so to speak, before our eyes. How satisfied are the saints now with all they have suffered for God! If a sorrow could enter paradise, the Blessed would be sorry only for this, that they have neglected to do for God what they might have done more, but which now they are unable to do. Take courage, then, and be prompt, for there is no time to lose; what can be done to-day we may not be able to do tomorrow. St. Bernardine of Sienna said that one moment of time is of as great a value as God himself, for at every moment we may gain God, his divine grace, and higher degrees of merits.

PRAYER

Behold, O my God! here I am. My heart is ready, O my God! my heart is ready. [14273] See, I am prepared to do all that Thou shalt require from me. 0 Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?[14274] Tell me, O Lord, what Thou desirest of me. I will obey Thee in all. I am sorry for having lost so much time in which I might have pleased Thee, and yet have not done so. I thank Thee that still Thou givest me time to do it. Oh, no, I will not lose any more time. I will and desire to become a saint, not to obtain from Thee a greater glory and more delights. I will become a saint, that I may love Thee more, and to please Thee in this life and in the next. Make me, O Lord! to love and please Thee as much as Thou desirest. Behold, This is all I ask from Thee, O my God! I will love Thee, I will love Thee; and, in order to love Thee, I offer myself to undergo every fatigue, and to suffer every pain. O my Lord! increase in me always this desire, and give me the grace to execute it. Of myself I can do nothing, but assisted by Thee I can do all. Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, graciously hear me. My Jesus, though the merits of Thy Passion, come to my succor. O Mary, my hope! for the love of Jesus Christ, protect me.

THE LOVE WE OWE TO JESUS CHRIST IN Consideration OF THE LOVE HE HAS SHOWN TO US

In order to understand the love which the Son of God has borne to us, it is enough to consider what St. Paul says of Jesus Christ: He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant. . . . He humbled Himself, becoming obedient even to the death of the cross.[14275] "He emptied himself." O God! what admiration has it caused, and will it, through all eternity cause, to the angels to see a God who became man for the love of man, and submitted himself to all the weaknesses and sufferings of man! And the Word was made flesh.[14276] What a cause of astonishment would it not be to see a king become a worm for the sake of worms! But an infinitely greater wonder it is to see a God made man, and after this to see him humbled unto the painful and infamous death of the cross, on which he finished his most holy life.

Moses and Elias, on Mount Thabor, speaking of his death, as it is related in the Gospel, called it an excess: They spoke of His decease (the Latin word is "excessus," which also means "excess") that He should accomplish in Jerusalem.[14277] Yea, says Bonaventure, it is with reason the death of Jesus Christ was called an excess, for it was an excess of suffering and of love, so much so that it would be impossible to believe it, if it had not already happened.[14278] It was truly an excess of love, adds St. Augustine, for to this end the Son of God wishes to come on earth, to live a life so laborious and to die a death so bitter, namely, that he might make known to man how much he loved him. "Therefore Christ came, that man should know how much God loved him."[14279]

The Lord revealed to his servant Armella Nicolas that the love he bore to man was the cause of all his sufferings and of his death. If Jesus Christ had not been God, but only man and our friend, what greater love could he have shown us than to die for us? Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.[14280] Ah, how, at the thought of the love shown us by Jesus Christ, the saints esteemed it little to give their life and their all for so loving a God! How many youths, how many noblemen, are there not, who have left their house, their country, their riches, their parents, and all, to retire into cloisters, to live only for the love of Jesus Christ! How many young virgins, renouncing their nuptials with princes and the great ones of the world, have gone with joyfulness to death, to render thus some compensation for the love of a God who had been executed on an infamous gibbet, and died for their sake!

This appeared to St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi to be foolishness; hence she called her Jesus a fool of love. In exactly the same manner the Gentiles, as St. Paul attests, hearing the death of Jesus Christ preached to them, thought it foolishness not possible to be believed. We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling-block, and unto the Gentiles foolishness.[14281] How is it possible, they said, that a God, most happy in himself, who is in want of nothing, should die for the sake of man, his servant? This would be as much as to believe that God became a fool for the love of men. Nevertheless, it is of faith that Jesus Christ, the true Son of God, did, for love of us, deliver himself up to death. He hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us.[14282] The same Mary Magdalene had reason then to exclaim, lamenting the ingratitude of men towards so loving a God, "O love not known! O love not loved!" Indeed, Jesus Christ is not loved by men, because they live in forgetfulness of his love.

And, in fact, a soul that considers a God who died for its sake, cannot live without loving him. The charity of Christ presseth us.[14283] The soul will feel itself inflamed, and as if constrained to love a God who has loved it so much. Jesus Christ could have saved us, says F. Nieremberg, with only one drop of his blood; but it was his will to shed all his blood, and to give his divine life, that at the sight of so many sufferings and of his death we might not content ourselves with an ordinary love, but be sweetly constrained to love with all our strength a God so full of love towards us. That they also who live may not live any more for themselves, but unto Him who died for them.[14284]

PRAYER

Indeed, O my Jesus, my Lord, and my Redeemer! only too much hast Thou obliged me to love Thee; too much my love has cost Thee. I should be too ungrateful if I should content myself to love with reserve a God who has given me his blood, his life, and his entire self. Oh, Thou hast died for me, Thy poor servant; it is but just that I should die for Thee, my God, and my all. Yes, O my Jesus! I detach myself from all, to give myself to Thee. I put away from me the love of all creatures, in order to consecrate myself entirely to Thy love. My beloved is chosen from among thousands.[14285] I choose Thee alone out of all things for my good, my treasure, and my only love. I love Thee, O my love! I love Thee. Thou art not satisfied that I should love Thee a little only. Thou art not willing to have me love anything besides Thee. Thee I will please in all things. Thee will I love much; and Thou shalt be my only love. My God, my God, help me, that I may fully please Thee.

Mary, my queen, do thou also help me to love my God much. Amen. So I hope; so may it be.

Consideration XI

THE GREAT HAPPINESS WHICH RELIGIOUS ENJOY IN DWELLING IN THE SAME HOUSE WITH JESUS CHRIST IN THE BLESSED SACRAMENT

The Venerable Mother Mary of Jesus, foundress of a convent in Toulouse, said that she esteemed very much her lot as a religious, for two principal reasons. The first was, that religious, through the vow of obedience, belong entirely to God; and the second, that they have the privilege of dwelling always with Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. And in truth, if people of the world deem it so great a favor to be invited by kings to dwell in their palaces, how much more favoured should we esteem ourselves who are admitted to dwell continually with the King of Heaven in his own house?

In houses of the religious, Jesus Christ dwells for their sake in the church, so that they can find him at all hours. Persons of the world can scarcely go to visit him during the day, and in many places only in the morning. But the religious finds him in the tabernacle, as often as he wishes in the morning, in the afternoon, and during the night. There he may continually entertain himself with his Lord, and there Jesus Christ rejoices to converse familiarly with his beloved servants, whom, for this end, he has called out of Egypt, that he may be their companion during this life, hidden under the veil of the Most Holy Sacrament, and in the next unveiled in paradise. "O solitude," it may be said of every religious house, "in which God familiarly speaks and converses with his friends!"[14286] The souls that love Jesus Christ much do not know how to wish for any other paradise on this earth than to be in the presence of their Lord, who dwells in this sacrament for the love of those who seek and visit him.

His conversation hath no bitterness, nor His company any tediousness.[14287] He finds tediousness in the company of Jesus Christ, who does not love him. But those who on this earth have given all their love to Jesus Christ find in the sacrament all their pleasure, their rest, their paradise; and therefore they keep their hearts always mindful to visit, as often as they can, their God in the sacrament, to pay their court to him, giving vent to their affections at the foot of the altar, offering him their afflictions, their desires of loving him, of seeing him face to face, and, in the mean time, of pleasing him in all things.

PRAYER

Behold me in Thy presence, O my Jesus! hidden in the sacrament : Thou art the self-same Jesus who for me didst sacrifice Thyself on the cross. Thou art he who lovest me so much, and who hast therefore confined Thyself in this prison of love. Amongst so many who have offended Thee less than I, and who have loved Thee better than I, Thou hast chosen me, in Thy goodness, to keep Thee company in this house, where, having drawn me from the midst of the world, Thou hast destined me always to live united with Thee, and afterwards to have me nigh Thee to praise and to love Thee in Thy eternal kingdom. O Lord! I thank Thee. How have I deserved this happy lot? I have chosen to be an abject in the house of my God, rather than dwell in the tabernacles of sinners.[14288] Happy indeed am I, O my Jesus! to have left the world; and it is my great desire to perform the vilest office in Thy house rather than dwell in the proudest royal palaces of men. Receive me, then, O Lord! to stay with Thee all my life long; do not chase me away, as I deserve. Re pleased to allow that, among the many good brothers who serve Thee in this house, I, though I am a miserable sinner, may serve Thee also. Many years already have I lived far from Thee. But now that Thou hast enlightened me to know the vanity of the world, and my own foolishness, I will not depart any more from Thy feet, O my Jesus! Thy presence shall animate me to fight when I am tempted. The nearness of Thy abode shall remind me of the obligation I am under to love Thee, and always to have recourse to Thee in my combats against hell. I will always keep near to Thee, that I may unite myself to Thee, and attach myself closer to Thee. I love Thee, O my God! hidden in this sacrament. Thou, for the love of me, remainest always on this altar. I, for the love of Thee, will always remain in Thy presence as much as I shall be able. There enclosed Thou always lovest me, and here enclosed I will always love Thee. Always, then, O my Jesus, my love, my all! shall we remain together,—in time in this house, and during eternity in paradise. This is my hope; so may it be. Most holy Mary, obtain for me a greater love for the Most Holy Sacrament.

THE LIFE OF RELIGIOUS RESEMBLES MOSTLY THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST

The Apostle says that the eternal Father predestines to the kingdom of heaven those only who live conformably to the incarnate Word. Whom He foreknew, He also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of his son.[14289] How happy, then, and secure of paradise should not religious be, seeing that God has called them to a state of life which of all other states is the most conformed to the life of Jesus Christ.

Jesus, on this earth, wished to live poor as the son and helpmate of a mechanic, in a poor dwelling, with poor clothing and poor food: Being rich, He became poor for your sake, that through His poverty you might become rich.[14290] Moreover, he chose a life the most entirely mortified, far from the delights of the world, and always full of pain and sorrow, from his birth to his death; hence by the prophet he was called The man of sorrows.[14291] By this he wished to give his servants to understand what ought to be the life of those who wish to follow him: If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow Me.[14292] According to this example and to this invitation of Jesus Christ, the saints have endeavored to dispossess themselves of all earthly goods, and to load themselves with pains and crosses, in order thus to follow Christ, their beloved Lord.

Thus acted St. Benedict, who, being the son of the lord of Norcia, and a relative of the Emperor Justinian, and born amidst the riches and the pleasures of the world, while yet a youth of only fourteen years went to live in a cavern on Mount Sublaco, where he received no other sustenance but a piece of bread brought him every day as an alms by the hermit Romanus.

So acted St. Francis of Assisi, who renounced in favor of his father the whole lawful portion of his inheritance, even to the shirt he had on his back, and thus, poor and mortified, consecrated himself to Jesus Christ. Thus St. Francis Borgia, St. Aloysius Gonzaga, the one being Duke of Candia, the other of Castiglione, left all their riches, their estates, their vassals, their country, their house, their parents, and went to live a poor life in religion.

So have done so many other noblemen and princes, even of royal blood. Blessed Zedmerra, daughter of the King of Ethiopia, renounced the kingdom to become a Dominican nun. Blessed Johanna of Portugal renounced the kingdom of France and England, to become a nun. In the Benedictine Order alone, there are found twenty-five emperors, and seventy-five kings and queens, who left the world to live poor, mortified, and forgotten by the world, in a poor cloister. Ah! indeed, these and not the grandees of the world, are the truly fortunate ones.

At present, worldlings think these to be fools, but in the valley of Josaphat they shall know that they themselves have been the fools; and when they see the saints on their thrones crowned by God, they shall say, lamenting and in despair, These are they whom we had sometime in derision; . . . we fools esteemed their life madness, but now they are numbered among the children of God, as their lot is among the saints.[14293]

PRAYER

Ah! my Master, and my Redeemer, Jesus, I am then of the number of those fortunate ones whom Thou hast called to follow Thee. O my Lord! I thank Thee for this. I leave all; would that I had more to leave, that I might draw near to Thee, my King and my God, who for the love of me, and to give me courage by Thy example, hast chosen for Thyself a life so poor and so painful. Walk on. O Lord, I will follow Thee. Choose Thou for me what cross Thou wilt, and help me. I will always carry it with constancy and love. I regret that for the past I have abandoned Thee, to follow my lusts and the vanities of the world; but now I will leave Thee no more. Bind me to Thy cross, and if through weakness I sometimes resist, draw me by the sweet bonds of Thy love. Suffer it not that I should ever leave Thee again. Yes, my Jesus, I renounce all the satisfactions of the world; my only satisfaction shall be to continue to love Thee, and to suffer all that pleases Thee. I hope thus to come myself one day in Thy kingdom, to be united with Thee by that bond of eternal love, where, loving Thee in Thy revealed glory, I need no more fear to be loosed and separated from Thee. I love Thee, O my God, my all! and will always love Thee. Behold my hope, O Most Holy Mary! thou who, because the most conformed to Jesus, art now the most powerful to obtain this grace. Be thou my protectress!

THE ZEAL WHICH RELIGIOUS OUGHT TO HAVE FOR THE SALVATION OF SOULS

He who is called to the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer will never be a true follower of Jesus Christ, and will never become a saint, if he fulfils not the end of his vocation, and has not the spirit of the Institute, which is the salvation of souls, and of those souls that are the most destitute of spiritual succor, such as the poor people in the country.

This was truly the end for which our Redeemer came down from heaven, who protests, The Spirit of the Lord . . . hath anointed Me to preach the Gospel to the poor.[14294] He sought no other of Peter's love for him but this, that he should procure the salvation of souls: Simon, son of John, lovest thou Me? . . . Feed My sheep.[14295] He did not impose upon him, says St. John Chrysostom, penance, prayers, or other things, but only that he should endeavor to save his sheep: "Christ said not to him, throw your money away, practise fasting, fatigue your body with hard work, but he said, Feed My sheep."[14296] And he declares that he would look upon every benefit conferred on the least of our neighbors as conferred on himself. Amen, I say to you, since you have done it unto one of these My least brethren, you have done it unto Me.[14297]

Every religious ought, therefore, with the utmost care, to entertain within himself this zeal, and this spirit of helping souls. To this end everyone ought to direct his studies, and when he shall afterwards have been assigned to his work by his Superiors, he ought to give to it all his thoughts, and his whole attention. He could not call himself a true brother of this Congregation, who, through the desire of attending only to himself and of leading a retired and solitary life, would not accept with all affection such an employment, when imposed on him by obedience.

What greater glory can a man have than to be, as St. Paul says, a co-operator with God in this great work of the salvation of souls? He who loves the Lord ardently is not content to be alone in loving him; he would draw all to his love, saying with David, O magnify the Lord with me, and let us extol His name together.[14298] Hence St. Augustine exhorts all those who love God, "If you love God, draw all men to his love."[14299]

A good ground to hope for his own salvation has he who with true zeal labors for the salvation of souls. "Have you saved a soul," says St. Augustine, "then you have predestinated your own."[14300] The Holy Ghost promises us, When thou shalt have labored for the welfare of a poor man, and by thy labor shalt have filled him (with divine grace), the Lord will fill thee with light and peace.[14301] In this—namely, in procuring the salvation of others—St. Paul placed his hope of eternal salvation, when he said to his disciples of Thessalonica*, For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of glory? Are not you, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming?*[14302]

PRAYER

O my Lord Jesus Christ! how can I thank Thee enough, since Thou hast called me to the same work that Thou didst Thyself on earth ; namely, to go with my poor exertions and help souls to their salvation? How have I deserved this honor and this reward, after having offended Thee so grievously, and been the cause to others also of offending Thee? Yes, O my Lord! Thou callest me to help Thee in this great undertaking. I will serve Thee with all my strength. Behold, I offer Thee all my labor, and even my blood, in order to obey Thee. Nor do I by this aspire to satisfy my own inclination, or to gain applause and esteem from men; I desire nothing but to see Thee loved by all as Thou deservest. I prize my happy lot, and call myself fortunate, that Thou hast chosen me for this great work, in which I protest that I will renounce all praises of men and all self-satisfaction, and will only seek Thy glory. To Thee be all the honor and satisfaction, and to me only the discomforts, the blame, and the reproaches. Accept, O Lord! this offering, which I, a miserable sinner, who wish to love Thee and to see Thee loved by others, make of myself to Thee, and give me strength to execute it.

Most Holy Mary, my advocate, who lovest souls so much, help me.

Consideration XIV

HOW NECESSARY TO RELIGIOUS ARE THE VIRTUES OF MEEKNESS AND HUMILITY

Our most lovely Redeemer Jesus willed to be called a lamb, for the very reason that he might show us how meek and humble he was himself. These were the virtues which he principally wished his followers should learn from him: Learn from Me, because I am meek and humble of heart.[14303] And these virtues he principally requires of religious who profess to imitate his most holy life.

He who lives as a solitary in a desert has not so much need of these virtues; but for him who lives in a Community, it is impossible not to meet, now and then, with a reprimand from his Superiors, or something disagreeable from his companions. In such cases, a religious who loves not meekness will commit a thousand faults every day, and live an unquiet life. He must be all sweetness with everybody,—with strangers, with companions, and also with inferiors if he should ever become Superior; and if he be an inferior, he must consider that one act of meekness in bearing contempt and reproach is of greater value to him than a thousand fasts and a thousand disciplines.

St. Francis said that many make their perfection consist in exterior mortifications, and, after all, are not able to bear one injurious word. "Not understanding," he added, how ninth greater gain is made by patiently bearing injuries."[14304] How many persons, as St. Bernard remarks, are all sweetness when nothing is said or done contrary to their inclination, but show their want of meekness when anything crosses them! And if any one should ever be Superior, let him believe that one reprimand made with meekness will profit his subjects more than a thousand made with severity. The meek are useful to themselves a fid to others,[14305] as St. John Chrysostom teaches. In short, as the same saint said, the Greatest sign of a virtuous soul is to see it meek on occasions of contradiction. A meek heart is the pleasure of the heart of God. That which is agreeable to him is faith and meekness.[14306] It would be well for a religious to represent to himself, in his meditations, all the contrarieties that may happen to him, and thus arm himself against them; and then, when the occasion happens, he ought to do violence to himself, that he may not be excited and break out in impatience. Therefore, he should refrain from speaking when his mind is disturbed, till he is certain that he has become calm again.

But to bear injuries quietly, it is above all necessary to have a great fund of humility. He who is truly humble is not only unmoved when he sees himself despised, but is even pleased, and rejoices at it in his spirit, however the flesh may resent it; for he sees himself treated as he deserves, and made conformable to Jesus Christ, who, worthy as he was of every honor, chose, for the love of us, to be satiated with contempt and injuries. Brother Juniper, a disciple of St. Francis, when an injury was done to him, held up his cowl, as if he expected to receive pearls falling from heaven. The saints have been more desirous of injuries than worldlings are covetous of applause and honor. And of what use is a religious who does not know how to bear contempt for God's sake? He is always proud, and only humble in name and a hypocrite, whom divine grace will repulse, as the Holy Ghost says: God resisteth the proud, but to the humble He giveth grace.[14307]

PRAYER

O my most humble Jesus, who, for the love of me, didst humble Thyself, and become obedient unto the death of the cross, how have I the courage to appear before Thee, and call myself Thy follower? for I see myself to be such a sinner and so proud that I cannot bear a single injury without resenting it. Whence can come such pride in me, who for my sins have so many times deserved to be cast forever into hell with the devils? Ah, my despised Jesus, help me and make me conformable to Thee. I will change my life. Thou, for love of me, hast borne so much contempt; I, for love of Thee, will bear every injury. Thou, O my Redeemer! hast rendered contempt too honorable and desirable, since Thou hast embraced it with so much love, during Thy own life, Far be it from me to glory but in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. [14308] O my most humble mistress Mary, mother of God! Thou who wast in all, and especially in suffering, the most conformed to thy Son, obtain for me the grace to bear in peace all injuries which henceforward shall be offered to me. Amen.

HOW MUCH RELIGIOUS OUGHT TO CONFIDE IN THE PATRONAGE OF MARY

If it is true, and most true it is, that, according to the saying of St. Peter Damian, the divine mother, the most holy Mary, loves all men with such an affection that after God there is not, nor can there be, any one who surpasses or equals her in her love,—" She loves us with an invincible love,"[14309] how much must we think this great queen loves religious, who have consecrated their liberty, their life, and their all to the love of Jesus Christ. She sees well enough that the life of such as these is more conformable to her own life, and to that of her divine Son; she sees them often 0ccupied in praising her, and continually attentive to honor her by their novenas, visits, rosaries, fasts, etc. She beholds them often at her feet, intent on invoking her aid, asking graces of her, and graces all conformed to her holy desires; that is, the grace of perseverance in the divine service, of strength in their temptations, of detachment from this world, and of love towards God. Ah, how can we doubt that she employs all her power and her mercy for the benefit of religious, and especially of those who belong to this holy Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, in which, as it is well known, we make special profession of honoring the Virgin Mother by visits, by fasting on Saturdays, by special mortifications during her novenas, etc., and by everywhere promoting devotion to her by sermons and novenas in her honor!

She, the great mistress, is grateful. I love those who love Me.[14310] Yes, she is so grateful that, as St. Andrew of Crete says, "To him who does her the least service she is accustomed to return great favors."[14311] She promises liberally those who love her, and who promote her honor among others, to deliver them from sin: "Those that work by me shall not sin."[14312] She also promises to them paradise: "Those that explain me shall have life everlasting."[14313]

For which reason we especially ought to thank God for having called us to this Congregation, where, by the usages of the Community and the example of our companions, we are often reminded, and in some way constrained, to have recourse to Mary, and continually to honor this our most loving mother, who is called, and is, the joy, the hope, the life, and the salvation of those who invoke and honor her.

PRAYER

My most beloved, most lovely, and most loving queen, I always thank my Lord and thee, who hast not only drawn me out of the world, but also called me to live in this Congregation, where a special devotion is practised to thee. Accept of me then, my mother, to serve thee. Among so many of thy beloved sons, do not scorn to let me serve thee also, miserable though I am. Thou after God shalt always be my hope and my love. In all my wants, in all my tribulations and temptations, I will always have recourse to thee; thou shalt be my refuge, my consolation. I am unwilling that any one except God and thee should comfort me in my combats, in the sadness and the tediousness of this life. For thy service I renounce all the kingdoms of the whole world. My kingdom on this earth shall be to serve, bless, and love thee, O my most lovely mistress! "whom to serve is to reign,"[14314] as St. Anselm says. Thou art the mother of perseverance; obtain for me to be faithful to thee until death. By so doing I hope, and firmly hope, one day to come where thou reignest, to praise and bless thee forever, to depart no more from thy holy feet. Jesus and Mary, I protest, with your loving servant Alphonsus Rodriguez, "my most sweet loves, let me suffer for you, let me die for you, let me be all yours, and not at all my own."[14315]

Exhortation to Novices to Persevere in their Vocation.[14316]

THE grace of vocation, and the grace of perseverance in the vocation, are two distinct graces. Many have received from God vocation, but through their own fault have rendered themselves unworthy to receive the grace of perseverance. No one shall be crowned, except he strive lawfully.[14317] No one, then, shall receive the grace of perseverance and the crown prepared by God for those that persevere, but he who on his own part does what he ought in order to combat and vanquish the enemy. Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.[14318] My dear young friend, you who, by a special favor, have been called by the Lord to follow him, hear how he himself exhorts and encourages you; be attentive, my son, to preserve the grace thou hast received from me, and fear lest thou lose it, and another have the crown prepared for thee.

I. TEMPTATIONS TO WHICH NOVICES ARE EXPOSED

Whoever enters the novitiate, enters the service of the King of heaven, who is accustomed to try the fidelity of those he accepts as his servants, by crosses and temptations, with which he allows hell to assail them. Thus it was said to Tobias: And because thou wast agreeable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee.[14319] And the Holy Ghost says to each one who leaves the world to give himself to God: Son, when thou comest to the service of God, prepare thy soul for temptation.[14320] So then the novice, on entering the house of God, ought to prepare himself not for consolations, but for temptations and combats, with which hell assails those who give themselves to God. It is well to know that the devil is particularly on the watch to make a novice lose his vocation, and, to accomplish this one thing, tempts him more than he does a thousand seculars, especially if he has entered an Order of religious engaged in the work of salvation of souls. For such a novice, if he persevere and be faithful to God, will snatch from him thousands of sinners, who will be saved by his means. And therefore the enemy seeks by all means to gain him, and arrays against him all his arts and cunning in order to seduce him.

The temptations by which the devil is most accustomed to tempt novices to abandon their vocation are the following:

1. TENDERNESS FOR PARENTS

First, he tempts them through their tenderness for their parents. To resist this temptation, one ought to reflect that Jesus Christ has declared that he who loves his parents more than him, is not worthy of his friendship. He that loveth father or mother more than Me, is not worthy of Me.[14321] He himself protests, that he came not to bring peace, but division between parents and children. I came not to send peace, but the sword; for I came to set a man at variance against his father, and a daughter against her mother.[14322] And why so great a desire to separate relatives from one another? Because our Saviour knew the great damage one causes to the other, and that with regard to eternal salvation, as Jesus Christ himself adds after the words quoted above: And a man's enemies shall be they of his own household.[14323]

Oh, how many poor youths, through affection for their parents, have lost first their vocation, and then, as it easily happens, their souls also. Many such unhappy instances are on record. I will relate some of them.

Father Jerome Piatti relates that a certain novice was visited by one of his relatives, who spoke to him thus: "Listen to me: I speak to you because I love you. Reflect that you have not a constitution strong enough to bear the fatigues and hard studies of the Order; in the world you can please God more, especially by giving to the poor a great part of the riches the Lord has given you. If you persist in your design, you will repent of it; and when finally you are made porter or cook, because you have little talent and weak health, you will nevertheless be obliged to quit the Order, to your own shame. Whence it is better to go out to-day than tomorrow." Being thus perverted, he left. Not many days passed, when the unhappy youth, who had already given himself up to every kind of vice, had a fight with some of his rivals, in which he and that self-same relative of his were wounded and shortly after died, both on the same day. What is worse, moreover,—the miserable novice died without confession, of which he stood in so great need.

Father Casalicchio relates further that a certain cavalier being one night on the point of going to the house of a bad woman, heard the bell of the Capuchins who were just going to chant the office. Then he said: "How shall I go to offend God, at the very time these servants of his are going to praise him?" Thus called by God he entered their Order. But his mother did and said so much, that she induced him to come home again. And what happened then? After a few months he was killed by his enemies, and brought to his mother on a board.

Dionysius the Carthusian relates, that two novices of his Order were perverted by their fathers; but a few days after, both sons and fathers died, and what is worse, as the author asserts, they died a bad death.

Father Mancinelli relates of a certain young nobleman, that, although he had with great fortitude entered religion, overcoming the insidious dissuasions of his mother, who did all she could to turn him away from his design, yet when afterwards she pressed and insisted very much, the miserable man finally went out. After this, in order to keep him cheerful in the world, his mother made him take lessons in fencing. But one day, while he was engaged in this exercise with one of his friends, he received a wound in the eye, which was so deadly that the unhappy youth expired on the spot, without being able to make his confession.

The same Father Casalicchio relates that, while giving the mission in a place near Cosenza, he learned there that a young man having retired among the Capuchins, his father went and raised a great disturbance in the monastery, to oblige the religious to give back his son, and afterwards sent his brother there, who with other armed men and among the rest a relative of the young man, took him out by force. But what happened? A month after, the father died miserably on a journey during a violent storm at sea. At the end of sixty days, the relative died also away from home, and the unhappy novice, who knew not how to be faithful to his vocation, was covered all over with ulcers, so that the matter oozed out from head to foot, and he died thus in the greatest pains, and God only knows the disposition of his soul.

It is moreover related in the life of St. Camillus of Lellis, that a youth, who had entered his Order at Naples, was persecuted by his father. At first he resisted with fortitude, but having come to Rome, and having had again a conversation with his father, he gave way to the temptation. When he took his leave, the saint predicted that he would come to a bad end, and die at the hands of public justice. And so it happened, for the young man having returned home, afterwards, through jealousy, killed his wife and two servants, and being apprehended for this crime, though the father expended all his fortune in order to save his life, he was beheaded in the public market-place of Naples, nine years after leaving the Order.

It is related in the same life, that another novice was desirous of returning to the world; St. Camillus predicted to him also the chastisements of God, and in fact, having returned to Messina, he died six months after, suddenly, and without the sacraments.

Be therefore on your guard, my brother, if the devil seeks in this way to make you lose your vocation. That Lord who by such a particular grace has called you to leave the world and to consecrate yourself to his love, wills that you should not only leave, but also forget, your home and your parents. Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thy ear, and forget thy people and thy father's house.[14324] Hear, then, what God says to you, and understand, that if you abandon him for the sake of your parents, very great will be your pain and your remorse, when, about to die in the midst of your brothers and your nephews, you will remember the house of God which you left. Then, at the very time when you are in so much need of spiritual succor, they will stand around you to torment and trouble you about leaving them your possessions, and not one of them will so much as suggest to you one word about God; nay, even endeavoring to deceive you, in order not to increase your fear of death, they will flatter you with vain hopes, that you may die without preparation.

On the contrary, consider what contentment and peace you will feel at your death, if, having been faithful to God, it shall be your happy lot to end your life in the midst of the brethren of your Order. They will help you by their prayers, and with the hope of paradise, but without flattery, animate you to die with joy.

Consider, moreover, that if your parents have loved you for many years, and with some tenderness, God loved you long before, and with a much greater tenderness. Your parents have not loved you for more than twenty or thirty years, but God has loved you from eternity. I have loved Thee with an everlasting love.[14325] Your parents have also put themselves to some expense for you, and have suffered some inconveniences for your sake; but Jesus Christ has expended for you all his blood and his life. If, then, you feel some tenderness for your parents, and if it seems to you that gratitude obliges you not to displease them, reflect, that you ought to be more grateful towards God, who more than all has done you good, and loved you, and say within yourself: Parents, if I leave you, I leave you for God, who deserves my love more than you, and who has loved me more than you; and saying thus you will overcome that horrible temptation for parents, which has been the ruin of many in this life and the next.

2. FEAR RESPECTING HEALTH

Another temptation by which the devil is accustomed to assail the novice, is in reference to the care of his health, and this is the way he speaks: Do you not see that by this mode of life you will lose your health, and then you will neither be good for the world nor for God?

From this temptation the novice ought to disengage himself by the hope that the Lord, who has given him his vocation, will also give him health sufficient to fulfil its duties. If he has come, as must be supposed, to the house of God only to please him, he ought to reason thus within himself: I have not concealed, and do not conceal, the state of my health from my Superiors. They have accepted me—they do not dismiss me: it is then God's good pleasure that I should continue to stay, and if it be the will of God, although I should suffer and die, what matters it? How many anchorites have gone to suffer in caverns and forests! How many martyrs have gone to give their life for Jesus Christ! If it be his will that I should lose health and life for the love of him, enough,—I am satisfied. I desire nothing else, nor could I desire anything better. Such should be the language of the fervent novice who wishes to become a saint. If one has no fervor during the lime of the novitiate, let him be persuaded that he will have none during his whole life.

3. THE INCONVENIENCES OF COMMUNITY LIFE

The next temptation is, that he will be unable to bear the hardships of the Community life, the scanty and ill-prepared food, the hard bed, the short sleep, not to be free to go out, the strict silence, and, above all, to be deprived of doing his own will.

When the novice sees himself assailed by this temptation, he ought to say to himself that which St. Bernard said: "Bernard, for what earnest thou here?"[14326] Let him remember that he did not come to the house of God to live a comfortable life, but to become a saint? And how is he to become a saint? By comforts and delights? No, but by suffering and dying to all the inclinations of sensuality. St. Teresa said: "To think that God admits to his intimacy persons loving their comforts, is foolishness."[14327] And in another place: "Souls that truly love God, cannot seek for rest."[14328] So then if one is not resolved to suffer everything for God, he will never become a saint, and will never have peace.

What peace of soul is to be found in enjoying the goods of the world, and in gratifying the senses? Perhaps the great of this world, who have goods and pleasures in such abundance, find peace? These are the most unhappy of all, for they feed on gall and poison. Vanity of vanities and affliction of the spirit.[14329] Thus earthly goods were styled by Solomon, who enjoyed them in abundance. The heart of man, when in the midst of these goods, however much it possesses, always seeks for more, and always remains unquiet. But when it places its joy in God, it finds in him all its peace: Delight in the Lord, and He will give thee the requests of thy heart.[14330] Father Charles of Lorraine, brother to the Duke of Lorraine, when, having entered a religious Order, he found himself in his poor cell, felt such an interior joy that he began to dance for delight. Blessed Seraphin, a Capuchin, said that he would not exchange a palm's length of his cord for all the riches and honors of the earth; and St. Teresa encouraged all by saying, "When a soul is resolved to suffer, the pain is at an end."

4. DISCOURAGEMENT IN ARIDITIES

But here comes another illusion with which hell tempts the novice, when he finds himself in desolation of spirit. Do you not see, it says to him, that here you find no peace? You have lost devotion, everything fills you with tediousness, mental prayer, reading, Communion, a nd even recreation. This is a sign that God does not wish you to be here.

Oh, what a terrible and dangerous temptation this is for a young novice, without experience! To overcome this temptation one ought, first of all, to consider well in what consists the peace of a soul on this earth, which is a place of merit, and therefore a place of pain. It does not consist, as we have seen, in enjoying the goods of this world, and moreover, not even in the enjoyment of spiritual delights, because these of themselves do not increase our merit, nor render us more dear to God. The true peace of the soul consists only in our conformity to the will of God. Hence the quiet we should desire most is that which makes us unite ourselves with the will of God, even when he is pleased to keep us in darkness and desolation. Oh, how dear to God is a faithful soul, which, when deprived of consolation, still prays, reads, receives Communion, and does all only to please God. Oh, of what great merit are holy works done without present reward. The Venerable Father Anthony Torres writes to a soul in desolation: "To carry the cross with Jesus, without consolation, makes the soul run, yea, even fly to perfection." So, therefore, if the novice finds himself in darkness, he ought to say to God: Lord, since Thou wilt keep me thus desolate and deprived of every relief, thus I wish to remain, and as long as it shall please Thee. I will not leave Thee; behold I am ready to suffer this pain during my whole life, and during all eternity, if so it please Thee. Enough for me to know that such is Thy holy will.

Such should be the language of the novice who truly wishes to love God. But let him, on the other hand, be persuaded that it will not be so. The devil wishes to make him lose confidence by representing to him that this condition will last always, and thus at last make him despair at being unable to bear it any longer. These terrible tempests, in the midst of spiritual darkness, are raised by the devil in the mind of the desolate. But it will not be so. To those who overcome I will give a hidden manna.[14331] Those who shall have borne with patience the tempest of aridity, and shall have overcome the temptations which in the meanwhile hell has brought against them, to make them turn their backs upon him, these the Lord will certainly console by giving them to taste the hidden manna, that is, that interior peace which, as St. Paul says, surpasses all the pleasures of the senses. The peace of God which passeth all understanding.[14332] This one word, now I do the will of God, I please God, affords a satisfaction that surpasses all the contentment that the world can give, with all its pastimes, feasts, theatres, banquets, honors, and greatness. Indeed, that promise cannot fail which God has made to those who leave all for love of him. And every one that has left house, or brethren, or father, etc., for My name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall possess life everlasting.[14333] To such, then, heaven is promised in the next world, and a hundred-fold in this. What is this hundred-fold? It is precisely that testimony of a good conscience which immensely surpasses all the delights of this earth.

5. DOUBT ABOUT VOCATION

But we have not done yet. We must speak of temptations still more dangerous. Those of which we have spoken hitherto are carnal and worldly temptations, which show of themselves that they come from the devil, and thus, by the help of God, they are more easily known and overcome. The most terrible temptations are those which wear the mask of a good spirit and of a greater good, for they are more hidden, and therefore lead more easily into error.

The first temptation of this kind is generally the doubt about vocation, which the devil puts into the mind of the novice, telling him: But who knows whether your vocation has been true or only a caprice? and if you are not truly called by God, you will not have the grace to persevere, and it may come to pass, that after having made the vows, you will be sorry, and become an apostate; so that, whilst you would have saved yourself in the world, here you will damn yourself.

In order to overcome this temptation, he ought to consider how and when one can be sure of his vocation. It is a true vocation whenever the following three conditions concur: First, a good intention, namely, to escape from the dangers of the world, the better to insure your eternal salvation, and to unite yourself more closely to God. Secondly: When there is no positive impediment for want of health, talents, or some necessity on the part of one's parents, in regard to which matters the subject ought to quiet himself by leaving all to the judgment of Superiors, after having exposed the truth with sincerity. Thirdly: That the Superiors admit him. Now, whenever these three things truly concur, the novice ought not to doubt that his vocation is a true one.

6. THE THOUGHT THAT ONE WOULD LIVE MORE DEVOUTLY IF ONE WERE FREE

The other temptation is that which the devil may bring against a young man who in the world has already led a spiritual life. In the world, he shall tell him, you made more mental prayer, practised more mortification, more silence, more retirement, and gave more alms, etc. Now you cannot do all these good works, and much less will you be able to do them afterwards when you leave the novitiate. For then the Superiors will make you apply to your studies, and employ you in the occupations of the Order and other distracting things.

Ah, what an illusion is this! He who gives ear to such suggestions shows that he knows not the merit of obedience without mentioning that St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi said that all is prayer that is done in a Community. He that gives to God his prayers, his alms, his fasts, his penances, gives him a part only of what belongs to him, but not the whole, or to say better, he gives him what he has, but not himself. On the contrary, he who by the vow of obedience renounces his own will, gives himself to God, so that he can say to him: O Lord! having consecrated to Thee my whole will, I have nothing more to give Thee. That thing of which a man has the greatest difficulty to deprive himself is his own will. But it is the most agreeable gift that we can give to God, and that God demands of us most. My son, give Me thy heart,[14334] that is, thy will; whence the Lord says that he is more pleased by our obedience than by all other sacrifices that we can offer to him. Obedience is better than sacrifice.[14335] So then he who gives himself by obedience, obtains not one, but all possible victories over the senses, honors, riches, worldly amusements, and everything else. An obedient man shall speak of victories.[14336]

In the world one merits, no doubt, by fasting, taking the discipline, etc. But, doing all this by his own will, he has much less merit than a religious who does all through obedience. Hence the religious merits much more and merits always, for all that is done in a Community is done through obedience. In this way the religious merits, not only when he prays, when he fasts, when he takes the discipline, but also when he studies, when he goes out, when he is at table or in recreation, or when he goes to rest. St. Aloysius Gonzaga said, that in the vessel of religion even that one advances who does not ply the oar. And hence we know of so many spiritual persons, who, although they led a holy life, have yet sought to place themselves under obedience by entering some religious Community, knowing that the merit of good works done according to one's own will is not the same as of those done out of pure obedience.

7. THE IDEA THAT ONE COULD BE MORE USEFUL TO ONE'S NEIGHBOR

Against another the devil makes use of a similar and even stronger temptation by representing to him that he would be in the world of more service to his neighbor. You have entered this Order, he says, where there are so many others who labor and help souls, but you could do more good out of it by succoring your own country, which is so much in need and destitute of workmen. One tempted in this way ought to reflect first, that the greatest good we can do to our neighbor is that which God wills us to do. God is in need of no man; if it be his desire to give more succor to your country, can he not do so by means of others? So then, my brother, since the Lord has called you to his house, this is the good he will have from you, namely, that you should be attentive to obey all the rules and your Superiors; and if obedience wills you to be useless in a particular place, or even employed in sweeping the house and in washing the dishes, this is the greatest good you can do.

And then, what good can one do in his own country? Jesus Christ himself being exhorted to preach and do good in his birthplace, answered: No prophet is accepted in his own country.[14337] With regard to confessions, it is a common saying, that the confessors belonging to a place are confessors for venial sins, and this is the truth. For people feel repugnance to tell their grievous sins to a priest who is either a relative of theirs, or of the same place, so that they have him always before their eyes, and therefore they go to strangers to confess. With regard to sermons, it is also well known that the sermons of a priest of the place profit little, either because he is born in the place, or because people are accustomed to his voice. Were the preacher a St. Paul in the beginning, agreeable as you like, after he has been heard for six months, or at most for a year, he scarcely pleases, or profits any longer. The missionaries produce great fruit in the places to which they go, for this very reason, that they are strangers and their voices new. It is certain that a priest of an active Order, and especially of missionaries, will save more souls in one month, and in one single mission, than if he were to work for ten years in his own country. Besides, there he will help the souls of his countrymen only, but by giving missions he will save souls in a hundred and a thousand places. Moreover, he who is in the world, will often be in doubt and confused, not knowing whether God wishes of him this or that good work, but he who lives in religion, by obeying his Superiors, knows with certainty that all that he does is according to the will of God. For religious only are those happy ones, who can say: We are happy, O Israel, because the things, that are pleasing to God are made known to us.[14338]

In fine, there is another temptation which the devil brings against some one who is perhaps favored by God with sensible spiritual consolations, tears, and transports of love. Do you not see, he says, that you are not called to an active life, but to a contemplative one, to solitude and union with God? You must go then to an Order of contemplatives, or at least to a hermitage. That is your vocation. If the devil should ever tempt me in this way, I would answer him thus: Since thou speakest of vocation, I ought then to follow my vocation, and not my caprice or thy suggestion. God having already called me to this Order of evangelical laborers, who can assure me that to leave them is an inspiration, and not a temptation?

And the same I say to you, my brother: there is no doubt that God calls some to an active and some to a contemplative life; but God having called you to an Order of evangelical laborers, you ought to believe that the other vocation comes not from God, but rather from hell, which seeks by this to make you lose your vocation. St. Philip Neri said, that one ought not to lose a good state of life for a better one, without being certain of the divine will. Thus, in order not to err, you should be more than morally certain that it is the will of God to have you pass to another state; but when does this certainty exist, above all, if your Superiors, and your spiritual Father tell you that it is a temptation? Besides, you ought to consider that, as St. Thomas teaches, although the contemplative life, taken in itself, is more perfect than the active, nevertheless, the mixed life, that is, that which is devoted alternately to prayer and to action, is the most perfect, because this was the life of Jesus Christ. And this is precisely the life of all well-regulated Communities of evangelical laborers, where each day there are several hours of prayer and several hours of silence. Wherefore such religious can say, that when out of their houses they are laborers; but when at home, they are hermits.

Do not, then, allow yourself, my brother, to be seduced by those specious pretexts of the enemy. Be certain that if you leave the Order you will repent of it, as it has happened in other like cases, and you will perceive the error when you are unable to remedy it, for he who has once left an Order will with difficulty be received into it again.

II. THE MEANS TO PRESERVE ONE'S VOCATION

I. The first means is, to avoid the faults that are committed with open eyes. And let every one know, that the devil tempts novices to commit faults, not so much to injure them by the faults themselves, as to make them lose their vocation thereby. For, by the commission of deliberate faults, they will begin to lose fervor in their prayers, Communions, and all their other exercises of devotion. The Lord, on the other hand, with regard to his graces, justly shuts his hand, according to the general rule of St. Paul, He who soweth sparingly, shall also reap sparingly. [14339] Especially if they are faults of pride, for God resists the proud, and against them the devil gains more strength, and thus on one side the novice increasing in tepidity, and on the other divine light failing, it will not be difficult for hell to gain its end, namely, to make him lose his vocation.

2. The second means is, to spring the mines, that is, to discover the temptation to his Superiors. St. Philip Neri said: A temptation when manifested is half overcome. On the contrary, as the abscess, when it is not opened, spreads like a cancer, so temptation, when concealed, brings on ruin. And in fact, experience has often shown that those that have already been shaken by temptation, and brought to that point where the road divides, that is, where one doubts, deliberates which way to go, whether to the left or to the right, and yet keeps it secret, almost all such have lost their vocation. One must, then, offer violence to one's self and discover the temptation to the Superiors, for God will be so much pleased with this act of humility and the violence that the novice does to himself, that by his divine light he will suddenly dispel all confusion and darkness.

3. The third means is prayer, that is, to have recourse to God, that he may give him holy perseverance, which, as St. Augustine says,[14340] is only obtained by praying for it. But the novice who has already received of God his vocation, and is tempted to abandon it, ought not to pray to God, saying, O Lord! give me light to know what I ought to do; because this light God has already given him, by calling him: for if he should ask only for this light, the devil may transform himself into an angel of light, and easily deceive him, making him believe that the thought of departing is a divine light. He ought rather to say, O Lord! since Thou hast given me the vocation, give me also the strength to persevere in it.

A certain young man had been called by God to the religious state, and his vocation had, after many trials, already been approved of by his director, and he retired into the Order to which he had been called. His parents made such effort as to force him to go to a third place, the better to examine his vocation. But instead of returning thence to the place from which he had come, he went to his own house, thus pleasing his parents and displeasing God. Being there asked how he had come to commit such an error, he said that he had prayed to God to give him light, by saying: Speak, O Lord, because thy servant heareth;[14341] and that having done this he resolved to go home. I then said to him: O my son! you have made a mistake in your prayer; your vocation was certain, even confirmed by so many signs; you should not have said, Speak, O Lord, because God had already spoken to you, but Confirm, O God, what Thou hast worked in me;[14342] O Lord, give me strength to accomplish Thy will, which Thou hast already made known to me. You have failed to make this prayer, and therefore you have lost your vocation. Let the misfortune of this one be a warning to others.

Let the novice, moreover, remark, that the time of temptation is a time of darkness and confusion; he must therefore not look then for clearness of reason to quiet himself. Let him then be careful only to offer himself to God anew, and to beseech him, saying, O my God! I have given myself to Thee, I will not abandon Thee, help me, permit me not to be unfaithful to Thee. And saving so, and repeating this the oftener as the temptation increases, and discovering it at the same time to the Superiors, as we have said, he will certainly triumph over it. Let him also recommend himself in a special manner to most holy Mary, who is the mother of perseverance. A certain novice, overcome by temptation, was already on the point of leaving his monastery, but he stopped first to kneel down and say an Ave Maria before an image of the divine mother, and suddenly felt himself, as it were, nailed to the floor, so that he could not rise any more; coming then to himself, he made a vow to persevere, after which he rose without difficulty, asked pardon of the Master of novices, and persevered.[14343]

4. To conclude, I beseech you, my brother, when you are tempted in any way regarding your vocation, I beseech you, I say, to reflect principally on two things:

The first is, that the grace of vocation, which God has given to you, he has not given to so many others of your companions, perhaps less unworthy than you. He hath not done in like manner to every nation.[14344] Be afraid, then, of showing ingratitude by turning your back on him, because by doing so you expose yourself to a great danger of being damned. And be certain you will have no more peace in this life, and will always be tormented until death, by remorse for your infidelity.

The second is, that when the temptation comes, and perhaps tells you, that, if you do not quit, you will lead a life of despair, that you will repent of it, that perhaps you will even have to account for it to God, and such similar suggestions as we have mentioned above; then set before your eyes the hour of your death, and reflect, that, if you were now about to die, you would not repent of having followed your vocation, but you would feel the greatest contentment and peace; and, on the contrary, you would feel great distress and pain to have abandoned it. Think of this, and you will not lose it, but will receive during this life, and at the hour of your death, the peace and the crown that God prepares for his faithful servants in this life and in the next.

OFFERING AND PRAYER THAT THE NOVICE SHOULD RECITE IN ORDER TO OBTAIN THE GRACE TO PERSEVERE IN HIS VOCATION

O my God! how shall I ever be able to thank Thee enough for having called me with so much love to Thine own household, and how have I deserved this favor after so many offences that I have committed against Thee! How many of my companions are in the world, in the midst of so many occasions and dangers of losing their souls! and I have been admitted to live in this Thy house, in the company of so many of Thy dear servants, and with so many helps to become a saint. I hope, O my Lord! to thank Thee for it better in heaven throughout eternity, and there forever to sing the mercy that Thou hast shown me. In the meanwhile, I am Thine, and always will be Thine. I have already given myself to Thee. I repeat the offering now. I will be faithful to Thee; I will not abandon Thee, even should I lose my life and a thousand lives. Behold, I offer myself entirely to accomplish Thy will without reserve. Do with me what Thou pleasest; make me live as Thou wilt, desolate, infirm, despised; treat me as is pleasing to Thee. Enough for me to obey Thee and please Thee. I ask nothing of Thee but the grace to love Thee with my whole heart, and to be faithful to Thee until death.

O most hoy Mary, my dear mother! thou hast already obtained for me the many graces that I have received from God, the pardon of my sins, my vocation, and the strength to follow it; thou must finish the work by obtaining for me perseverance until death. This, is my hope: thus may it be!

III. IMPORTANT INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOVICE THAT HE MAY PRESERVE HIMSELF IN FERVOR

1. When he is reprimanded, or accused, let him not excuse himself, and let him love before God with an especial affection him who accuses or reprimands him.

2. Let him love to be despised in all things, with regard to occupations, clothing, room, food, etc.

3. Let him not be forward to utter his opinion, unless he is asked for it.

4. Let him mortify himself in all things according to the rules of prudence and obedience, in eating, sleeping, sight, smell, etc.

5. Let him observe the rules of modesty, when he is alone as well as with others.

6. Let him never touch others with his hands, or look fixedly at them, but let him always keep his eyes cast down, especially in church, at table, during recreation, and in the streets.

7. Let him keep silence, except when it is necessary to speak either for the glory of God, or for his own and his neighbor's good. And in speaking, especially in recreation, let him never raise his voice too much. Let him avoid every dispute or contention about birth, talents, or riches, and all vain discourse about eating, hunting, about play or battles, about the acquiring of honors, fortune, or the like things of the world. But let him seek always to introduce pious discourses on the vanity of the world, the love towards Jesus and Mary, happy lot of the saints, and the manner of advancing in perfection.

8. After each fault let him promptly humble himself, repent of it, and be quiet.

9. Let him desire nothing but that which God wills. Let him not ask for consolations. In the time of dryness of spirit let him humble and resign himself, saying: O Lord! I do not desire consolations; I am content to remain thus during my whole life.

10. Let him often raise his heart to God by ejaculatory prayers; he can make use of the following:

O my God! I desire nothing but Thee.

Tell me what Thou wilt have of me, and I will do all. Do with me what Thou wilt.

All that which Thou wiliest is my will also.

Make me love Thee, and send me where Thou wilt.

My Jesus, I love Thee, I love Thee, I love Thee.

Make Thyself known to all, and loved by all.

I renounce all: Thou alone art sufficient for me.

My God and my all.

Live Jesus and Mary, our hope!

O good Jesus! be Thou always praised, my life was the cause of Thy death, and Thy death was my life.

EXHORTATION TO RELIGIOUS TO ADVANCE IN THE PERFECTION OF THEIR STATE

THE religious are the portion that God has particularly selected from among men upon earth to extend his glory, and to have himself loved by them with a love more special and more pure than that with which he is loved by men that live in the midst of the world who are absorbed in secular cares. To this end the Lord by a particular vocation has drawn them from the darkness of Egypt and has freed them from the love of this world, and they afterwards, aided by the grace of God, have consecrated themselves to him by the vows of religion, renouncing all the goods that the world promises and obtains for its followers. Hence every Community of religious on earth should consider itself as a reunion of persons who, disengaged from every earthly thought, apply themselves to nothing else than to a life devoted to God, so that the Lord may be glorified by them, and may say: These persons belong entirely to me; they are my delight.

But I ask, Can the Lord say at the present day of all religious that they are his delight? Alas! the Church grieves to see among the religious a general relaxation united with a coldness in the service of God. It is not denied that among them there are found good religious who live like true religious detached from worldly affections, and who endeavor to sanctify themselves and to gain souls for God. I say that these are the judges that will one day judge their companions in the valley of Josaphat. But how many of these good religious are there? Ah! there are very few, as we may now see; and this the Church deplores, with all those that love the glory of God.

It is improper from my "littleness" to speak here censoriously, and to note the faults into which religious commonly fall at the present time, and which are a subject of surprise and scandal to those that should be edified by their example. Some one may say: Tell us then, Mr. Reformer, which are these common faults, and teach us what we have to do in order to be good religious. Oh no! I do not pretend to reform the world; therefore I will not dare to point out in detail the particular faults that have become common at the present day. I only say to you who has put the foregoing question to me that you well know what one must do in order to be a good religious. In novitiate you have been carefully instructed on the virtues that you have to practise in religion, namely, obedience, detachment from earthly affections, the love of poverty, self-abnegation, desire for humiliations, and all that is necessary in order to live as a good religious. But at the present time, since lukewarmness arc relaxation have become a general evil, and since religious think but little of the obligations of the religious state, they scarcely think of correcting the faults that they commit.

Ah! Would to God that religious would preserve at least one half of the good life that they began in the novitiate! Ordinarily, novices that persevere as far as to make the vows, live with fervor and give edification; but the evil is, that after having made the vows, while applying themselves to their studies, they begin at once to grow cold, to neglect to preserve the fervor acquired and to practise the good resolutions formed in the novitiate. Hence instead of making progress in the exercise of virtue, they go on declining from day to day and become imperfect. After this, when they are appointed to teach others, relaxation increases; for then one thinks no more of working for the glory of God, but more for one's own interests, striving to reach the higher offices, and thus to succeed in leading a life less under subjection and more comfortable.

There have been good reasons for establishing decrees through which religious should pass in order to render themselves more useful to the good of souls by instructing the ignorant and exciting the zeal of the lukewarm. But unfortunately in many religious the means become the end; for in the course of time it happens that one seeks less the good of religion and of souls than one's own temporal advantages. I protest again that I do not pretend to be a reformer; but I consider that such distinctions in religious Communities forment every kind of ambition, and consequently every kind of relaxation. Thence I conclude that it would be much better for the teachers after having finished the course of teaching to remain in the humble state in which they were when they came forth from the novitiate; then each of them would apply himself to his duties, not in order to attain particular ends, but only in order to do the divine will and to obey his Superiors. As, on the contrary, teaching procures for them certain privileges, conveniences of lodging, liberties, preferments, it is for this reason that there are few that advance in the spiritual life and in the edification that they should give to others. Hence it happens that all good people grieve to see in religious Orders the general relaxation that they see on every side. Where is to-day among religious, generally speaking, the spirit of obedience, of poverty, of mortification, of interior abnegation? Where is the love for solitude, for the hidden life, the desire for contempt, such as animated the saints? These kinds of virtues have become strange things; it seems that all that remains of them is the name.

But what remedy should be applied to an evil so great and so general? What answer should be given to this question? The remedy should come from heaven; hence we should pray to the Lord to remedy it by his power and mercy, for just as the good spirit of the religious is communicated to seculars, so the seculars share in the relaxation of the religious.

In my opinion this spiritual coolness of the religious Orders arises for the most part from the neglect of prayer, and this neglect proceeds from the want of retirement and recollection. Experience abundantly proves that the more we entertain ourselves with creatures, the less we desire to entertain ourselves with God; and the greater our relations are to the world, the more will God withdraw himself. "There are many souls to which I should willingly speak," said our Lord one day to St. Teresa, "but the world makes so much noise in their hearts that my voice cannot be heard by them." Thus many religious, plunged into earthly affairs, think little of God. They would like to emerge from the mire of their lukewarmness, and to become disengaged from the earthly attachments that bind them; but the passions that they do not strive to overcome, always draw them downward, and cause them to lose the spirit of prayer.

The religious of ancient times gave themselves up much to prayer; they thus attained sanctity, and by their edifying life also sanctified others. But at the present time everything is wanting, because the spirit of prayer has been lost; this is the cause why humility is wanting, why we are not detached from the world why we have so little love for God. The love for God being wanting, all the virtues are wanting.

Let us, therefore, pray to Jesus Christ, who alone can remedy so great an evil. Let us pray to him to inspire the religious with his holy love and with the desire to sanctify themselves; for at the present time it seems that the religious have even lost the desire to sanctify themselves. Every one feels the necessity of a general reform among the religious, the priests, and the seculars, when he sees the corruption of morals extending everywhere. Hence we should every day repeat the prayer of David, which is very appropriate to the circumstances of the present time: Turn again, O God of hosts, look down from heaven, and see, and visit this vineyard: and perfect the same which Thy right hand hath planted, and upon the Son of man, whom Thou hast confirmed for Thyself.[14345] O Lord! Thy Church, this vineyard that Thy divine Son has planted and watered with his blood, is ravaged in all parts; come, visit and renew it, Thou who alone canst renew it.

PURITY OF INTENTION

INSTRUCTION ADDRESSED TO THE FATHERS OF THE CONGREGATION.[14346]

Every one knows that the work of what we do is in accordance with the end that we propose to ourselves. If the root be holy, so are the branches,[14347] says the Apostles.

My dear Fathers, a priest, in order to sanctify himself, should be above all attentive to have always a right and a pure intention in all his actions; for it is certain that a priest, and especially a missionary, has necessarily to perform every day many works of God; the main thing is to see whether he performs them only for God, only in order to please God.

Ah! how often do we lose all the merit of what we do, because we have not the right intention as when we listen to human respect, to our own taste, and especially to some vain desire of being praised or esteemed by men, and appropriating the glory of the good that is done,—the glory that belongs only to God.

Vainglory is so secret a robber, says a master of the spiritual life, that sometimes before allowing itself to be perceived it has already captured all. Thus it often succeeds in stripping us of the best part of the fruit of our labors.

It must not be believed that vainglory is a temptation of beginners, no, it is a temptation with which the devil assails those that are more advanced in spirituality. St. Gregory avows that while writing his books, although he wished to work only for God, he nevertheless perceived sometimes that a vain complacency was creeping into his mind. How often does it not happen that those that preach and hear confessions only for God, afterwards conceive the vain desire to be praised or to be seen!

St. Cyprian observes that the devil after having tried against Jesus Christ various temptations, concluded by tempting him to vainglory, because he had often succeeded in conquering by this temptation those that had resisted all other temptations.

Hence the ancient Fathers instructed the novices to perform penances, abstinences, mortifications, while to the more advanced they recommended them to guard against vainglory; for those that have performed many acts of virtue, and especially the missionaries that obtain applause and please the people, are very much exposed to conceive a high idea of themselves, and thus to suffer shipwreck in port. One of the chastisements, perhaps the most ordinary, that God sends to punish this kind of fault is to permit that we fall over some great precipice; this is what we have to fear. Oh, how many servants of God, much more perfect than we, have experienced this chastisement!

Let us then take care always to place before our eyes the sole pleasure of God; let it be the only mark of all our actions, of all our thoughts, of all our affections, as the Lord has ordained: Put Me as a seal upon thy heart, as a seal upon thy arm.[14348] Then God will say that he has been wounded with love for us: Thou hast wounded My heart, My sister, My spouse,[14349] on account of the only end that we have proposed to ourselves to please him regardless of everything else: Thou hast wounded My heart with one of thy eyes.[14350]

In order always to keep before our minds the only end of pleasing God, we must act in the following manner:

I. At first we must take care not to concern ourselves about success, but only about the end for which the work is done; here are a few examples:

1. We labor, we preach, we hear confessions, and then we remain quiet if we see no concourse, no emotion, if we do not see any fruit in our penitents, if we do not hear ourselves praised by others; why? Because we have labored only for God; if we had only God in view we should not be disturbed, well knowing that we can plant, but that the production and the glory of the fruit belong only to God.

2. The two servants—one of them bringing back ten talents, the other only four—were received with equal love, says St. Jerome, because both had done their duty.

3. A true servant of God rejoices at the fruit that is produced, because it is the glory of God; and he rejoices as much when he sees the fruit produced by another as when it is produced by himself. It is thus that the Venerable John d'Avila was happy to see that St. Ignatius by instituting the Society of Jesus had done what he himself desired to do. On the other hand, a true servant of God is not disturbed when he does not derive the fruit that he expected; for having labored only for God, he has already attained his end, which is to please God.

II. Moreover, we should be careful to abstain from saying without necessity things that may be turned to our own praise. How many are there not that pass for spiritual persons, and that commit this fault! Ah! it is the ego (I), this cursed ego, that is always putting itself forward. We sometimes give a long discourse that demands all the attention of those that hear it, and the whole discourse may be reduced to a discourse in praise of ourselves. We may speak of ourselves when we do so through necessity, in order to be useful to our neighbor and to glorify God; but this is rarely done through necessity, it is oftenest done through vanity. An apostolic laborer returns from a mission or from preaching Lenten sermons; he will only speak of the great crowds that attended, of the fruit that his sermons produced, of the time that he spent in the confessional; he will do this for what purpose? In order to be praised. What can you derive from all that if not motives of vain complacency, that will make you lose all that you have gained?

When St. Hilarion saw himself esteemed or praised he began to weep, saying: "It seems to me that God is rewarding me in this life." We should do the same when we are praised; we should then interrupt the conversation, and refer all the glory to God, to God alone.

II. Moreover, we should be ashamed, either in the Congregation or on the missions to lay claim to the most honorable employments: the employments that we should prefer are those that obedience imposes.

III. Finally, we should especially take care always to refer actually, as much as possible, all our actions to God. We should, not content ourselves with the general intention that we make in the morning: we should endeavor to direct actually every action with a view to please God, as was done by an ancient Father, who, before each of his actions, stopped a moment and said. " I am aiming at a mark so as to send this action directly to God."

Even in the middle of our actions, let us try as much as possible to renew our intention to perform them in order to please God; let us renew it at each confession that we make; while reciting the divine Office at each psalm. Let us do the same when preaching and in all other actions, especially in those that are more according to our taste.

If vainglory then presents itself to our mind, the best thing that we can do according to St. Bernard is to despise it. Let us say to it, as we are advised by the Venerable John d'Avila: You come too late, for I have already given this work to God.

Oh! how well do we work, my dear Fathers, when we work only for God! and who does not see that to act thus continually for God is to love God continually, and to love him with a true love, with a pure disinterested love, only to please him?

True love, says St. Bernard, asks for nothing but itself: "True love is content with itself; it is its own reward; besides itself, it needs no cause, no fruit. I love because I love; I love to be loved."[14351] Love desires no other recompense than to be loved by God, says St. John Chrysostom; for the more disinterested we are in our love towards God, the more liberal he will be towards us.

RELIGIOUS POVERTY

WHETHER IT IS PERMITTED TO RELIGIOUS TO POSSESS THINGS IN COMMON, AND WHETHER IT THIS AN IMPERFECTION.[14352]

OUR Lord ordained for the apostles, when he sent them out to preach the Gospel, to possess nothing: Do not possess gold, nor silver, nor money in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, nor two coats, nor shoes, nor a staff.[14353]

In the first place, Ludolph of Saxony answers that Jesus Christ only wished thereby to deliver them from all solicitude and all inordinate affection for temporal things, teaching them to be content with what is necessary, which should be furnished them by those whom they would evangelize: "Jesus Christ frees them from all solicitude, saying: Take nothing for your journey, etc. And because he had sent them forth as it were stripped of everything, he tempered the severity of the precept, saying: The workman is worthy of his meat, that is, of the necessaries of life; as if he said: Receive as much as is necessary for food and clothing. Hence the Apostle also says: But having food, and wherewith to be covered, with these we are content. Wherefore he commanded that they should carry nothing with them, since all was due them for their labor. It is according to natural law, those that serve the community in spiritual things should be provided by the community with the necessaries in temporal things. He therefore did not prohibit them to carry with them things necessary for sustaining this life, but he showed them that these things were due to them by those to whom they preached. He commanded these things rather for the purpose of recalling their affection from the inordinate love of temporal things, that they might not seek what was superfluous, and that what was necessary should be sufficient for them."[14354]

Secondly, it is answered that it is clear that this was a particular precept for this mission, which concerned only the Jews, whom the apostles were to persuade, by their contempt for earthly things, that they were the messengers of the true Messiah; this is seen in the same Gospel in which the divine Master tells them not to address themselves to others: Go ye not in the way of the Gentiles, and into the cities of the Samaritans enter ye not. But go ye rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.[14355] Hence before his death he recalled to their minds this precept in order to abrogate it: When I sent you without purse and scrip and shoes, did you want anything? But they said: Nothing. Then said He unto them: But now he that hath a purse, let hint take it, and likewise,[14356] etc. Such is the explanation that is given by Cornelius a Lapide,[14357] in citing St. John Chrysostom, St. Anselm, and other authors, with St. Thomas,[14358] who expressly says that by these last words Jesus Christ abrogated the particular precepts that he had given to the apostles when he sent them to preach to the Jews. Cornelius adds that this had to be so; for the apostles would have to provide themselves with things necessary when going to preach to the Gentiles, who as enemies of the Gospel would have at first opposed them.

As to the possession of temporal goods, Cornelius says that although Jesus Christ possessed nothing in private, he yet possessed things in common with the college of the apostles. It is thus that we see in the Gospel of St. John that Judas carried the money received as alms: And having the purse, carried the things that were put therein ; and that the disciples had gone to buy the necessary food: His disciples were gone into the city to buy meats.[14359]

From this example of our divine Master, Cornelius concludes that it is by no means contrary to perfection to have goods in common, as is generally the case with religious Orders, and is thus defined by John XXII: "From this example of Christ it follows that it is not derogatory to Christian perfection to have goods in common, as is usually had by religious Orders according to what is defined by John XXII."[14360]

I have, moreover, found in another place that the same Pope declares him a heretic who would say that Jesus Christ and the apostles possessed nothing either in private or in common.[14361]

On the word asserit (asserts) in the note below—the gloss points out the passages of Scripture in which we see that Jesus Christ and the apostles possessed things. We there read that the Magi offered gold to the Saviour; that St. Peter had a house, and so had St. Matthew.[14362] Father Suarez, cited by Dom Calmet, assures us that it is a probable and a sound opinion, that St. Peter even after the vow of poverty was still in possession of his house when Jesus entered there and healed his mother-in-law.[14363] We also know, says Calmet, that the apostles, before and after the resurrection of Jesus Christ, made use of their boats although they had said that they had left all. Behold, we have left all things.[14364] The perfection of their poverty, says Calmet, consisted in that they had abandoned their goods by detaching their hearts.

However this may be, St. Thomas[14365] puts the question whether it is against religious perfection to possess anything in common,[14366] and he answers in the negative with St. Prosper, who says that perfection permits not private possession, but common possession: "It is shown sufficiently that private possessions should be contemned on account of perfection, and that common goods are possessed without detriment to perfection."[14367] St. Thomas afterwards observes that perfection does not consist in poverty, but in the imitation of Jesus Christ. Poverty, he says, is only a means to arrive at perfection; it delivers man from the solicitude that is attached to riches. But when we possess only what is necessary to nourish ourselves, and should feel in regard to this some solicitude that disturbs us but little, this would not be against the perfection of the Christian life; for the Lord forbids not every kind of solicitude, but only excessive solicitude, which is injurious to the service of God.[14368]

Moreover, continues the Doctor, the solicitude that one has for particular goods is different from that which one has for common goods; for the first belongs to private love, while the second belongs to charity.[14369]

Hence we see, so he concludes, that the possession of superabundant riches in common is an obstacle to perfection, though it does not exclude it entirely; but the possession in common of what is necessary for simple subsistence does not hinder religious perfection.[14370]

St. Thomas speaks thus, in general, for all the religious; but afterwards considering the question in relation to the special ends of religious Orders, he says that an Order is so much the more perfect in respect to poverty, as it has a poverty proportioned to its end.[14371]

In speaking of an Order established for the good of souls, he says that this Order requires poverty to give it the least solicitude.[14372] Now he adds what gives the least solicitude is the preservation of necessary things after one has procured them at a suitable time.[14373] Note these last words, "After a suitable time."

Finally, citing the passage of St. John, To buy meats,[14374] the angelic Doctor concludes therefrom that it is evidently conformable to the perfection taught by the example of Jesus Christ, to keep money or all other common things, in order to support the religious.[14375] Note words, All other things; this refers to things movable or immovable, spoken of above; note also the words, Perfection taught by Christ.

Hence, says Cornelius a Lapide,[14376] after having cited the example of Jesus Christ and shown that it is not repugnant to perfection to possess things in common, the old founders (who certainly have had before their eyes only the example of Jesus Christ in order to attain a perfect life) have established that the religious should have goods in common, in order to give themselves up freely to prayer, to study, to preaching, as appears from the Constitutions of Sts. Basil, Augustine, Bernard, Dominic. Thus, Cornelius continues, with the exception of the Order of the Franciscans, the end of which is the greatest poverty, as to the other Orders that have the foregoing ends, it is more perfect to possess goods in common.[14377] By this means the solitaries can better guard their solitude, and those that devote themselves to preaching, compensate for austerity by charity.[14378]

I add, that St. Cajetan, who alone established as a rule self-abandonment to Providence, did not propose to himself simply the life of Jesus Christ; he had especially in view the glorification of the divine attribute of Providence, as is indicated by the Gospel[14379] that the Church makes us read on his feast.[14380] The saint also wished to confound thereby the impiety of Luther, who denied Providence; therefore, in the Church of Our Lady of Victories at Chiaia, above the little door, St. Cajetan is represented holding under him Luther, who says: Non est providentia Dei (There is no Providence of God).

Live Jesus and Mary!

Notes on the Life of the Rev. Father Paul Cafaro, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer

We do not precisely know when these Notes were written and published; we only know that in 1767 they were printed at the end of the volume entitled Way of Salvation. We think, however, that they must have appeared sooner, Father Cafaro having died in 1753. We here give some details that the author has omitted.

Father Cafaro was received as a novice by St. Alphonsus, at Barra, October 25, 1741; he was then thirty-four years of age, and he lived nearly twelve years in the Congregation. The saint soon gave a signal proof of the esteem and confidence that he reposed in his new subject. In 1743, he chose him for his spiritual director, and made a vow to obey him in all things. At the General Chapter of 1749, Father Cafaro was appointed one of the Consultors-General. St. Alphonsus regarded him as one of the principal supports of his Congregation, and never deviated from his counsels; in Cafaro's last illness the saint did all he could to save his life; and in order to console himself for his loss, it was while adoring the decrees of Providence that he composed his beautiful hymn on the Conformity to the will of God. (Villecourt, 1. 2, ch. 12, 17, 31, and 39.)—ED.

NOTES ON THE LIFE OF THE REV. FATHER PAUL CAFARO, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

I. HIS BIRTH AND INFANCY

FATHER PAUL CAFARO was born on the 5th of July, 1707, in the diocese of Cava, and in a place called after the Cafari. His father was called John Nicholas Cafaro, and his mother Cecily also bore the name of Cafaro. Cecily was a woman of great piety, and her husband led a most exemplary life although only a secular. He belonged to a Congregation, the obligations of which he never neglected. He was much given to mental prayer, and he also taught his family how to practise it; his children daily received instruction in the Christian doctrine from him; and he was scrupulously obedient to his spiritual Father; in fact, when he died his director did not hesitate to say to his wife, "You have now a saint in Paradise." These virtuous parents had six children, four girls and two boys, of whom Paul was the second.

His temper was so sweet and gentle even in his very cradle that his mother used to be obliged to awaken him when she wanted to suckle him. His childhood was quite different from that of other children, and quite free from those acts of levity that usually accompany it. He had a very serious illness when he was ten years of age, which he bore without a murmur, and with such patience that the doctor that attended him was quite delighted with him, and made his virtues generally known. When he began to study, he was always modest and attentive to his duties; he never deserved any reproof or punishment from his masters, but, on the contrary, he excited their admiration and that of his companions, as well as that of all that conversed with him.

As soon as he was old enough, he began to frequent the sacraments and to meditate chiefly before the Blessed Sacrament; and he did so with such devotion that it afforded matter of edification to all that beheld him. On account of his great piety and regularity his mother intrusted the care of his sisters to him; he watched over them most sedulously, and was very careful in seeing that they did not leave the house while she was out. If any one of them happened to transgress on this point, he punished her by shutting her up in a room, in which he obliged her to remain for some time, which varied according to the length of her stay and the distance to which she had gone.

II. HIS ENTRANCE INTO THE SEMINARY AND HIS CONDUCT WHILE THERE

He became a cleric at the age of thirteen, and led so edifying a life in the seminary that he entered, that the president, Don Dante della Monica, used to say, "The sight of this child leads me to God and makes me recollected. He therefore made him zelator over all the seminarians; and as he never failed to accuse those that transgressed the rules through the dictates of human respect, they revenged themselves on him by ill-treating him one day when they found him by himself. Paul, however, did not, therefore, in the least slacken in his zealous vigilance, and thus corresponded to the confidence reposed in him by his Superior, who had intrusted the superintendence of the whole seminary to him, notwithstanding his extreme youth. When the seminarians asked leave to go to any feast, or place of amusement, the president used to say, "I will consent if Paul goes with you." One day the seminarians were invited to be present at the Office in the church of the convent of Preato, and as it was late, the nuns wished them to stay to dinner. They sent to ask permission for them to do so from the president, Don Simon Sambiase. He sent the following line in reply: "Let Paul decide; if he remains with them, I consent." Such was the confidence that all the Superiors had in the wisdom and prudence of our Paul, although he was still but a mere boy.

At this early period, and although he was scarcely initiated into the office of cleric, he began to manifest his zeal for the spiritual advancement of his neighbor. He went from village to village on all feast days, teaching the Christian doctrine to the children and to the most ignorant and abandoned people; he even stirred up the other clerical students that were his companions, to imitate his example, and he was most solicitous in aiding them to become holy and learned priests, capable of leading souls in the way of salvation. For this purpose, he used to instruct them and teach them how to meditate. He was thus occupied for seven consecutive years, and we know that his labors were crowned with success, for these clerics became good priests and excellent laborers.

Paul was so mortified, and such a lover of the interior life from his earliest youth, that he used often to retire into a secluded chamber, in order to hide his mortifications and abstinences from observation, and take his meals alone there, that he might be able secretly to let them down out of the window to the poor that were stationed below ready to receive them. He used to reserve only a morsel of bread or some such nourishment for himself, and with it he was in the habit of mingling bitter herbs. He used to fast at least twice a week on bread and water. Sometimes he would confine himself to soup without bread, and throughout his youth he constantly abstained from meat and fruits, which was a great mortification for one so young. Besides this, he used to mortify his body by hair-cloth and the discipline in the privacy of his cell. When he was only thirteen he wore an iron chain with points so sharp that the very sight of it was enough to appal any one; and when his mother discovered it she took it from him by force. From that time he used to sleep on boards, or oftener still on the bare ground, with his head resting on a bench.

He then began to reflect that a good priest ought to be well informed; so he began to study Greek and Latin, under the direction of Don Ignatius della Calce, with the greatest ardor; after that he studied philosophy, and above all, theology. This science appeared of such importance to him, that he founded an academy at Cava, which he directed himself for several years, and of which he was both the head and the support. He was lecturer in dogmatic and in scholastic theology in our Congregation, and he treated on the different branches of both in some learned papers that we still preserve with veneration; we have attached still more value to them since it has become the custom in the Congregation for the young men only to study from books. Experience has taught us that they make much more progress by this method, that a great deal of time is thus saved; they are thereby freed from the inconveniences of writing, which is very prejudicial to the health.

III. HIS CONDUCT AS PRIEST AND AS PASTOR

After he had become a priest, in obedience to his director, Father Paul strove to unite himself still more closely to God than before, and to devote himself to the exercises of a holy life. According to the rule laid down for him by his spiritual Father, he daily meditated for four hours, two of which he passed before the Blessed Sacrament, and two others were subtracted from his sleep. Besides this, he used often to put in practice the counsel of St. Augustine: "Go, young men, go, ye grey-haired, and visit the sepulchres of your fathers." For he used often to go to the parish cemetery and pass several hours among the bones, occupied in meditation on death; and sometimes he even spent the whole night and slept there. At times he would grasp the skeleton of his deceased father, who was interred in this place, and say, "O my father, how light death hath made thee!" At this same period he used also to retire for some days into a very solitary hermitage, where he spent all his time in prayer and macerations of the flesh.

He was appointed confessor and almoner of the ecclesiastical prison soon after his ordination. He had also at this time the consolation of converting by his gentleness and by his instructions, or rather by his prayers and penances, two Calvinists of noble birth, who came to Cava at this time.

After he had been in the priesthood for a year, his bishop insisted on his filling the post of parish priest in the church of St. Peter, and he accepted this office out of pure obedience, and after much resistance, in 1755, when he was in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

From the time he became a parish priest he devoted himself entirely to the service of the souls in his parish. I will here cite what was said of him by a priest who had witnessed his good works and his zeal. "Whilst Father Paul was parish priest," said he, "he never shrunk from any fatigue that could procure the spiritual advantage of his parishioners. In order to be always ready to fly to the assistance of the sick, as soon as he was sent for, he used to go to bed quite dressed, so that if he were awakened in the middle of the night he could set out directly. More than once, to the great astonishment of those that came to fetch him, they met him at the door of his house, as if he had foreseen the message, for he would say directly he saw them, 'Here I am. Let us go.' " During the month when he was on duty in the parish (for it was served by several priests) he spent the night in the church, as he promised that those that wished to apply to him should always find him there, and he remained seated in the confessional even during the short interval he allotted to repose. He was so full of zeal, and so anxious to attend to the parishioners that had recourse to him without delay, that when the sacristan came in the morning to open the church doors, he found that he had been kneeling there since two or three o'clock, and he never once arrived there before him.

He not only preached in the parish church as often as possible, but he went about from chapel to chapel, giving spiritual assistance to the poor who were unable to repair to the church, by preaching to them, by giving them instructions, or by hearing their confessions. He went through the neighboring villages, with his crucifix in his hand, after twelve o'clock on feast days, and he made a special point of visiting all places of the greatest resort and of a suspicious character, in order to prevent sin from being committed against God. He used to return thither again between eight and nine o'clock at night, even in the cold of winter, and give short instructions on the truths of eternity, setting the chastisement of heaven before sinners, and inspiring terror into those that were living at enmity with God. One evening when he was preaching before the house of a gentleman, who was probably in a state of alienation from God, he was accosted by him in the most offensive and insulting manner, he even treated him as if he were mad; to which Father Paul only replied, "No, sir, they who perform their duty are not madmen, and I am only doing my duty in taking care of the souls intrusted to my care."

One amongst the good fruits of his labors was that of withdrawing several women from a life of sin by either placing them out of the reach of temptation, or by supplying their necessities out of his own pocket; and when his purse was empty, he went about begging for them from house to house. He took particular pains for one woman whom he extricated from a criminal connection by causing her to change her abode, and supporting her there by the alms he collected until she at last married the accomplice of her guilt. He often went about begging for bread for the poor, and when he obtained any, he used to distribute it amongst them himself. One day his brother found him engaged in this charitable work, and being ashamed to see him acting the part of a beggar he loaded him with invectives in the public street, and reproached him for thus dishonoring his family and himself. Reproaches such as these, however, produced no effect upon him, and did not therefore in the least slacken his zeal in the exercise of those labors of love, by which he led a great many women of bad character to live in the fear and love of God. He had much to suffer from his activity in putting a stop to scandals. He was several times even threatened with death in consequence.

He introduced the practice of monthly confession and general Communion for the children, as well as the frequentation of the sacraments by the adults not only of his parish, but of those of nearly the whole diocese. He also established the exercise of mental prayer in common in the church, and of visits to the Blessed Sacrament. He took infinite pains in preparing everything for the erection of a Community of twelve priests, who were to be specially intrusted with the care of destitute souls in the diocese, namely, those of prisoners, sailors, children, and the poor; for this reason it was to have been called the Congregation of the Destitute. The rules were drawn up under his direction, and approved by the bishop, and several priests offered to join it, but an obstacle was put to the completion of the undertaking, from the impossibility of finding a suitable place where the Congregation might assemble.

Another happy result of his zeal was that the priests of Cava were thereby led to give the spiritual exercises in all the numerous villages of this country, or at least in those in which they were mostly required. By his means these exercises were given every year in the chapel of St. Roch-au-Bourg, as they were much needed by the inhabitants of this place; they chiefly consisted of carters, tavern-keepers, butchers, and the like persons, who are generally very indifferent to all that regards the concerns of the soul. Whilst these exercises lasted, he went about every evening in all directions, collecting together all the persons he could, after which he used to conduct them to the chapel, and either instruct and preach to them himself, or assist others that were doing so. He spent the rest of the time in the church or in the sacristy, and generally without eating, saying that he did not require anything, owing to the robustness of his constitution. In fact, although but one individual, he took upon himself the care of every soul within his reach, so that Mgr. de Liguori,[14381] the bishop of Cava, called him the watchful guardian of all the churches."[14382] Hence it happened that when Father Paul retired into our Congregation, the inhabitants of Cava began to blame us, and said to us, "Oh, what have you done? You have deprived us of a saint and an apostle!" Paul was so highly thought of in his own country, which is far from being a common occurrence, that once after a report was spread that he had died in a place where he had been giving a mission, a multitude of people from Cava and Salerno came out to meet him on his return, to testify their joy at seeing him.

IV. HIS RESIGNATION OF THE OFFICE OF PARISH PRIEST AND HIS ENTRANCE INTO THE CONGREGATION

Although Paul performed his duties of priest in so holy a manner, he was tormented by scruples from the fear of not fulfilling his obligations properly; he was, therefore, continually urging his confessor to allow him to resign his post, but the confessor always refused, being convinced that his fears were quite unfounded, since in reality he did even more than his duty; so whenever he renewed his demand, he told him to banish such an idea from his mind. But Paul still continued to be a prey to the deepest sorrow. One day when he was at home, his parents heard him break forth into tears and sobs; they were quite alarmed, and inquired what misfortune could possibly have befallen him. Paul continued to weep, and replied, "For charity's sake, assist me to obtain the favor of resigning my parish; my confessor refuses to give me leave to do so, and I am dying with terror in consequence." Some days afterwards his parents found him shut up in a chapel in which he was giving vent to his sorrow by continuing in tears. Although they had opposed him at first, they were now touched with pity, and resolved themselves to strive to have his resignation accepted; this was carried into effect in the year 1740, to his own great satisfaction, but to the great regret of his parishioners. He, however, labored for the salvation of their souls with as much zeal as he had done before.

It was by a special disposition of Providence that he gave up this office; for God called him to another state of life, and wished to withdraw him entirely from the world. No sooner had he resigned it than he inspired him with the thought of quitting all earthly things, and of entering into our Congregation to lead a life of obedience by causing him to feel that the most agreeable sacrifice we can make to God is to strip ourselves of our own will. He wrote to me about this inspiration, for I was at that time his director. In order to be sure that this was truly his vocation, I told him to reject the thought as often as it arose in his mind, for I well knew that if it really came from God, he would himself strengthen it. He endeavored to obey me, but as God wished to draw him wholly to himself, the more he strove to banish the thought, the more ardent did his desire to retire into our Congregation become. At last, after much reflection and discussion, our Paul determined to go through the spiritual exercises alone (ere taking his final resolution), in the hermitage of the Cross, situated in Cava, on the summit of a mountain. When he was there he determined to abandon the world entirely in order to give himself wholly to God; although when in it he had never loved it or been of it. He thus expressed himself on the subject when writing to a nun just before he quitted it: "I do not wish to have anything more to do with earthly things," said he, "I wish to belong wholly to God, and to forget myself, and for this reason I wish to place myself in the hands of others, so that I may have nothing to think of but eternity."

He entered the Congregation and left home without telling any one of his resolution, and joined me at Barra, which is a suburb of Naples, where I was then living with several of my brethren, in a house provided for us by Cardinal Spinelli, the Archbishop of Naples, who had sent for some of the Fathers of our Congregation to give missions in his diocese. It was here then that Father Paul came to aid me. Soon afterwards his brother heard that he had resolved to abandon his family, and came to see him; he was transported with indignation, and did not cease to address him by the most offensive names for two whole hours; but Paul prudently remained silent, not offering a single word in reply. I say he did so through prudence, because the most logical reasoning and the most eloquent language are unable to convince a passionate man; indeed the more forcible and clear they are, the more they harden and embitter him. When his bishop, Mgr. de Liguori, heard of his retirement from the world, he too was filled with great displeasure, and made loud complaints against him. He met him one day during his journey to join us, when he stopped his carriage, and tried to persuade him to return to Cava; but on finding that Paul remained unshaken in his resolution, he ended by saying, " Well, since this is your decision, do not let me see you again, and do not re-enter my diocese."

After this, Paul began his novitiate, during which he gave the greatest edification, especially by his exercise of the virtue of obedience, which is a most painful and difficult thing for one that enters a Community after having reached a certain age, and after having been long accustomed to do his own will, even although he may have been always engaged in the most holy actions. Paul increased his penances, and especially his meditations, during this period, which latter he extended to seven or eight hours a day. During his novitiate and throughout the remainder of his life, including the last six years, when God tried him by excessive desolation of mind, as we shall relate hereafter, he never had the least temptation to abandon his vocation. When it was time for him to make an oblation to God, that is to say, when he had to pronounce the vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and perseverance, according to the rules of our Institute, he did so with such love and compunction that tears choked his utterance, and prevented him from repeating the words of the formula that is usually pronounced at profession.

V. HIS ZEAL FOR THE MISSIONS

At the termination of the novitiate, his Superiors at once employed him in the work of the missions. Let us here pause a little and admire some of the virtues that this excellent priest practised during his holy life. First, let us speak of his zeal for the salvation of souls.

He was singularly devoted to the work of the missions. Indeed, he had been ardently attached to them from the time he became a priest. When he was a parish priest he used to go on missions with his companions, the missionaries of Cava, as often as he could do so without neglecting the duties of his charge; and they attest that he was indefatigable in these exercises, that he never spared himself for a single moment, and that he did not even shrink from what might endanger his life. While he was at Cava, it once happened that he had to go to a part of the country near the territory of Eboli, called Piesti, where the air was dangerously unhealthy at that time. All the rest declined to go there but Paul, who offered to go of his own accord. He cheerfully set out; notwithstanding the danger he was running, he remained alone there for a week, during which he was constantly employed in preaching and in hearing the confessions of the inhabitants, and by God's mercy he left it full of joy and in perfect health.

His love for missions was so great, that when he had resigned his parish, and before he had decided to enter the Congregation, he made a plan to go about through the kingdom in disguise, begging his bread, and giving missions in those places that were the most destitute of spiritual assistance; he even wrote to this effect to a bishop of Calabria, who as he did not know anything about him, did not accept his offer. He also at the same time wrote to the bishop of Capaccio offering to exercise his ministry in his extensive diocese; but this proposition was equally unsuccessful.

When he was in our Congregation he made a private vow never to manifest any repugnance for any mission to which his Superiors might send him. He also made a vow to go as a missionary among the unbelievers, should such be the will of his Superiors. It will be well here to quote the letter that he wrote on this subject to Father Mazzini, his director:

"My Father, I know not whether it is through the Spirit of God or through that of pride that I feel impelled to write to your Reverence, to lay before you the desire that I have always had of offering myself to the Rector for the missions among the heathen. From the time of my novitiate I have vowed to obey the Superior pro tempore by undertaking any office, even that of a foreign missionary; and I made this vow with the strong desire and lively hope of realizing it some day or other. This desire is less fervent than it was, it is true; but I am still perfectly ready and willing to carry it into effect, and what is more, this desire has never left me since my novitiate. I know that I am full of faults, but yet I feel a holy envy for those that are more perfect. If I compare what I was with what I am, I find that I have changed for the worse, and this makes me long still more to go and labor among the heathen; for if I were once embarked in an enterprise like that, I should be, as it were, compelled wholly to renounce myself and my own ease and comfort. My favorite maxim is that of St. Augustine, who says, 'O happy necessity that forces us to amend!' Now as I know that if I were sent on a mission among the heathen I should be almost forced to do good, to suffer, nay, perhaps even to die for Jesus Christ; I feel the greatest desire for it. It is true that I suffer much from sea-sickness, and that I might perhaps die on the voyage; but I should not therefore hesitate to set out, let the consequences be what they may. My Father, I resign myself to you," etc.

He succeeded in obtaining permission from his director to make this request, and he afterwards most earnestly besought me to grant his petition, imploring it as the greatest favor I could possibly grant him.

Father Paul was a truly indefatigable missionary, and spared no pains, especially in the laborious office of hearing confessions. Yet it must not be imagined that this was an easy duty to him; on the contrary, it caused him the greatest anxiety, as he was always afraid of having been guilty of some negligence regarding it. Hence it arose that this employment was a positive martyrdom to him, and the state of excessive weakness into which he sometimes fell during its administration was a plain proof of what he then endured. This, however, only enhances our admiration for the immense zeal and ardor of Father Paul. In the morning he was the first to enter the church, and in the evening he was the last to leave it, as he spent the whole day in hearing confessions, generally those of men, which are usually the most embarrassing and tedious. When he returned home in the evening after the sermon, he entered the confessional again without allowing himself a single interval of rest, and when he had attended to the penitents around him, he left his room to see whether there was any one else that would like to go to him, although every confession was a source of torture to him. Once when he went on a mission without an alarm-clock Paul used to keep awake for several hours every night in order to be able to awaken his companions at the appointed time; during which he would arise from time to time without shoes or stockings to go to see what o'clock it was. On another mission he preached and heard confessions, although suffering from an attack of fever.

In fact, his labors in the work of the missions during winter and spring were quite incessant. While he was at home, he spent the day in giving the spiritual exercises to the ecclesiastics and seculars that asked for them; indeed, he never shrunk from any fatigue or inconvenience that he met with in the service of souls. One day when he was at the house at Nocera, he heard that a man had just been mortally wounded; he immediately flew to his assistance, without waiting to put on his cloak, hat, or shoes; and in order that he might go still quicker, he even took off his slippers, and carried them in his hand till he reached the sick man.

When he was in the pulpit he preached with admirable zeal and energy. Every one owned that his sermons produced an extraordinary effect, quite different from that which followed those of other preachers. Even in the conferences that he delivered to us in Chapter, which takes place once a week among us, his words seemed like burning arrows that pierced our inmost souls, for he uttered them with an energy so penetrating, that we felt that they sprang from the depths of his own heart, and above all, when he spoke of eternity he caused all that heard him to tremble.

This burning zeal, as that of Paul may be aptly designated, caused him to write the ardent Letters that he sent to divers subjects whose skill in gaining souls for God was well known to him; in them he urged these persons to redouble their pains and labor in this holy work. One of the fruits of his zeal was manifested in the abundance of prayers that he addressed to God when a bishopric became vacant, and in the active measures that he took in order to cause the election to fall on a good prelate. It was only to his zealous efforts that the elevation of one worthy prelate to the episcopate must be attributed, who is still alive, and who governs his church with a solicitude that is most advantageous to the souls of his people.

VI. HIS LOVE OF MENTAL PRAYER AND HIS INTERIOR TRIALS

While Father Paul was thus laboring for the good of souls, he devoted as much time as possible to the exercise of mental prayer. The love of meditation indeed was his strongest passion, or rather it was his greatest delight.

From his earliest years, and especially after he had become a cleric, he set apart several hours a day for this purpose; in the afternoon, he always spent two hours in prayer before the Blessed Sacrament; sometimes he was kneeling, sometimes he was seated, but he always preserved an air of so great devotion, that the faithful used to say to one another, "Let us go and see the saint. He also made frequent visits to the cemetery, where he used to stay for a long time meditating on death and eternity.

Alter he entered our Congregation he used to make two meditations in church before the Blessed Sacrament, besides that of an hour and a half, which is prescribed by the rule, and he also made another one of half an hour in his own room before going to bed. He would have liked to prolong this exercise through the night but the Superiors would not permit him to do so. Besides this, we used often to find him kneeling in his room engaged in meditation through the day; and it was also noticed that when he went out to walk in the wood, as he sometimes did, he retreated behind a tree and knelt down in prayer. He spent every spare moment, when he was on missions, before the Blessed Sacrament, or else he used to recollect himself wherever he might be, saying, "God is everywhere."

He made his preparation for his sermons on his knees; thus this time was also to him a time of prayer, and it was for this reason that his sermons made such an impression as they did, for they were the fruit of his own meditations. I also think that the reason why his discourses so often turned on death and eternity was because they were the ordinary topics on which he himself meditated. I have already mentioned how much he liked to visit the burying-ground. One day when he was speaking on this subject to a nun who admired his firmness in remaining in such a place, he said, "I should like to spend all the days of my life there." When he was a parish priest, every evening after his studies were over he made an hour's meditation on death, in concert with a worthy priest who lived with him, during which they used each to place themselves in a corner of the room in the attitude of corpses. "O death! O eternity!" were words which were continually on the lips of this servant of God, whether he were alone or with others. When he was engaged in conversation he would often say to one of his companions, "Tell me how you would feel were death at hand? He often spoke of death and eternity in his letters to his penitents and friends. In one he said, "Earthly things will soon be at an end, and will avail nothing for all eternity." In another, "Let us think of eternity, for time is short." In a third, "We must arm ourselves with the buckler of faith, which is the thought of eternity. Let us reflect that all here below will soon be at an end, but that eternity will never end. Let us remember that it is better for us to be one of God's meanest servants, than to possess the most exalted worldly dignity. Think of what on your death-bed you would wish to have done during life." His most powerful discourses were those in which he spoke of death and eternity, and they were his favorite topics. When he was a parish priest, he used to conduct the faithful to the cemetery from time to time, when he would take the bones of the dead in his hand whilst he was preaching, thus striving to impress them with the fear of death, that he might the better instil into them a contempt for the world and the thought of eternity. Indeed, almost every one of his public discourses contained some reflections on death and eternity.

But we must now return to the subject of his meditations. Except while he was very young, when Paul experienced nothing but sweetness in prayer, he exercised it without any sensible consolation, although he received great lights in it during his after years, especially with regard to the majesty of God, on which he once composed a sermon that filled all that heard it with astonishment. During meditation he spent nearly all the time in saying prayers that he counted on his rosary, repeating almost always these words, " Lord, deliver me from sin, and make me holy," or else, "My God, come to my assistance, come quickly: 'Deus in adjutorium meum intende,' " etc. He used also to recommend this method of praying to others: "Without prayer and humility," he wrote to one of his penitents, "man cannot preserve either favor or grace. Humility! humility! Prayer, prayer without ceasing! let these be our watchwords, lie that prays obtains. We must therefore pray without ceasing. Ask continually for alms at the gate of divine mercy; let at least an hour a day be consecrated to asking spiritual favors from God." On another occasion, when writing to the same individual, he said, "Meditation is necessary, and without it we shall never be where we desire to be, and where we should be with meditation. I entreat you to pray unceasingly. It is the first, the second, the third, and the last method of vanquishing our enemies."

He often felt such interior desolation, that He felt as if he were so sinful that God had abandoned him, and began to weep; and when he recalled to mind his former transports of love towards God, he would tearfully and sorrowfully exclaim, "Lord, there was once a time when I loved Thee, but now I love Thee not!" One of us once asked whether he had ever felt joy in contemplation. "I once enjoyed it," he replied, "but I have lost all pleasure in it now." Yet it often happened that when any one wished to speak to him while he was engaged in meditation, it was necessary to shake him several t imes in order to arouse him enough to make him hear what was said to him. But from the time of his youth, as we have already said, God treated him as a strong soul, and reduced him to a state of entire suffering, so that the whole course of his life from that period was an uninterrupted succession of aridities, temptations, and terrors.

However, he rejoiced in the superior part of his nature, and desired that God would always deal with him thus, as he well knew that the love of God does not consist in sweetnesses, but in the accomplishment of the divine will amidst tribulations, as St. Teresa said, and as he himself was constantly repeating to his penitents. To one of them, amongst others, he wrote as follows: "Only souls that are enlightened by special grace can comprehend the value of a cross that is borne for God, but in the next world all will clearly see that this grace is preferable to the possession of the whole world. Let us then pray God to give us strength to suffer, for otherwise our weak nature will sink by the way; meanwhile let us maintain a lively faith in eternal life." He wrote to the same person on another occasion: "Saints are formed by crosses, and not by meditations. We see a great many people that practise meditation without becoming saints, because they have nothing to suffer, whilst others that are in the midst of tribulations become so although they can meditate but little. The chief benefit of meditation is, that it gives us strength to suffer, and thus to please God. Patience then is the way to heaven, and we obtain it by meditation." He also said, in writing to a Father of our Congregation. "Your letter tells me of your pains as well as of your consolations; both of your trials and of your consolations. I wish your Reverence loved tribulation more than pleasure; crosses are indeed precious treasures, for they were sanctified by the death of Jesus Christ on the cross; we should, therefore, desire that our crosses may be multiplied every day until we at last die nailed to the cross with our Blessed Redeemer."

Thus highly, then, did our Father Paul esteem and love the cross; and he wished others to do the same, but he could not be insensible to the thorns with which his path was thickly strewed, nor to the terrors that tormented him without cessation. In his latter years especially he had to endure the most cruel temptations that can be inflicted on the soul that knows and loves God. The secrecy by which I am bound forbids my disclosing its nature; were I able to reveal it, it would fill the hardest heart with tenderness. I have no hesitation in saying that his sufferings during these latter years were as intense as any that were ever endured by any martyr of Jesus Christ. He was in such a state of desolation and terror, that he was afraid that God had abandoned him, and he used to sigh and exclaim in the bitterness of his heart, "Alas! I have lost the right way, and I do not know what will become of me!" In writing to one of our Fathers, who was so ill as to be given over by the physicians, and who had asked him to pray to God to grant him a happy death, he said, "Would that I had as well-grounded hope as that of your Reverence! the great work of my salvation is in a most hazardous position, and for this reason I entreat you to intercede for me when you are in the presence of God." In writing to another Father, he said, "I entreat you to recommend me to Jesus Christ, for I labor in uncertainty (laboro quasi in incertum), and none but God can know the state of my conscience." In another letter to the same Father, he said, "If your Reverence had to endure my sorrows, it would assuredly banish all joy from your heart, but may you continue to possess happiness, and leave me to groan under my misery. Yet have pity on me, at least you who are my friends, for the hand of God has afflicted me,—Miseremini mei, saltem vos amici mei, manus Domini tetigit me. Now you will ask in what manner God has struck me, and I will tell you. He has afflicted me by withdrawing his mercy and support from me, as a punishment for my infidelities. You will say, Oh! what humility! but I reply that it is an incontestable truth; therefore, pray to God for me."

His love for meditation also caused him to love silence and solitude, which are its inseparable preservatives and companions. Even whilst he was a parish priest, and whilst he was really absorbed by the anxiety and pains that he endured for the salvation of souls, he used to retire into remote and lonely places from time to time, to hold converse with God in meditation and in penitential exercises. It was this that caused Father Paul to have such a predilection for our house at Iliceto, which is situated on one of the mountains of la Pouille. He used often to retire into a little grotto below the monastery, called the Grotto of the Blessed Felix, to meditate, or else he would plunge into an adjacent wood, where he felt as if he had met with a solitude like that of the first hermits. He thus expressed himself regarding it in a letter to a priest who was his great friend: "When I am in our new house of our Lady of Consolation at Iliceto," said he, "I feel as if I were enjoying the solitude possessed by the solitaries of Egypt. We retire here after the missions that we give in winter and spring, and enjoy so great tranquillity and solitude, and are so removed from the tumult of the world, that we never hear anything about what takes place in it. We live apart from all converse with men in the midst of a wood, where the air is pure and the view agreeable, so that it may really rival the rocky cave of St. Peter of Alcantara. Blessed be God for having brought me hither! yet I have to mourn over my ingratitude in working out my sanctification so tardily. But I still hope by God's grace to effect it some day." This love of solitude caused him to take delight in studying the lives of the hermit saints. Later on he went with us to Nocera, and as we were only then building the monastery, our fathers were obliged to lodge in a private house. As it was very small, and a great many people came on business, it was difficult ever to be alone there, lo obviate this, after the exercises in common were at an end, he used to retire into a loft full of straw, where the heat was insupportable, for it was summer; yet this servant of God went there at noon, although that is the hottest part of the day, to seek for a little solitude amid this hot straw, to be able to converse without interruption with God.

VII. HIS LOVE OF OBEDIENCE

Father Paul was no less attached to the virtue of obedience, both with reference to the Rule and also in regard to the orders of the Superiors. He gave the most perfect example of implicit obedience even to the most unimportant rules, and during the whole period of his sojourn in the Congregation, no one ever detected him guilty of the slightest infringement of them. One day when he arrived at the monastery of the Blessed Trinity, in the territory of Ciorani, thoroughly wet, he was recommended to go to dry himself in the kitchen; he replied, "No, that would be contrary to the Rule, as it is now silence-time." Our deceased Father Cæsar Sportelli, who was also a great observer of the Rule, said one day when speaking of Father Paul, "I always knew that Father Paul was a most mortified man; but I now perceive that he is also a rigid observer of the Rule." He not only loved regularity himself, but he was equally desirous to see it loved by all our brethren. He could not bear to see any one break the Rule in any respect, and so the strict observance of every regulation was always to be found wherever he was the Superior.

Father Paul was equally attentive in obeying the least sign from his Superiors. He manifested perfect submission to his parents from his very infancy, and his mother asserted that he had never offended or distressed her in any respect. He made a vow of entire obedience to his confessor in his youth, and it was in order to be able to resign his own will to that of others that he entered our Congregation. He said to a nun, on taking leave of a convent of which he had been the confessor, "God calls me to live under obedience." For this reason he used to say that the holiness practised in the Congregation was worth more than that in the world. He expressed this sentiment when writing to Father Francis Margotta the priest, who was then thinking of joining us; this he afterwards did: "I write to your Reverence on bended knees, on account of the respect with which your holy resolution of retiring into our Congregation has inspired me. I cannot tell you what pleasure it has afforded me. Blessed forever be Jesus Christ, who has given your Reverence the courage to bid a last adieu to the world to give yourself wholly to God. Until now Father Francis Margotta has appeared to me to be a saint, but he has been so in his own way. At present, however, I see that he wishes to become a true saint, according to the will of Jesus Christ. We are all expecting you: make haste and come to us."

His esteem and love for obedience were so great, that when he received a letter from the Rector Major, he read it on his knees and answered it in the same manner. He also used to carry about with him the circulars that the Superior sent to the houses every year, and that contained several minute regulations for the good government of the Congregation, and he often read these letters over in order that he might punctually observe all that they enjoined. Thus when any question arose amongst his companions as to what should be done in certain cases, he cleared up their difficulties by reminding them of some decision given by the Superior under similar circumstances.

One year, one of the Superiors ordered him not to assist at the meditation that we make in common in the evening, and to employ the time in preparing the theological treatises that he was to explain to our students. Notwithstanding his love for meditation, Father Paul obeyed without objection or uneasiness. On another occasion the Superior ordered him to give all his instruments of penance to one of our lay-brothers; this obedience cost him much, but he instantly obeyed, and without a word of complaint.

I will now relate another instance of obedience, and one that was still more painful to him, on account of the wound it inflicted on his humility. When he was at Nocera, we had a large picture painted, which is now to be seen at the entrance of this house, representing our Father Mgr. Falcoia, who was the bishop of Castellamare, and the first director of our Congregation, in the act of giving our Fathers the rules that he had drawn up. The Rector of Nocera wished Father Paul to be included amongst the personages therein represented, and ordered the painter skilfully to portray his features whilst he was looking on; he then sent for him, and in order that his humility might not be pained, he merely told him to stand there for some time, whilst the painting was being done, that he might be able to suggest any requisite alterations. Father Paul assented; but he probably suspected the real object in view, for he kept changing from one position to another, and turning his head about, first on one side and then on another, so that the painter declared that he could do nothing. Upon this the Superior openly said to Feather Paul, " Go and sit down and remain motionless, for we wish to have your picture taken, and do so without objecting." As the poor Father was thus bound down by obedience he sat perfectly still on his chair, but his heated countenance plainly showed the torture that his modesty had to endure during the process. When the portrait was done, he exclaimed, addressing the Superior, "Ah! God has justly punished me! Some days ago I gave a sharp rebuke to a priest that had had his likeness taken, and now God has so ordered matters that I have been obliged to have it done myself."

He was no less obedient to his spiritual Father, and he never did anything without his permission, as we shall see when we begin to speak of his interior mortification. One day while he was suffering great interior desolation, he went to his confessor and took out of his pocket a paper on which he had written down his sins preparatory to making a general confession; but no sooner did his confessor tell him to leave it alone, than he tore the memorandum and became tranquil.

VIII. HIS HUMILITY

We must now speak of the profound humility which Father Paul preserved throughout his life. This virtue was, as it were, the very apple of his eye; it was the ordinary subject of his meditations, and he constantly offered up this prayer to God, Humilem fieri, igne flagrari, in sanctum cito converti pati, et contemni pro te (O Lord, make me humble, give me grace to burn with the fire of divine love, to become soon a saint, to suffer and to be despised for Thee). And he used to repeat the words, pati et contemni pro te (to suffer and to be despised for Thee), over and over again with all possible fervor. He often conversed with his brethren on humility, and when he spoke on this subject his words were so full of ardor that he seemed to be carried out of himself.

See what he said about this virtue when writing to one of his disciples: "You may rest assurer! that you are in a state of grace. As to the consolations you experience, nec laudo, nec vitupero (I neither praise nor blame them), and as to the desire for martyrdom, it may be good if it does not proceed from the devil, who often seeks to make us entertain some secret complacency and vainglory by his suggestions. Your sensitiveness when neglected seems to me to proceed from self-love, which is not entirely dead within you."

In a letter to another of his friends, he said, "Without humility, man cannot continue to preserve the grace of God in his soul; I therefore earnestly recommend you to cultivate this virtue. I wish you to picture to yourself your place in hell, if you feel that you have ever done anything to merit it, and the abyss of the misery of your sins, if you have committed any. Let us strive to become saints rather than philosophers; let us determine to conquer or die."

He also wrote as follows to one of our Fathers: "The meditation of a soul under desolation should consist in patience, resignation, and prayer. If she cannot be recollected in God, let her at least be so in herself, that is to say, in her own misery, which is always an incentive to recollection of mind."

As for himself, he believed that he was the most unworthy of all, and after his death a number of self-accusations were found among his spiritual memoranda. He used often to accuse himself of his faults in public when he was Superior, and he placed some of the other Fathers under obedience to accuse him of all the faults that they might see him commit, and to humble him without scruple. Once when he was minister in a house, he begged the zelator publicly to accuse him of his faults in the middle of the refectory, and after he had done so, he thanked him for it with much gratitude.

But while Father Paul spoke and acted thus, he did not resemble those that loudly proclaim that they deserve the contempt of the whole world, and yet shrink from the least offensive word, or the slightest instance of neglect. He not only did not complain when he was despised, but he rejoiced interiorly. I will now give a beautiful instance of his humility. We have already said that his discourses were generally sought after, for he spoke with so much zeal that he filled the hardest hearts with compunction. Once, however, when his Superior sent him to a place in the territory of la Pouille, his first sermon was so much disliked by the inhabitants that they sent him away again; yet he returned full of peace and even satisfaction at having received so palpable an affront. On another occasion (in my presence), a religious, who is now dead, was conversing with him upon some theological question. The religious not only differed with Father Paul in opinion, but treated him as one quite ignorant of what he was saying, so that when he came to himself, he went and asked his pardon; but Father Paul did nothing but admire the humility of this Father, and said, "What humility! the idea of coming to beg my pardon for a hasty word!"

His favorite book was the Hidden Life, and he said that he did not think it could be surpassed by any spiritual book. During one of his illnesses, although his strength was quite prostrated by fever, he read it over five times. His love for the hidden life made him say, "If I had ever been unjustly accused of the greatest crimes, and afterwards degraded and publicly punished with ignominy, I might then be able to do something for God." Thus would Father Paul reveal the secret desires of his heart, although he did so unconsciously. Nothing pained him so much as to hear himself praised. One day some one said to him, "My Father, you are a saint." But his face became glowing as a burning coal, and he replied with much agitation, "What sort of a saint, what sort of a saint!" He was always seeking to mortify himself at his meals, but when he was discovered he hastened to conceal his mortification. Once when he was preaching at Cava before Mgr. de Liguori, the bishop, who had been, and indeed still was, an excellent preacher himself, he received high eulogiums from him, but in another sermon that he delivered before the same prelate he spoke incoherently and confusedly, in order to lessen the reputation he had gained by the first; he even went so far as to pretend to be quite perplexed or to have lost his memory, and stopped short in the middle of the sermon, but every one saw that he had done it on purpose to efface the memory of the praises he had before received.

Before his death, that is to say, during his last sickness, which continued for thirteen days, this servant of God spoke so little that his words might have been counted, and we imagine that he acted thus through a humble fear that his last words might be treasured up as is usual in regard to great servants of God.

IX. HIS MORTIFICATION

He was also always most careful to practise interior and exterior mortification.

His efforts to overcome all his inclinations were incessant, and formed one of his chief resolutions during the spiritual exercises, as we find by reference to his notes, but as these acts were interior, we know little of their nature or extent. They are fully known only to God, and we trust that he is now enjoying their reward in heaven.

As for exterior mortification, we have already said that he began to practise it in the most rigorous manner from his very childhood; he even made a vow to abstain from meat. In order to mortify himself still further he confined himself to one meal a day, and it was so slight that he sometimes felt his strength quite prostrated in consequence; when he was with us he used to speak of such acts as instances of the indiscretion and folly of a thoughtless young man.

When he was a parish priest his meal often consisted only of a morsel of bread and a glass of water, which he used to take in a corner of the church. His sleep never exceeded four or five hours at this period, and he went to rest in his clothes.

When he entered the Congregation, he used indeed to take two meals a day, in order not to offend against obedience and to avoid singularity; but he might be said even then to keep a continual fast, for he took only a few ounces of nourishment in the evening, and ate so little in the middle of the day, that he generally arose from the table half famished with hunger; so that his Superiors at last ordered him to take more at a time. He used also often to mingle bitter herbs, and sometimes even the peel of decayed oranges, with what he did take. In order to mortify his thirst during dinner, for he never drank anything at other times, he only took small quantities at once.

He always carefully abstained from all amusements while he was in the world, indeed he was never known to enter into the least earthly gratification. He never went to plays, games, public walks, or field sports. At Cava, his birth-place, his family possess the shooting ground for ring-doves, and this sport is carried on every year there, and is a great amusement for the children; but Father Paul never took part in it. One year when he was the Superior of our house of St. Mary of Consolation at Iliceto, which is an extremely cold place, he took care that all the Fathers should be provided with warm clothing in winter, but said nothing about himself, so that the tailor forgot to make any for him, and he went through all this rigorous season with nothing but his cassock and shirt without the least complaint. When he was travelling it often happened that night came on while he was at a distance from any of our houses, and as he was always careful to lose no opportunity of mortification, he used to avoid going to our friends on such occasions, for fear of the hospitable reception they would give him; he used therefore to go to inns instead, where he was often obliged to lie down either on straw or even on the bare ground.

He made a vow of obedience to his confessor while he was in the world, and as he was fond of exterior mortification, Father Paul readily induced him to consent to all that his fervor inspired him to ask; and all that his director permitted regarding mortification and meditation, he executed most punctually as a rigorous obligation to which he was bound by vow. Disciplines to blood were common with him, and for this purpose he used sometimes to use bunches of thorns, which he had gathered in the fields, but he generally scourged himself with a thick cane filled with lead and covered with large long iron spikes, which not only pierced the flesh but penetrated far deeper. He also afflicted his body by binding his arms and legs with large chains armed with points, and he used to wear them even while he was preaching and hearing confessions; but his Superior once perceived them during a mission, and took them away from him, and gave them into the charge of a lay-brother. It was also noticed that when he went to walk in the woods of Iliceto during recreation, he used to strike his hands on the thorns every now and then in order to mortify himself.

To sum up, Father Paul never had any amusement or relief whatsoever; his whole life and constant study were spent in crucifying his inclinations, in refusing himself every pleasure, and in afflicting himself by every possible penance. He was often heard to repeat, We must fight in order to become saints; we must be always fighting, always striving to mortify ourselves in everything, in eating and drinking, in sleep, in our method of sitting, and in short, we must be mortified in all things." This is a beautiful, for it is a saintly maxim; but how rarely is it put in practice, unless indeed by those that have entirely consecrated themselves to God.

X. HIS SPIRIT OF POVERTY

Father Paul was also a great lover of poverty. Even while he was in the world he made a vow to his confessor, by which he bound himself never to have more than five carlins in his possession at once, and those he only kept that he might be able to bestow them on the poor, whose wants it was his duty to relieve, as he was a parish priest at the time. His clothes were so shabby, that once when his brother met him looking as ragged as any beggar, he treated him as a madman, and loaded him with reproaches in the public street.

After he had entered our Congregation, in which the vow of poverty is one of those we take, he always observed it most zealously. When he was Superior he was very rigorous on this subject, and never forgave any member of the Congregation that was guilty of the least offence against religious poverty. Me even carried its observance to excess, which was contrary to true economy, for he would not allow of any store of provisions, saying, "Poor people never lay in stores;" and he was the first to set an example of this rigorous poverty, by always putting it in practice himself. In his note-book he had written, "I should be much more afraid of being rich than of being poor; I wish to love poverty more than men of the world love riches." And in order to carry this resolution into effect, he never even made use of scissors, needles, thread, ink, paper, or of any other such little necessaries, without the permission of the Superiors.

When he was Superior on the missions, he always chose the worst horse, the worst bed, and the most inconvenient confessional tor himself. It is the custom in our Congregation for even the priests to take it in turn to wash the dishes on certain days in the week, as an exercise of humility. The other Fathers used to make use of soap or bran afterwards, in order to clean their hands, but he only employed cinders, saying that it would be contrary to holy poverty to use anything else. Our Fathers are allowed to carry some book of piety about with them, such as the New Testament, the Imitation, the Visits to the Blessed Sacrament, and others of the same kind, with the consent of the Superior; they also keep some devotional pictures in their breviary or on their table. But Father Paul would have nothing of the kind, and when our Fathers told him that there was no offence against poverty in so doing, he replied that his motto was, "Nothing, nothing, nothing." During his last illness, and when he had lost his speech, he perceived that a silver watch was hanging in his room, and as he could not speak, he made a sign to have it taken away, as a thing contrary to poverty, but the Father Minister told him that it served to regulate the administration of his remedies, which set his mind at rest.

XI. HIS DETACHMENT IN REGARD TO HIS RELATIVES AND HIS CHARITY TOWARDS HIS NEIGHBOR

He was as detached from his relatives as he was from the goods of this world. When he was at our house of the Holy Trinity, in the territory of Ciorani, his mother asked him to obtain permission for her to go to see him, for she had not done so for many years; but he sent her a message by a priest, telling her to let the matter alone, for her wishes only proceeded from earthly affection. The mother renewed her entreaties, protesting that she wished to have the consolation of visiting him before she died, both for the sake of seeing him and also that she might be able to give him her last blessing. Father Paul again replied that it was unnecessary, and that she could give him her blessing where she was, as it would be as valuable at a distance as near at hand. On another occasion, when he heard that his sister was seriously ill and in great suffering, he positively refused to go to see her, and contented himself with replying, "I wish that her pains may become still greater, that she may thus be more conformed to the suffering life of Jesus Christ."

Although Father Paul was so austere with regard to himself and to his relatives, he was as charitable and considerate as possible towards all others. He strove to comfort and relieve those that were oppressed by temptations or other trials; and although his natural disposition was severe, charity rendered him mild and affable to all, especially to those that came to confess their sins to him. He was in the habit of visiting the prisons at Cava and at Salerno before he entered the Congregation; he began by preaching to the poor prisoners; he then heard their confessions; after which he distributed a basket full of bread amongst them, and gave them each a carlin. There was a nun that experienced great distress of conscience, who applied to Father Paul while he was a parish priest. He attended to her with the most painstaking diligence for eight days consecutively; this happened during the octave of Corpus Christi, and as the nights are very short at this season, and as the servant of God wished to arrive at his church in time to attend to his parish and people, he went to this religious before daybreak. This fact has become known through the testimony of the religious herself.

When he was Superior amongst us he was always trying to relieve the wants of others, and specially of those that were ill; and not satisfied with recommending them to the care of the infirmarians, he often waited on them himself. One day when he saw that one of those that were sick had rather an uncomfortable bed, he immediately gave him his own. During the hours of rest he used to walk about the corridors of the monastery on his toes, to avoid disturbing those that were in their rooms.

XII. HIS PURITY

As for the virtue of purity, he preserved it with the utmost vigilance, and watched over all concerning it with the most scrupulous attention, and as far as we can tell, Father Paul never sullied his saintly soul by the foul stain of impurity throughout his life. He had a horror of this vice from his earliest youth, and could not even bear to hear it spoken of. Once when he was very young, he was going to school with another child that was related to him; but upon his uttering an indecent expression, Paul blushed, and ran off, leaving him behind. On another occasion when this same companion repeated the same word in his presence, he could not help giving him a blow, and from that time he resolved never to be in company with this relative again, nor with any other boy that might resemble him, and he carefully carried his purpose into effect.

With still greater reason was he always most reserved in his intercourse with women. He never looked at them, and he never spoke to the oldest woman without casting his eyes down; but as he was afraid that his eyes might some day betray him into evil, he prayed to God to weaken his sight, and God granted his petition. He was so careful on this point even with regard to his mother and sisters, that they complained that he had never even once looked at them.

When this servant of God was on missions, he generally began by hearing the confessions of men, and it was only when he had heard them all that he made up his mind to listen to those of women, in order not to remain idle. When he was obliged to converse with them on any indispensable business, he rigorously followed the advice of St. Augustine: Cum feminis sermo brevis et rigidus (With women let conversation be short and rigid), and he sent them away as quickly as he could, and with all possible gravity. If he had to give the spiritual exercises in a convent, he remained in the confessional in the morning and afternoon; but he never revisited them when the retreat was over, unless in cases of absolute necessity, however pressingly he might be asked to do so by the religious, for fear of contracting any attachment to them.

To purity of body he also united that of soul. He owned to the parish priest that succeeded him that he was not certain of ever having committed a mortal sin during his whole life, adding that he only feared that he might have done so; but fears such as these are the scruples of saints who are afraid even when there is no cause for apprehension. Father Balthasar Alvarez said that mortal sin is so horrible a monster, that it cannot enter a soul that loves God, without making itself clearly known; hence theologians are unanimous in concluding that when a timorous person is only in doubt, and is not sure of having lost the grace of God, it is certain that he has not done so. As for our Father Paul, although he affirmed that he had doubts on the subject, the priest who heard his last general confession on his death-bed affirmed without hesitation that the servant of God had passed into another life without having lost baptismal innocence.

XIII. HIS DEVOTION TO THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST AND TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN

Father Paul had also great devotion towards the Passion of Jesus Christ. One day when he was preaching on that subject, his countenance became so inflamed and radiant, that it seemed as if a seraph were in the pulpit. Another time, in the territory of Oliveto, when he was preaching on the love of Jesus Christ, in presence of the Blessed Sacrament, he remained silent and motionless in an ecstasy for a long time in the sight of all his hearers; this affected them more than the finest discourse could have done.

He was no less devout towards the Blessed Virgin. He had cherished a tender affection for this divine Mother from his infancy, and this tenderness used to be plainly manifested in all his sermons, and to those that went to confession to him. His great delight when he was dying consisted in fixing his eyes on a picture of Blessed Mary that was placed beside him. His last illness took place during the Novena of the Assumption. While he was ill, Father Paul one day said, "If I do not die before the 15th of August, I shall not die now." He spoke thus because he had a confident hope that if he were to die, our Blessed Lady would grant that his death might happen during this novena, and he was not disappointed of this expectation.

XIV. HIS CONSTANCY IN HIS RESOLUTIONS AND HIS CONFORMITY TO THE GOOD PLEASURE OF GOD

But amongst all the admirable virtues of Father Paul, the most striking was his perseverance in goodness. He used also to strive to inculcate it on all with whom he held any intercourse. "Constancy in good resolutions," said he. Constancy was indeed, as it were, his watchword, and the firm and unwearied energy with which he carried out his resolution of always aiming at the greatest perfection, and of doing what was most pleasing to God, was truly wonderful.

During the whole time this good Father lived with us no one ever perceived the least voluntary fault in him, or the slightest appearance of tepidity. What rendered this most remarkable was, that he preserved this constancy during the severe aridity of mind with which he was tried for the last six years of his life, when no spiritual relief, no ray of consolation, was afforded him to soften the pain of this grievous martyrdom. There are some men in the present day that boast of having very strong minds, because they despise the truths and maxims of the faith, which they call the prejudices of the feeble-minded. With far greater justice may we say that Father Paul was a man of a strong mind, for he courageously persevered in his good resolutions, and unceasingly did he advance in the love of God; he never slackened in his fervor, for he was always striving to attain the greatest sanctity that it is possible for a man to acquire.

One of our Fathers, who was a man of great virtue and discernment, said that if he had to depict Father Paul, he would represent him on a marble pillar with this inscription: Semper idem (Always the same). His fervor was always the same, he was always equally solicitous in seeking God and his greater glory; he was ever constant in advancing in the practice of virtue without ever making a retrograde step; and he was at all times careful to overcome and mortify himself without ever indulging in the least bodily relaxation whatsoever. For him there were no theatres, feasts, concerts, sports, games, parties, nor any other worldly amusement. In a word, he was always the same, and his actions were always uniform, full of fervor and heroism. For this reason his countenance was always serene, both in prosperity and adversity, because his only passion was that the good pleasure of God might be done. These words were therefore constantly on his lips, and he wrote on a paper that he kept before him on his table that it might always be in his sight, "The adorable will of God." This was his favorite and accustomed topic in preaching, and that by which he most inflamed the hearts of his hearers.

He even declared that he did not wish to become more holy than God willed, but he did not therefore cease always to aim at the highest possible degree of holiness. One day when he was conversing with a religious, the latter said to him that he did not wish to do anything more than was necessary just to secure his salvation; at these words Father Paul stood up, and said with emotion, "O my Father, what do you say? We who are religious ought to be saved as saints and men of perfection." He then brought forward a great many proofs in support of what he had advanced, so that at last the religious said, "Well, I admit that is true, my Father, and I will try to do better in future.

When the servant of God read the Lives of the saints that gave themselves up wholly to God, he shed tears of joy. Nor could Father Paul restrain his tears when a member of our Congregation made his oblation after the year's novitiate by pronouncing the accustomed vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, of renouncement of every dignity or ecclesiastical benefice, and of perseverance in our mode of life. When he met with any one inclined to lead a pious life, he did all he could to induce him to give himself up wholly to God, and to lead him to entire conformity to the divine will. His letters contain admirable passages to this effect. To one of his sisters, who experienced many tribulations, he wrote, "Think of nothing but of offering yourself unreservedly to God; abandon yourself entirely to his divine will, beg him to dispose of you as he pleases, and be assured that the best devotion of all consists in doing the will of God." In writing to one of his penitents, he said, "We must suffer much if we would please God. He asks us for courage, not for tenderness." And when he was conversing with us, it seemed as if he could only speak of striving to please God, and of seeking in all things to do what is most agreeable to him.

XV. HIS DEATH

Such was the life of Father Paul, of which we have here given a slight sketch, and his holy death perfectly corresponded to so virtuous a life. He was Superior of the house of St. Mary Mater Domini, in the territory of Caposele, at the time it took place, and while he was there he often predicted his death even before he became ill. He spoke of nothing but of eternity and Paradise for some months before he died; and he often said to his brothers, "Tell me, what do they do in Paradise?" On one occasion he positively said, "I shall die this year." And the event verified these words. On the 5th of August, 1753, when he was still in good health, he spoke still more definitely about his death, and said, "I shall die this month. The fever will come on today. And that very day, after dinner, fever attacked him, and the symptoms were so bad that the doctors despaired of his life on the third day. His illness lasted for eleven days, during which he filled all that approached him with admiration, so great was his calmness, patience, and obedience towards the infirmarian when he administered the prescribed remedies to him. He received all without complaint, and asked for nothing.

We cannot relate anything regarding his sentiments in this last illness; for he said very little during the whole time. We have no doubt that he acted thus through humility. He knew that the last words of those that are looked upon as great servants of God are carefully treasured up; he therefore remained in a state of constant and silent recollection, keeping his eyes constantly fixed on the image of Jesus crucified and of the Blessed Virgin. When his brethren begged him to say some words of edification to them, he did not answer, and he even manifested some displeasure at the request, fearing that even the last words that he had uttered during life might be treasured up after his death. One of our Fathers begged him to order the Community, as their Superior, to pray to God to restore his health, for the welfare of the Congregation. He then spoke, and said, "No, it is expedient for me to die." When I heard that he was so dangerously ill, I sent him an obedience by virtue of my authority as his Rector-Major and Superior, to get well, should such be the good pleasure of God. But when he heard of this command, he raised his hand in silence, thus signifying that his recovery was not the will of God.

He was somewhat tormented by his habitual fears at the beginning of his illness; but after his director had ordered him to have confidence, he became quite calm, and with celestial peace, with eyes fixed on the crucifix, and amidst his weeping brethren, he gave up his pure soul to God at about one o'clock on the 13th of August, 1753, being only forty-seven years of age. We confidently trust that he is now united with his God, whom he strove so much to please, and whom only he sought through his whole life.

When the tolling of the bell announced his death, there was general lamentation among his brethren as well as amongst the strangers that were then in the house. One of his veins was opened before he was buried, and immediately the blood gushed forth. Since his death a great number of the faithful have obtained prodigious favors by means of his relics. These miracles have been carefully registered, and will be published in due time, should it ever please God to cause him to be honored on his altars.

Notes on the Life of Father Januarius Maria SARNELLI of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer

ST. ALPHONSUS wrote this Life in 1752. There is every indication that it was destined to be placed at the head of the works of Father Sarnelli, where it is found in the editions with which we are acquainted. The saint was desirous of keeping it anonymous, but it can easily be recognized from what he omits to say, and from the notes that we append. We shall find more than one trait of resemblance between the life of Father Sarnelli and that of St. Alphonsus himself. Father Tannoia moreover informs us that they were united from their youth by a close friendship, and that before they had entirely left the world they gave themselves up together to pious exercises. It is astonishing how Father Sarnelli, who died at the age of forty-two, could have done so much in a life so short and so full of sufferings; but such is the life of the saints. Cardinal Villecourt also assures us, in 1862, that there was question of introducing the cause of his Beatification. (Vie de S. Alph. 1. 2, ch. 15.)—ED.

NOTES ON THE LIFE OF FATHER JANUARIUS MARIA SARNELLI, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

I. HIS BIRTH, INFANCY, AND YOUTH

FATHER JANUARIUS MARIA SARNELLI was born at Naples, on the 12th of September, 1702. His parents were D. Angelus Sarnelli, baron of Ciorani, and D. Catharine Scoppa. They had eight children, of whom six were boys and two were girls. D. Januarius was their fourth son. D. Andrew, who was the next to him in age, is the secular priest that set on foot at his own expense a house of missionaries[14383] in the territory of Ciorani, who were instituted that they might go about in the diocese of Salerno, and in the neighborhood, laboring for the salvation of the destitute souls in the country.

Father Januarius manifested most pious dispositions from his very infancy; and he was even then remarkable for his angelic modesty, which caused him always to keep his eyes cast down in presence of women, even in that of his sisters and mother. His obedience and submission to his parents were equally exemplary, and when he perceived that he had at all annoyed them, he used instantly to beg for forgiveness, and would kiss their hand or even throw himself at their feet in order to appease them. He evinced the greatest love of mortification from his earliest youth, and even then always abstained from fresh fruit from a spirit of penance. When his parents gave any entertainment, he used at once to leave the house and go to the church of St. Francis Xavier, which was just opposite the house in which they lived. In a word, from all we know regarding his childhood and the whole course of his life, it is easy to infer that he never lost his baptismal innocence.

When he was fourteen, he earnestly begged his father to allow him to leave the world and to enter the Society of Jesus, but as he was so young he would not permit him to do so. From this time, however, Januarius redoubled his fervor in the service of God; he increased the number of his meditations, and led a still more retired life than before. He never conversed with those of his own age, but after he had gone through his studies, his love of solitude caused him to retire into the church, to pray to God before the Blessed Sacrament to enlighten him as to his vocation. After that he would return home, where his conduct towards his parents was a source of great edification to the whole household.

II. HE EMBRACES THE PROFESSION OF THE LAW, THEN THE ECCLESIASTICAL STATE

At an after period, he embraced the profession of the law in obedience to his father, and he succeeded in it in a wonderful manner. Although he was still very young, the management of the revenues and of the rents of the Duke of Cirifalco were soon intrusted to him. But amid these different occupations he never omitted to attend Mass every day, or to make his visit to the Blessed Sacrament and his daily meditation. He had such affection for this exercise, that when he was at liberty he used always to go to the church of St. Francis Xavier, where he would remain in prayer for so long a time, that when any one came to speak to him and he was not at home, the servants, who knew his custom, used generally to reply, "You will be sure to find him if you go to the church of St. Francis Xavier." When he went to his father's estate, the only recreation he took was that of shutting himself up in the parish church, where he would spend half the day in meditation. This was asserted by the priest of the place.

He used also to visit the sick in the hospital of the incurables several times a week, and he said that he received so great lights from God when he was there, that these visits gave him constant food for meditation, and he came away full of consolation, and replenished with the Spirit of God. It was also in this place that God made known to him that he was called by him to leave the world. After consulting with his director on the subject, he immediately resolved to do so, quitting the bar and becoming a priest. As soon as he was ordained he gave up all earthly possessions; he distributed all the money that he had laid by amongst the poor, as well as the clothes that he had worn in the world. He gave himself up unreservedly to God from this time, and spent all his time in prayer, study, and the assistance of his neighbor.

In order to live in still greater solitude, and to give up all connection with the world, he retired into the Congregation of the Holy Family,[14384] or, in other words, into the Chinese College, which is established at Naples. During all the time he stayed among these exemplary priests, his constant occupation was either meditation and study, or else going about the neighborhood teaching the Christian doctrine; he also went several times a week to the hospital, where he would spend as many as six hours consecutively, in teaching, consoling, and attending the poor patients.

About this time he became a member of the Congregation of apostolical Missions,[14385] which was set on foot in the archbishopric of Naples for missionary purposes, in which he labored in a most exemplary and efficacious manner from the moment he entered the priesthood.

III. HE ENTERS THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

Some years afterwards he heard that a Congregation of missionary priests had been recently formed in the town of Scala, under the direction of Mgr. Falcoia, the bishop of Castellamare,[14386] and that they were to devote their time to the service of the destitute country-poor, by means of missions and other spiritual exercises; and as he heard that regular observance of rule was strictly attended to among them, and that besides the simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, a fourth vow and oath of perseverance was taken by its members, he felt a great desire to enter it.

In order, therefore, to satisfy his desire to lead a life of greater perfection, and one in which he would be entirely consecrated to God, and animated by the counsels of Father Manulius, of the Society of Jesus, who died some years ago with a high renown for sanctity, he resolved to enter the new Congregation, and quitted Naples for Scala. He did not, however, lose sight of the Congregation of Apostolical Missions, of which we have already spoken, but continued to support it as far as possible whenever it called upon him for help. He spent the rest of his days in the rising Congregation, in which he edified all his brethren by the constant practice of every virtue, above all, by his mortification, obedience, and charity towards others. It was specially noticed that he was so exact in obeying the sound of the bell, that if he were writing, he arose immediately, and would even leave a letter unfinished. Such was his mode of life while he lived in our house at Scala.

IV. HE IS SENT TO NAPLES

His Superiors afterwards sent him to Naples, both because the air of Scala did not suit his infirm health, and to enable him to continue the great undertakings he had already begun in the capital, especially that of delivering it from women of bad character, as we shall relate more at length hereafter, and it was here that his life terminated.

Although he labored with the most indefatigable zeal in the duties of his own Institute, he did not neglect to assist the brethren of the Congregation of missions from time to time. Although engaged in the laborious enterprise of expelling all abandoned women from Naples, he yet found time to devote himself to the salvation of souls, with such ardor that when Cardinal Spinelli, the present Archbishop of Naples (1752), sent for Father Alphonso de Liguori, the Rector-Major of the said Congregation, to come with his companions, and give missions in the villages of his diocese at his expense, he wished that Father Januarius might be one of the missionaries; and he gave them a permanent abode near the village of St. Iorio, to enable them to go about in the neighborhood more easily. When Father Alphonso was obliged to leave the city on business connected with the affairs of his Congregation, the Cardinal left the whole charge of the missions in the hands of Father Januarius, who thus continued the good work that had been begun by that excellent missionary, Don Matthew Testa, who is at present a most worthy Canon in the capital. Our Father continued to labor in these missions with the utmost success until his blessed death, which took place some years afterwards. This loss not only grieved the very zealous pastor of the town of Naples, but also his own faithful flock; indeed, Januarius was generally regretted, as a great laborer in God's vineyard, and it was everywhere said, and it is still declared, that he alone was worth ten other missionaries.

V. HIS LOVE OF MEDITATION

But before relating his precious death, it will be well to give some brief details regarding his virtues.

He was so fond of meditation, that even when he was a secular, he used to steal time from business to go to pray in some church, but from the time he became a priest, he gave himself up unreservedly to this holy exercise. He used daily to repair to the church of the Cross, for this purpose, where he would shut himself in a little cell behind the sacristy, and remain in prayer from dinner-time until the evening; until he entered the Chinese College, this was his daily practice, except when he went to the hospital.

He received so much celestial light, and felt so holy ardor in meditation, and had such a gift of tears, that he himself owned that he had nearly lost his sight in consequence. The Gospel was the book whence he derived all his light and consolation. "Scarcely had I read a few verses," said he, "ere I was so enlightened by the divine goodness, that I melted into tears, and the world then appeared to me as nothing but smoke."

He was several times seen going up and down the cloisters of the church of the Cross and that of the Holy Ghost, with his arms extended, his eyes raised to heaven, and giving vent to such passionate sighs that several persons that saw him thought he was beside himself. When once told that such actions caused him to be taken for a madman, he replied, "That is very true, for he that does not love God is mad, and I do not love him." On another occasion, when a priest asked him why he did such things, the color mounted to his cheeks, and he confessed to his friend that he did so unconsciously.

From this time he would only speak of God, and listen to conversation about him and the salvation of souls, as I can myself testify; and when he heard people talking on indifferent subjects, it pained him so much that he always strove to turn the conversation on spiritual things, or else tried to steal away if he could do so without giving offence.

VI. HIS PRINCIPAL DEVOTIONS

Our Father Januarius Maria had also a great devotion to the Blessed Trinity, in whose honor he celebrated Mass as often as he could, and tried to inspire every one with a devotion to this mystery. He also published a very pious book to propagate this devotion.

He was also specially devout towards the Passion of Jesus Christ. His room was full of crosses and pictures to remind him of the sufferings of the Incarnate God, and he caused a great many to be made, which he distributed, that they might be placed in the different houses and streets. His devotion was no less great towards the holy sacrifice of the Mass, as we can see by his works, and he never omitted to celebrate it for a single day to the end of his days, although he was several times on the point of fainting at the altar through his infirmities. Once he really did so, yet even then he persisted in finishing it as soon as he recovered, although it cost him a great effort, as he declared that all his hopes were centred in this august mystery. He had so deep a conviction of the love which we owe to our Blessed Saviour, that he said that we should be always preaching to souls in these words, "Love Jesus Christ! love Jesus Christ!"

He had also the greatest devotion towards the Blessed Virgin, and especially towards her Immaculate Conception. In order to spread this devotion, he gave away a great quantity of pictures of her as well as scapulars and rosaries, and his great delight during the recreation established in our Congregation after dinner and supper consisted in making rosaries, images, or scapulars. He had also a special love for the holy name of Mary. Once when he was present at a sermon on the Blessed Sacrament, which was delivered by a most zealous preacher, he was quite satisfied with the discourse, yet it grieved him to think that he had not once pronounced the sweet name of Mary. He therefore humbly entreated him never to omit the name of the Blessed Virgin in his sermons for the future, assuring him that it would add greatly to the benefit they already produced. He was really proud of being called by the names Januarius Maria, and could not help mildly showing some dissatisfaction when he was only addressed by the name of Januarius, without the addition of that of Maria. He begged his friends to unite with him in praising the divine Mother in the month of September, as he said she always granted him all the favors that he asked for during this month. Before he went to bed, he was in the habit of winding his rosary round his arm to remind him of his divine Mother during the night, and he told one of his confidential friends, that in his greatest trials and combats with the powers of darkness he was always quite fortified when he held his rosary in his hands. He preached on the glories of Mary wherever he went; he recommended devotion to her in all his sermons, and made every exertion to have novenas celebrated in her honor. He even composed a very devotional little book in honor of the Mother of God, entitled The Grandeurs of Mary, which is to be found amongst his spiritual treatises. He had but one cause of regret at the hour of death, namely, that he had been unable to finish his large work on the glories of Mary, of which he had already collected all the materials.

VII. HIS INTERIOR TRIALS

We will here mention that after the great consolations with which God favored him for so many years, he ordained that on a certain feast-day, for which he had prepared with much fervor, his soul should fall into a state of frightful aridity and profound desolation, which lasted throughout the remainder of his life. At his last moments indeed God restored the sense of his grace and presence to his soul, and gave him the favor of dying inflamed with an ardent desire of seeing God.

With the exception of these happy moments, his heart always remained dry and cold, both during meditation and also in his labors for the salvation of souls. It seemed to him as if God had abandoned him, and he left no consolation in any of his spiritual exercises. He also endured the most horrible temptations, especially to infidelity, gluttony, and despair, which caused him to say that he had become quite incapable of occupying himself in the service of God, and that it seemed to him as if these words of the Psalmist were constantly resounding in his ears: Many say to my soul: There is no salvation for him in his God.[I4387] At times he could scarcely breathe, but even then he would sigh, and say these two words, "My God! my God!"

This Look place even during his apostolical labors for the salvation of his neighbor, by which he certainly shortened his life; for notwithstanding his great zeal for the glory of God, all that he did was performed by a great effort, being destitute of consolation and accompanied with extreme repugnance. He was indeed a man of great strength of mind, and full of ardor to spread the glory of God and to do his holy will. The words which were always on his lips, in his heart, and on his pen, were, "The glory of God and the will of God." All that he did was done for God only, and if he sometimes felt tempted to vainglory on seeing the success of the works that he undertook for the glory of God, he used earnestly to pray, and get others to pray, that he might be delivered from this secret satisfaction.

During this bitter privation of all celestial consolation, he always maintained a firm confidence in God, and placed all his trust in the efficacy of prayer. He said that amid the torture that he suffered from temptation and desolation his only strength was in these words of Jesus Christ, If you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[I4388] He declared that if God had given him no other grace than that of prayer, he should be abundantly satisfied, as there are so many great promises attached to that holy exercise. In fact, this confidence in meditation purchased for him all the favors with which God endowed him. By it he triumphed over the many difficulties that he had to contend with in his immense labors for the glory of God; for he had recourse to his own prayers and to those of others on all such occasions, and he was wont to say that he had a secret by which he could be certain of obtaining even more from God than he asked for.

VIII. HIS SPIRIT OF MORTIFICATION AND OF HUMILITY

To meditation he united mortification of the senses. When he was ordained priest he fasted three days in the week on bread and water; his failing health afterwards compelled him to give up this practice; but even then he always abstained from taking fruit except when his Superiors made him do so through obedience. His mother related to one of his confessors, that when there was any delicacy at dinner he never touched it even when a mere child, and he limited himself to such sparing quantities that what he took hardly sufficed for the support of nature.

Although his health was much impaired, he never omitted to use the discipline. Yet he could only have struck on bones, for his penances, sufferings, and labors had reduced him to a mere skeleton. When he could not do anything else, he bore the stings of insects without endeavoring to escape from them, and they often cause greater pain than hair-cloth and disciplines.

He also had so great a wish to be despised for the love of Jesus Christ, that he made a firm resolution never to justify himself before any one when he might be accused of a fault. He prayed for the love of humiliation in all his Masses; and for this end he said the Collect ad petendam humilitatem (for asking humility), as often as he could. He confided to a member of the Congregation that God answered this prayer soon after he began to say it, by sending him a great many opportunities of practising humility, and that he not only granted him grace to bear humiliation with patience, but also with interior gladness. Whenever he received any slight, he thanked God for it, and he confided to the same Father that he was so far from dreading reproach and shame, that he felt an ardent desire to be dragged through the mud in the streets of Naples.

In order to look contemptible, he always wore old and ragged clothes, such as are hawked through the streets by Jews, declaring that he wished to have nothing in common with the world; and when his parents reproached him for thus dishonoring his family by his shabby appearance, he told them not to distress themselves about this, for that if any one asked his name, he would never say that he was the son of the Baron of Sarnelli, but would call himself Father Januarius Maria, as if the former were his Christian name, and the latter his surname.

One day when he entered the church of our Lady of Good Help at Naples to say Mass, the cleric on duty on seeing his ragged attire sent him away most unceremoniously, and would not permit him to celebrate. The Father was afterwards revenged on him, but it was only with the revenge that saints are wont to take on those that injure them; for by his assistance the uncourteous cleric was afterwards enabled to become a priest.

In a word, he lived and died in such poverty, that the priest that assisted at his death procured new clothes in which to bury him, as all his own were worn-out and in rags.

IX. HIS CHARITY TOWARD HIS NEIGHBOR

Our Father Januarius Maria possessed charity towards his neighbor in a heroic degree.

When he was absent from our houses he lived as scantily as he could, ate little, and wore the most wretched clothes, not only to draw down contempt on himself, but also to enable him to have more at his disposal for the poor. He would sometimes even take off his clothes, go without shoes, and deprive himself of the food that was served up to him, that he might bestow them on the indigent. He would often go about Naples collecting the poor together, after which he would conduct them to his own house, where he washed their feet, waited on them, and supplied their wants. To enable him to do this he selected a room midway on the stairs, which was so very dark and out of repair, that one of his friends even saw the mice jumping up and down on his bed. Here, however, he received all the poor that came to him; for had he attempted to do so anywhere else the servants would have sent them away. He did not receive women there, but when any of them wished to speak to him, he went to some church to hear them.

After he entered the Congregation, his greatest happiness consisted in obtaining leave from his Superior to bestow alms on the poor.

He had an incredible affection for the sick in the hospital, and bore any amount of fatigue to assist them in spiritual or temporal necessities. When he was only a secular he went about begging for provisions from his relatives. He collected together as much as he could, after which he arranged it all in baskets with his own hands, and sent it to the hospital. Whenever he went to visit these poor sufferers after he became a priest, he would carry some little luxury in the shape of fruit or sweetmeats or such like, which he concealed under his cloak, and which he had either procured expressly for them, or of which he had deprived himself in order to bestow it on them. He even went the length of having loner earthenware vessels constructed to hold roast meat; and he carried them to the sick by hanging one on each side. He used also to make up and distribute a number of little packets of tobacco among them. He would make their beds for them, and wash their feet; in fact, he never omitted any office of charity that could contribute to their relief.

X. HIS ZEAL FOR THE SALVATION OF SOULS

In all works of spiritual mercy and zeal for the salvation of souls, Father Januarius Maria Sarnelli attained to the most heroic degree of perfection. From the time he left the world to devote himself to God in the ecclesiastical state, he was always studying how he could be most usefully engaged for the salvation of souls; and all his thoughts and words were directed to this one point, even during his familiar conversations during recreation. While others were then seeking for relaxation, he looked preoccupied and sad; and if any one asked him what he was thinking about, he replied, "I am thinking what had better be done to assist the souls whom God died to save." When he spoke of how much the poor require spiritual assistance and priestly instruction, his countenance glowed with zeal, and sometimes even tears of pity would flow from his eyes. He often said that he felt that he had a special call to assist the poor and destitute, and applied these words of the prophet Isaias to himself, He hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor.[14389] He added, that he believed he should be damned if he did not devote all his energies to this purpose, and that it seemed to him as if these words of St. Paul were addressed to himself, Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel.[14390]

While he was at Naples, before he entered the Congregation, he determined to join two other priests in giving missions in the provinces of Calabria and Abruzzi, as he thought these places the most destitute of spiritual aid. The patron saint who was most dear to him was St. John Francis Regis on account of his love for the poor. It was this same predilection that caused him to enter the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, for he knew that it was chiefly instituted for the assistance of the destitute country poor.

He was unceasingly engaged in preaching and hearing confessions whenever his health permitted. After he had been nearly worn out by laboring in church the whole morning during missions, he would take only a bit of bread or a few raisins, which he ate in the sacristy and spent the rest of the day in preaching and in the confessional. Once when he was in the territory of Bracigliano, he bore the fatigues of a mission for two months consecutively without having even a Father to aid him; yet he was in the confessional by daybreak. His only refreshment consisted in a cup of chocolate, which he took very late in the day, then he immediately began to preach and hear confessions, so that he alone heard the confessions of about two thousand people. On another mission, which was given at Villa, in the diocese of Cajazzo, where we had then a house, he labored for five weeks, during which he heard confessions until four o'clock in the afternoon, when he took a little refreshment; he then returned to the pulpit, and after he had done preaching he re-entered the confessional, where he remained until ten at night. His zeal carried him even farther than this: it was several times observed that he passed two days without tasting food when he was particularly occupied about the salvation of certain souls.

Yet he was almost always in bad health. When he was advised to try to become well before undergoing such fatigue, he replied, "If I were only to labor when I am well, I should have done little or nothing, for I see that it is God's will that I should always be in suffering;" and when some one rejoined that if this were the case his life would not last much longer, "Well," said he, "and can there be anything more glorious than to wear out one 's life for God?" It was therefore by a sort of constant miracle that he was able to labor for the salvation of souls without taking any rest, notwithstanding his infirmities and weakness. When he was composing his admirable works on spiritual subjects, he often wrote until midnight, and only ceased writing when overcome by fatigue. Thus, a lay-brother who waited on him at this time used to reply to those that asked what he was doing, "If he is not writing, he must be ill." He said himself that when he had to go through any special undertaking for the good of souls, he almost always felt more suffering and weakness than usual beforehand; but that his strength increased when the time for action arrived. He often began to preach when he was much fitter for his bed; but he felt much better after the sermon than he had felt before.

He preached with so much zeal, and his sermons produced so much effect, that they often led sinners to give public signs of sorrow, and loudly to ask for a confessor. All that attended his missions said, "Let us go and hear the saint. It is a saint that preaches." When he was at Naples, he often went to the church of St. Januarius, beyond the city walls, in spite of the great distance, that he might preach to the old men there; and he used afterwards to say to his brethren at Scala that he was quite distressed to have to abandon this work of charity.

He was also very fond of ministering to the wants of poor children, and used to say that nothing would please him more than to have to teach them the Christian doctrine on all the missions. When he was at Naples he sought out with holy diligence the little children suffering from the ring-worm in order to instruct them, to exhort them to go to confession, and to give them some little treat, and he used to do this with so much charity that they were in the habit of calling him their father, he also went about the public squares of Naples seeking for the little street porters, who are generally very ignorant of their faith. He would then conduct them to his own house, where he taught them the Christian doctrine, prepared them for the sacrament of penance, and gave them something to eat. In order to spare all trouble to the servants, he himself prepared their food, and after he had dismissed the poor little creatures, he went to the kitchen and washed what they had used with his own hands.

We may truly say that our Father Januarius Maria was really fond of the sick in the hospital, for he was almost always there. If he arrived in the morning he did not leave it until noon, or it he reached it after dinner he stayed there until it was nearly eight o clock, and then he only quitted it with regret and a wish to be able to remain longer. I cannot express the charity he exercised towards them, or how tenderly he exhorted them to bear their sufferings with patience, instructed them in the things appertaining to God, and in the proper manner of making a good confession, and before he was himself a priest, he procured good priests to hear their confessions. One day he formed a plan of living in the hospital of the incurables that he might be able to assist these poor creatures with more facility, especially at the hour of death; he even obtained a room for this purpose; but an unexpected difficulty arose that prevented him from carrying out his project. His zeal once nearly caused him to lose his life in the hospital of the galleys, where he used also to administer the comforts of religion to the poor criminals.

XI. HIS ENTERPRISE IN REGARD TO PROSTITUTES

It is well known what this same zeal caused him to undertake at Naples, in order to rescue prostitute women from sin. He went to preach in the parish church of St. Matthew on all feast days, in order to convert these unfortunate beings, and it was through his suggestions that the Congregation of the archdiocese undertook to give the spiritual exercises in this parish every year for the same purpose.

In order to relieve the wants of these poor creatures, he gave them all that he received from home, and even did without necessaries himself to have the more to distribute among them; and he gave a great many of them enough for their livelihood in the shape of a monthly allowance, in order to prevent them from selling their honor and their soul; and not satisfied with relieving those that asked for his aid, he sought for them throughout the town. He placed sixteen of them in asylums, and enabled a great many others to get married. We know that he provided for the subsistence of two of these women for two years, and that he afterwards furnished them with means to enable them to keep house.

As his own income was not sufficient for all this, for he spent from five to six hundred ducats a year in such ways, he went about Naples begging alms for these unfortunate people, and that not only in pious establishments, but in private houses; this he nevertheless did with so much repugnance, that he said he sometimes felt as if he would die of shame, for he had not only to bear the great annoyance of having to pay repeated visits, but he had also to endure reproaches and even insults. He confided to a friend that several persons that had formerly esteemed him highly, and welcomed him courteously, changed so completely when he came to them on this errand, that they then quite shunned him, and sent him away with roughness and incivility.

In striving to realize the plan he had formed of compelling all the women of bad character to leave the town, and take up their abode in some remote quarter, he had to endure inexpressible fatigue and persecution. As he saw that these unhappy creatures did immense harm by being scattered about in all parts of the town, he was convinced that the only method of remedying so great an evil would be to compel them to go to live together out of Naples. The whole town, and God above all, know what labors and expense this project occasioned him, for the furtherance of which he composed several books entitled The Abuses of Prostitution. This undertaking also drew down on him the opposition and reproaches of his friends; for as they looked upon the thing as impossible, they were always striving to make him abandon it, and ridiculing it with bitterness. But his confidence in God was strong and unshaken, although he was alone and devoid of the help of man, and he managed so well with the first ministers of the king, our protector, that he at last had the satisfaction of seeing his desires fulfilled. A decree of nine articles was sent to the Duke of Giovenazzo, the president of the first chamber of the ministry, on the 4th of May, 1758, by virtue of which sentence of banishment was pronounced against all prostitutes, who were thenceforward to live without the town, in places that were allotted to them. This royal mandate was executed with such rigor, that justice seized on the effects of those that would not quit their houses, and all their furniture was thrown out of the window. From thirty to forty prostitutes were thus expelled from Naples; some of them married, others retired into asylums, and the rest either went to the places assigned for them, or fled elsewhere.[14391]

As for our Father Januarius Maria, he several times ran the risk of being assassinated on account of the share he had in their expulsion, and for this reason his parents did all in their power to prevent him from going on with this good work, as they were afraid some fatal accident might be the result both to himself and to all his family; but he declared that he was ready to suffer all, and that he should even think it a great privilege to die in an undertaking that was so glorious to God.

XII. HIS WRITINGS

It was this same zeal for the salvation of souls that supported him in all the labors that he went through in preparing all his works, in which the choice of subjects and the manner in which he treated them clearly prove how much he would have liked to sanctify the whole world, had that been in his power.

Besides the book of which we have already spoken, on the special abuses that the prostitutes of Naples caused to that town, he published another for all the towns and villages of the kingdom, in which he proves that women of bad character are not tolerated in any one of them or in any of the smaller towns, and he sent a copy of this work to all the bishops in the kingdom.

After this he published a book called The World Sanctified. In some respects we may say that this work really has sanctified the world, for it has been the means of extensive good; it has been in almost every one's hands, and spread through several kingdoms as well as that of Naples.

He also put forth a whole work against blasphemy, as he was eager to extirpate this accursed vice from the kingdom, where it is so deeply rooted.

He published, in a work called The World Reformed, a treatise on the respect due to churches, in which the inhabitants of the kingdom are also most wanting.

I will now give a list of several other works which he published to the great profit of souls: a treatise on the obligation of parents to bring up their children properly; another to serve as a guide to souls in the paths of spirituality, entitled Discernment of Spirits; The Ecclesiastic Sanctified, which was written for priests; An Easy Method for all the Exercises of the Missions, which is most useful for missionaries.

The Enlightened Christian cost him the greatest labor, as he himself owned, for he composed it amid all the sufferings of the malady of which he died. To this must be added The Desolate Soul, for the comfort of souls in desolation of spirit; and The Enlightened Soul, which contains some most devotional meditations.

He also published several other little works which are not mentioned here. Death prevented him from finishing several others, which he had already begun to have printed, such as a treatise to excite compassion for the souls in purgatory; another on the methods of appeasing God's anger in public calamities; a selection of pious reflections for every day in the year; a collection of sermons on the Blessed Virgin for every Saturday throughout the year and for all novenas;[14392] and a book of instructions on faith and morals.

Thus all his works were destined to promote the salvation of souls, whom he desired, as he said, to assist even after his death. When he was on the point of death, he said to Canon Sersale, "Canon, I wish to go on preaching until the judgment-day."[14393]

XIII. HIS LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH

We must now give an account of his last illness and of his happy end. Januarius Maria labored for many years, as we have already seen, although he was always ill and oppressed with fever. His last mission was given at Posilipo, during which his sufferings were very great, as he was quite worn out by fatigue and pain. Thence he retired to St. Agnello, where his maladies increased so much that he was obliged to give up all his labors, and was no longer able even to say Mass; this was viewed by all as a sign that his death was at hand, for he had never before abstained from celebrating it. One day he made the most surprising efforts to say it, but he could not succeed, and fainted in the attempt. As the malady grew worse and worse, he went to his brother's house at Naples, where he was ill for a month.

Although his sufferings and weakness continued daily to increase, he never abandoned meditation, and as his interior trials were as great as ever, he tried to obtain consolation by conversing with the servants of God that came to visit him. The doctors advised him to try the air called the saving air, but he was too weak to be moved.

About a fortnight before his death he took to his bed, whence he never rose again. From this time, however, God freed him from the heavy cross of spiritual desolation, and he began to enjoy the greatest peace; every disquieting thought was banished from his mind, and he felt nothing but an ardent desire to be united to God in the mansions of the blessed. Once, when a servant of his father's said that he hoped God would restore his health, he replied, "Oh, if I could exclaim aloud now, my sole cry would be that my only consolation is to think that I am going to die, and you speak to me of recovery!"

He also showed now the extent of his patience and charity, for amid the almost insupportable pains he endured, which caused him to stand in need of constant attendance, he felt the greatest compassion for those that waited on him; and when he required anything he said to the brother whom the Superior of the Congregation had sent to assist him, "Brother, have patience with me for the love of Jesus Christ, for I shall not live much longer."

At this time he made his last will, and as he wished all he had to be employed in alms and other good works, he disposed of all his possessions in favor of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. The sweetmeats that were given for his use he sent to the hospital, to be distributed among the sick. He had also a little tobacco left, and he wished that it should be put up in small packages, to be given to these poor people. Before dying he gave many alms. It was known that his brother had given a certain sum for his funeral and for the celebration of Masses after his death, and as the confessor of the conservatory at Castellamare called to see him, he gave him, to help his establishment, twenty ducats of the aforesaid sum, saying that the rest was sufficient to pay the expenses of his interment.

One day he said to his eldest brother, who did a great deal for him during his life and at his death, "Brother, the time is at hand when I hope I shall be able to make you a fitting return for all that you have done for me."

At this same period the devil appeared to him under the form of an abbé, and tempted him to vainglory, saying, "Don Januarius, your illness has caused general lamentation throughout Naples, on account of the loss that would be sustained by the death of so great a man." Upon this the dying man instantly pronounced the names of Jesus and Mary, and the evil spirit disappeared and returned no more.

One day when Canon Sersale came to visit him, he said that he hoped he might get well. "Dear Canon," he replied, "I was tormented by scruples for a long time, but thanks be to God, I am now free from them I shall therefore die tranquilly and without any disquiet All that I have done has been done from a pure intention of pleasing God. The sacrifice is now complete; do not then speak to me any more of living, for I wish for no other life than the possession of my God."

During his last days he was always repeating devout aspirations; sometimes they were addressed to the Blessed Trinity, when he would say, Benedicta sit sancta Trinitas et individua unitas; confitebimur ei, quia fecit nobiscum misericordiam suam; sometimes either to our Blessed Saviour or his adorable Mother, and he would kiss and embrace their images from time to time. Just before his death he addressed the following affecting words to God, which were carefully noted down by the lay-brother who attended him: "Father, behold the time has come for me to depart hence and to go to my Creator and my Father. O Lord, I sigh for the moment when I shall see Thee face to face, should such be Thy good pleasure; for I wish neither for death nor for life. I wish only for what Thou wiliest. Thou knowest that all my actions and all my thoughts have been only for Thy greater glory." Words such as these in the mouth of a dying man, on the point of appearing before God, are sufficient to manifest what must have been the innocence of his life.

On the morning of the day he died, he said to the brother that waited on him, "Brother, go and get out my oldest clothes and bury me in them, for I do not wish anything to be wasted."

The doctor came to see him at about eight o'clock in the morning of the same day; and when he was going away, he said that he would see him again in the course of the day. "I shall gently enter into my agony to-day," he answered. He told the brother not to forget to make him say the rosary, "For," said he, "'I wish to die whilst I am reciting it." And so it was, for when he had reached the third decade that same day he became very weak, and the damp perspiration of death began to flow. "I feel the chill of death," said he to the brother; upon which he instantly called for a priest, who began to suggest pious affections to him; but the dying man interrupted him, and asked him to allow him to speak himself; and he then began to speak to God in the most tender manner; but it was almost impossible to hear what he said, for his speech was well-nigh gone. Just as he entered into his agony, the two brothers of the Congregation who assisted him at this last hour asked for his blessing; and he gently raised his hand and blessed them. His agony was peaceful, and lasted little more than half an hour; his rosary was around his arm all along, and he clasped the crucifix in his hands, kissing it from time to time. The priest gave him absolution during this interval, after which he calmly expired, at ten o'clock on Thursday morning, June 30th, 1744, aged forty-two. His happy death took place the day before the eve of the feast of the Visitation; thus the wish he had often expressed of dying during a novena to the Blessed Virgin was gratified.

As soon as he was dead his countenance suddenly became most pleasing and beautiful, and a smile overspread his lips; his body exhaled so sweet an odor, that it scented the room where he died for a long time, and it was not only perceived by those that assisted at his death, but also by the strangers that came to see his corpse. His brother, D. Dominic Sarnelli, said that he could not bear to leave the room, as he experienced the greatest spiritual consolation when in it. His body was conveyed to the Church of our Lady of Good Help, accompanied by the brothers of the Congregation of Apostolical Missions in the archdiocese of Naples, who all followed him to the church, being filled with the greatest sorrow for his death. When the body arrived there, a great number of people crowded round it, weeping, and exclaiming, "Alas, for the saint is dead!" and this cry was repeated throughout the neighborhood. They then began to tear up his clothes, and every one tried to carry away as much of them as possible; he would soon have been stripped of everything, had not some restraint been put upon this pious eagerness.

His body was exposed for forty-eight hours, after which a great many priests and other persons testify that it remained quite flexible, and did not emit the least unpleasant odor, and that bright blood flowed from incisions that were then made in his arm and head. His relics were sought for in all directions, and the renown of his sanctity spread far and wide. Persons came to visit the house where he died through devotion, and exclaimed with many tears, "O the well-beloved saint of Jesus Christ! he is not prized sufficiently!"

In consequence of this reputation for sanctity, several persons recommended themselves to God through the merits of Father Januarius Maria, and received signal graces thereby, which I must however pass over in silence, that I may not exceed the narrow limits allotted to me. I trust, however, that the time will come when these interesting facts may be collected by others, and that a more detailed Life of this great servant of God may one day be given to the world.

Notes on the Life of VITUS Curzius, Lay-Brother of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer

I. HIS CONDUCT IN THE WORLD AND HIS VOCATION

WE add here to the life of Father Januarius Maria Sarnelli, a short biographical notice of Brother Vitus Curzius, who lived in the Congregation and was for a long time his companion.[14394] He was born at Aquaviva, in the diocese of Bari, of most respectable parents, in the year 1706. One of his brothers was a medical man, and the other was a Canon in the college of his native town.

In order to show the extent of God's goodness to this young man, we must mention that he was exceedingly passionate until he was twenty-six years of age. He was so alive to the least injury that he fought several duels, in which he nearly lost his life. On one occasion, amongst others, he felt so offended at a doctor that he shot him Another time he had the boldness to fire at a military officer; but God did not permit him to have the misfortune of hitting his mark.

After he left Procida, where he had been the treasurer of the Marquis of Vasto, he went to Naples and worked in the house of D. Cæsar Sportelli, who was the Marquis's agent and his own intimate friend. Don Cæsar had at this time resolved to leave the world; this he soon afterwards did by entering the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, where he died in the odor of sanctity in 1749.[14395] His tomb was opened four months after his death, when it was found that his body was quite flexible, and blood issued from an incision that was made in his foot.

Now one day when he was conversing with Vitus Curzius, he began to speak to him about the new Congregation, which had been begun at Scala under the title of that of the Most Holy Redeemer, through the pious exertions of Mgr. Falcoia,[14396] who was Father Cæsar's director. Vitus had scarcely heard the particulars of it before he entreated to be admitted into it as a lay-brother, as he felt sure that God called him thither. He had gained this certainty regarding his vocation to the new Institute in the following manner: "In a dream," said he, " I saw a number of priests ascending a high mountain; I tried to follow them, but all my efforts were in vain; I fell backwards after each step, or if I succeeded in getting over a little ground, I soon lost all that I had gained. Stupefied and discouraged at these repeated failures, I remained at the foot of the mountain in sorrow, when one of these priests came up to me, and held out his hand to me. By this assistance I was enabled to reach the summit as easily as the others had done." One day when he was out walking with Father Sportelli, after this dream had occurred, he met one of the Fathers of the Congregation, and although he had never seen him before, he pointed him out to his companion, Father Sportelli, saying, "There is the priest who held out his hand to me."[14397]

II. HIS ENTRANCE INTO THE CONGREGATION

He presented himself for approval and was accepted, but he was told to stay at Naples until the Superior at Scala should send for him. He had indeed some time to wait, and this delay as to his definite reception among us pained him greatly, and he longed and sighed for the hour of deliverance from this evil world. One day, however, he went to Father Sportelli in a transport of joy, for, said he, "I have heard a voice that said, 'Get ready to go, for you must soon set out.' " Indeed, the Congregation had only been established eight days, when he was sent for to Scala.

The first day on which he arrived he was ordered to serve at dinner. As his greatest failing was a horror of humiliation, the devil represented to him that such an office was absurd and ignominious. "What," whispered the evil one, "are you to serve at dinner just as if you were a mere servant?" This temptation beset him so much that he felt inclined to be revenged on him that had ventured to give him such an office. However, as he saw that a man of rank who also aspired to be received among us had the office of server, his good angel suggested to him, "Can you not do what he can do?" He thus conquered his repugnance, and began to serve quite calmly.

III. HIS LOVE OF MEDITATION

From this time he became a special child of grace, and celestial consolations abounded in his heart. He was so enlightened during meditation, especially on the mysteries of the birth and Passion of Christ, and his feelings were so sensibly affected that he could not help bursting into tears, and sobbing to such a degree that it seemed as if the violence of his love for God would really suffocate him. This took place in a special manner when he received holy Communion; and this he did almost every day. I often witnessed it myself, and had to wait some time before he could receive the sacred Host. His tears and sighs also lasted for a good while after he had communicated. This plenitude of divine grace lasted for nearly a year.

As he had then made great progress in virtue, God deprived him of this sensible fervor that he might attain a more perfect kind of meditation, and imperceptibly brought him to a state of contemplation. He however himself began to fear that God had abandoned him. "What has come over me?" said he; "I cannot meditate. It is very true that I wish to be united to God, but if I had to give an account of what I have been thinking about I could not do so, and I should not even be able to tell how the time had been spent." Enlightened, however, by the graces conveyed in this the sublimest kind of prayer, he realized the vanity of laboring for any temporal possession, since all on earth is as smoke, which passeth away. He ceased to think of his home and of the friends of his youth, and only thought of how he might become closely united to his God. He always kept his eyes cast down to the ground, and his very appearance showed the recollectedness of his soul.

IV. HIS MORTIFICATION AND HUMILITY

He became indeed a model of humility and mortification, and he that had formerly been so susceptible and proud, and that had such an aversion to every menial office, did not now disdain publicly to carry the manure to the garden, or to draw water for the Community. This last office was by no means an easy one, for the well was at a distance from the house, and every time he went there he had to go up the steep mount of Scala with a heavy pitcher in his hand; yet when he arrived at our house he used to kneel down before the large crucifix at the entrance before he had deposited his burden that he might offer up the fatigue it cost him to God.

He always went thither with his head bare, in winter as well as in summer, through reverence for the presence of God, unless he was expressly forbidden to do so. He never went near a fire in winter. He was also for some time in the habit of taking off his shoes and stockings when he went to dig in the garden, and he used to stand working there with his feet buried in the clay; but when the Superiors heard of this they forbade him to do so again.

One day the bishop of Scala told him to empty out all the water in a large cistern near his palace. As there was a great quantity of water, his nature revolted at such a laborious undertaking, but he courageously pursued it to the end. He was heard repeating to himself. "You have made a great fuss, and you may be as tired as you please, but you must do it all the same, Brother Vitus."

Another time he was ordered to help to saw some boards. As he had never done anything of the kind before, he was quite exhausted with this laborious office. After he had borne the greatest fatigue for two hours, the workman that was sawing with him said in a tone of extreme compassion, "Do rest a little, Brother Vitus." "No, no," he courageously replied; "we must finish what obedience has put before us."

Another time, when he was cleaning out the dirtiest part of the house, a priest said in passing, "Bah! what an offensive smell there is here. Brother Vitus!" "O how much worse it smells in hell!" he replied.

It so happened that once for nearly a whole winter it was forgotten to give him any warm clothing, and he went about in his summer things without saying a word, although our house at Ciorani is so cold. All the time he was at Iliceto, where there is another of our houses, he slept on a board, with nothing but a trunk for a pillow. In order to mortify himself still more, he wanted to suck the sore of an old man, but he was forbidden to do so.

He wore a sharp-pointed iron girdle about two palms in length. He also took the discipline to blood with such frequency and violence, that he thereby wounded a nerve in his leg, from which he suffered for the rest of his life.

His dinner often consisted in nothing but a little soup and bread, for he divided the different portions, and that was all he set aside for himself. As he was at first very inexperienced in all culinary matters, he one day made some unleavened bread, which soon became as hard as lead, and which it was impossible to set before the Community. However, he had the patience to go on eating it day by day until it was all eaten. He fasted on bread and water on Saturdays, in honor of our Blessed Mother Mary, and he did this even during mission time, although our lay-brothers have then to go through immense fatigue.

He never made excuses when reproved. One day our Father Minister told him not to put so much fruit on the table, as he thought it superfluous. As Vitus had acted in obedience to the Rector, he went on putting the same quantity. The Minister was annoyed at this, and scolded him and gave him several mortifications for his disobedience; but he never said a word in extenuation of what he had done. At last the Father Minister heard of the Superior's wishes; and while he ceased to reprove him, he admired his patience in bearing reprimands that he had never merited.

Another time when the Superior could not find an important manuscript that one of our Fathers had accidentally burnt, he asked Brother Vitus if he knew what had become of it, and he vaguely replied that it must have been burnt. As this answer gave cause to suspect that he was guilty of its destruction, he received a severe reproof, which he bore in patient silence, to shelter the Father who really had destroyed it.

V. HIS CHARITY TOWARD HIS NEIGHOR

His love for his neighbor was truly admirable. As soon as he resolved to join us, he distributed all that he had among the poor.

His charity also towards the sick was inexpressibly great, and he not only exercised it towards the members of the Congregation, but even towards strangers. The attention that Brother Vitus paid to a secular priest who was taken ill in our house at Ciorani, proves the extent of his charity. This priest was suffering from a most offensive and troublesome malady, and it lasted for twenty days; yet Brother Vitus never left him night or day, and as he was too weak to move, Vitus had to lift him about and do everything he required. Holy Week occurred at this time, yet he cheerfully denied himself the gratification of being present at the devotions of Holy Thursday, that he might not leave his dear invalid.

When he was at Scala he sometimes had to go to Amalfi to buy provisions for the use of the Community. When he returned he was at liberty to get the porters to carry them up the mountain, for it is very steep; but if he saw that they were overcome by the weight of their burden and by the difficulty of the ascent, he would say, "Now you must rest, and I will help you." And he would take their loads from them, and carry them up the mountain himself, although they often weighed more than two hundred pounds. One day when one of the Fathers of the Congregation went to Scala, he heard of this extraordinary act of charity from two porters whom he met, who began to inquire of him about Brother Vitus. When he told them that he was no more, they sorrowfully exclaimed, "Oh what a saint Brother Vitus was! When he gave us goods to carry, he paid us for doing it, and then carried them himself."

When he was at Scala, he felt such compassion for the sufferings of Father Sarnelli, who was ill at the time, that he took his own mattress and added it to his, to try and make him more comfortable, although he was in consequence obliged to lie on the boards himself.

VI. HIS OBEDIENCE AND HIS DEATH

His favorite virtue was that of obedience, and in it consists the essence of religious life. He used to say that a lay-brother should resemble the bell that is fastened round the neck of a cow, which never rings unless it moves. "So a brother," he would add, "ought never to stir to do anything unless prompted to do so by holy obedience."

Indeed he was, as it were, a martyr to this virtue; for while he was at our house at Iliceto, the Superior sent him to a distant village to pass the night. The holy brother asked for admittance in a monastery in this neighborhood, but they refused to receive him. He was therefore obliged to sleep in the open air, and that is a most unhealthy place, and as the weather was also very unfavorable at the time, it brought on the illness of which he died. It came on so suddenly, and with such violence, that he was unable to return to St. Mary's, and had to go to bed at the house of a charitable priest at the very entrance of Iliceto.

He bore the sufferings of a tedious illness with admirable patience, and never complained of anything. He never objected to any remedy, and punctually obeyed the doctor's orders. When he was near death, his confessor asked him whether he would rather live or die. "I only wish what God wishes," he replied; "but if I might make a choice, I should prefer to die, that I might be free from all danger of offending God, and that I might see him and be with him in heaven, if, as I trust, he in his mercy has vouchsafed me the grace of salvation." Before the holy Viaticum was administered to him he was asked if he would like to go to confession, but he answered that by God's grace he had nothing more to mention, and he died in a state of heavenly peace. After his death the inhabitants of the place said to one another, "A saint is dead," and they were eager to have relics of him. The crowd that followed his corpse to our church showed the veneration of the faithful towards him.

There are many more wonderful things that might be related of this holy brother, but I have not space to mention them.[14398]

Sermon on the Rosary

ADDITION TO THE ABRIDGED SERMONS FOR SUNDAYS

THE pious custom of reciting the Rosary has long been introduced into all cities and country-places; the faithful love to gain the treasure of the innumerable indulgences granted by the Sovereign Pontiff to persons who are associated with the confraternity of the Rosary, and who recite it with devotion. Hence the parish priests have expressed the desire to have, besides the sermon proper to the Sunday of the year, a sermon on the holy Rosary for the first Sunday of October, the day on which the Church celebrates the feast. Wishing to acquiesce in so pious a desire, we have judged it advisable to add to the present work the following sermon.[14399]

SERMON FOR THE FIRST SUNDAY OF OCTOBER, ON THE ROSARY

IN the thirteenth century of our salvation, St. Dominic was greatly afflicted, seeing the deplorable state in which the Christian religion was on account of the vices and heresies which filled Germany and France, and which, passing through Italy, had penetrated as far as Rome itself. Desirous of opposing a barrier to such a flood of errors and sins, he had recourse to the august Mother of God, who approved of his zealous intentions, and suggested to him as a remedy for so great an evil the devotion of the Rosary. The saint at once began to preach this devotion, and he did so with so much fruit that large numbers of people, even entire cities, were seen thoroughly to reform. Conversions were so astonishing and so universal, that, as the Journal of the Dominicans attests, when the people heard of the members of any family leading bad lives, they usually said that they either did not recite the Rosary or they recited it badly.

Now in order that we may profit by this devotion and know how to recite the Rosary, the present sermon will be divided into two parts. In the first part, we shall see how the Rosary should be recited in order that it may be meritorious; in the second, what we must do in order that it may be profitable to us.

1. HOW THE ROSARY SHOULD BE RECITED IN ORDER THAT IT MAY BE MERITORIUS

The Rosary is a prayer. Prayer is defined by St. John Damascene: "An elevation of the mind to God."[14400] A raising or elevation of the mind to God, without which there is no true prayer. It is divided into mental prayer and vocal prayer: mental prayer consists wholly in the interior exercise of the mind; vocal prayer consists in praising God and praying to him with the tongue and the mind. If one speaks to God only with the tongue, this would be a prayer without fruit and without merit, like that of a parrot which articulates words without knowing what it says, according to the explanation given by St. Bonaventure: "Whoever prays only with the voice, without any application of the mind, without knowing what he says, who does not see that he is like a parrot?"[14401]

The elevation of the mind required in the recitation of the Rosary should be a pious meditation on the joyous, sorrowful, and glorious mysteries; hence, while we are reciting with the voice the "Our Fathers" and the "Hail Marys" which compose the Rosary, we should consider with our thoughts the mystery that belongs to each decade.

It is true that a vocal prayer, like the Rosary, maybe meritorious without the application of the mind to the consideration of the designated mysteries; it is sufficient that one reflects either on the presence of God, his omnipotence, his mercy, or some of his other perfections; either on the temporal or eternal chastisements which one merits, or on other subjects that refer to God; but if one recites the Rosary with such thoughts, and not while considering its mysteries, one does not gain the indulgences granted by the Sovereign Pontiff, as Benedict XIII. has expressly declared.

We mistake, then, if we think that we have some merit when in reciting the Rosary we permit ourselves to listen to those that speak, to look at what is done, to interrupt ourselves often, in order to speak of what we see or to give answers to questions put to us. We should then deserve the reproach of the Lord: This people honoreth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me.[14402] And would to God that we gave ourselves up merely to distractions without going so far as to meditate revenge, harbor feelings of hatred, or occupy ourselves with wicked thoughts; for then, very far from acquiring merit, we should make ourselves worthy of eternal chastisements!

If therefore we wish to find in the devotion of the Rosary a sure support in the hope that we have of saving our souls by the means of it, it should produce in us true amendment, a true reform of our lives, according to what the Blessed Virgin, the Mother of God, expects of us. But we shall never obtain this fruit, if in the recitation of the Rosary there is not united to our voice a pious meditation on these mysteries, which place before our eyes the loving inventions, the labors, the humiliations, and the sufferings of Jesus Christ.

There are some that deceive themselves still more: they are those that imagine that in carrying with them the Rosary they find themselves fortified with a formidable arm against the devil, and thus promise themselves a good death; they rely on the recital of antiquated examples of sinners, who, after a life full of crimes, because they recited and carried with them the Rosary, obtained through the intercession of Mary the grace of dying repentant. But these examples, if true, are miraculous; and I do not think that any one among you loves his soul so little that he wishes to save it only by a miracle. What is certain is that one often sees sinners die without the sacraments and without any sign of contrition, although they had carried about with them the Rosary and recited it as you do. Should not these examples, which are so frequent, fill you with terror? and as to the miraculous examples, which are very rare, do they take from you all fear of dying a bad death, and give you the assurance that you will die well? If I must say to you what I think, I should say: As for those Christians that live without the fear of God, and that rest their hope of salvation on the Rosary, which they recite through habit and without the least devotion, I very much fear that at their death the devil may frighten them with this very Rosary by representing to them the little devotion that they have had in the manner of reciting it, and the life that they have led,—a life altogether contrary to the mysteries that they should have honored and to the end for which the Rosary was established by the Blessed Virgin.

Ah! my dear brethren, if you wish to be saved through the protection of Mary, it is fitting that you should make a better use of the devotions instituted in her honor; for we know that by the devotions badly performed and undertaken in order to live without the fear of the justice of God, far from obtaining the protection of the Blessed Virgin, we only provoke her dislike.

2. WHAT WE MUST DO IN ORDER THAT THE ROSARY MAY BE PROFITABLE TO US

It is not sufficient for him who recites the Rosary to have a pure heart or a good intention: he must also have a pure tongue. The devotion of the Rosary flourished in all the houses; but which is the house in which it flourished with the good odor with which the holy king David desired his prayer to be embalmed so that it might be agreeable to God? Lord, he said, may my prayer rise as incense in Thy presence: Let my prayer be directed as incense in Thy sight.[14403] I fear that your Rosaries are like the flowers of Egypt, of which Pliny says that they are without odor: as a flower without odor is hardly agreeable or even disagreeable, so also the roses—I mean the Rosaries that you offer to Mary—are hardly agreeable and even disagreeable to Mary, because they are odorless.

The sad cause of this misfortune may be traced to the unbecoming words that so often come forth from your mouth: they take away the good odor of your prayers, because they cannot please the Mother of God. Thus there are some that cannot speak ten words without interlarding them with some indecent expression; others when they become angry utter very gross language; many can hardly bring forward some pleasantry without saying an immodest word. This detestable habit, besides the evil that it inflicts directly upon souls, does great injury to the exercises of piety, and especially to the Rosary; for the Blessed Virgin could not accept these Rosaries which are presented to her with tongues that are in so bad a state.

It must not be understood that I here speak of those filthy words that spread a pestilential odor of lasciviousness, and that the devil makes us regard as permissible in order to enliven the company,—words that are a cause of scandal by exciting in the mind and heart bad thoughts and impure affections: I mean those that contain injurious reproaches, express rude, indecent, and shameful things. How many times do we not see people who, irritated on account of vain or unreasonable things, vomit forth a torrent of injuries and intemperate discourses! How many times, incensed against their children, their workmen, their servants, do they wish them a thousand evils, and threaten them in coarse and outrageous terms! It often happens that others who hear this begin to speak in the same way. How can one believe that the Rosary, when we recite it with a tongue thus sullied, can be agreeable to the Mother of purity? If one offered a lady flowers or fruits deposited in an unclean basket or vessel, instead of being pleased with such a present, she would be offended by it; how then can one imagine that the Blessed Virgin wishes to accept the prayers and the Rosaries that are offered to her on a tongue accustomed to utter unclean and shameful words?

Nicephorus, in his history of the Church, relates that there came forth from the body of St. Glyceria a liquid which, gathered in a vessel of bronze, produced marvellous effects, especially for the healing of the sick. The bishop then thought it fit, out of respect, to substitute a vessel of silver for the vessel of bronze; but at that very moment the precious liquid ceased to flow. After many penances and prayers it was learnt by revelation that this change was due to the fact that the vessel of silver had been before used for profane uses, that rendered it unfit; the vessel was then removed and the miracle continued its course.

St. Jerome says that lips employed in praising, praying, and blessing the Lord should never be sullied by any sin: "It is wrong that those lips with which you confess, ask, and bless the Lord should be polluted by the stain of any sin."[14404] Now if it is such an indignity to sully one's tongue for a bad purpose, what great evil will it not be to sully it at every moment by so many indecent, shameful, and immodest words! And could one still maintain that the Blessed Virgin would regard as agreeable the Rosary recited by such a tongue?

There are people who say that they make no scruple of using indecent words, that these words are after all not blasphemies, which deserve to be earnestly condemned, but that they are venial faults, which of themselves do not take away the merit of prayer. However, we answer that they are the flies which the Holy Ghost says spoil the perfume of delicious ointment: Dying flies spoil the sweetness of the ointment.[14405] Those venial sins are the cause why the fervor of charity and consequently devotion are lost: so that the Rosary has not the merit which renders it dear to Mary, nor so efficacious as to procure the graces which he always obtains who recites it devoutly. Although immodest words are not blasphemies, yet they are very grave venial faults that cause the soul very great injury. Hence St. John Chrysostom exhorts all the faithful to refrain from them, and says that he cannot conceive how a defiled tongue can offer prayer to God: "Do not suffer the tongue to be defiled; for in what manner will it pray for thee?"

Venial sin diminishes the fervor of charity. Charity, says St. Paul, makes us do great things with promptness and perfection; it renders us patient, and makes us bear every pain; it makes us rejoice at the good, and that we never rejoice at the evil that befalls others; it prevents us from acting wrongly; it makes us detest pride and all ambition, that we do not cling to self-interest, that we do not judge ill of any one, that we love the truth, that we treat every one with meekness and humility: Charity is patient, is kind: Charity envieth not, dealeth not perversely, is not puffed up. Is not ambitious, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh no evil. Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth with the truth: beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.[14406] All those that are in the state of grace possess charity; but venial sin is particularly that which is voluntary, frequent, habitual, as are immodest words which we utter every day; they are, therefore, the cause why prayers are recited without merit, because the want of fervor in charity always renders them poorer in virtue, more imperfect, colder, and consequently less agreeable in the sight of God and the Blessed Virgin. Hence St. James rightly says that he who does not wish to control his tongue has not true devotion, but a vain devotion, only the appearance of it: And if any man think himself to be a religious, not bridling his tongue, but deceiving his own heart, this man's religion is vain.[14407]

If then you wish that the recitation of the Rosary should be meritorious and profitable to your souls, besides the possession of purity of heart, it will be necessary for you to employ a pure tongue and always to consider the great evil which is caused by the contrary vice; for scandal, bad example, given to your children and to others by your immodest or unbecoming words, induce them to contract from their tender youth the habit of always using such words, according to what the Holy Ghost says: Their children also and grandchildren, as their fathers did, so do they unto this day.[14408] Consequently, you will have to render an account before the tribunal of God, and you will be justly punished.

We must, therefore, abstain from this vice in order to avoid scandal and to render the recitation of the Rosary meritorious. Consider, moreover, that the merit and profit will yet be greater if we recite the Rosary with devotion in the company of members of the family or of other persons, and this because of the good example that results therefrom, and because the Lord is pleased to find himself in the midst of those that unite to glorify his name, as he has himself declared: For where there are two or three gathered together in My name, there I am in the midst of them.[14409]

Let us add, that the Rosary may be profitable, not only to our souls, but also to the souls of the dead, to whom, says the Blessed Alanus, God sends his mercy through this means: "The Blessed Trinity sends to the dead mercy through the psalter of Mary, the Mother of mercy."[14410] It is most pleasing to God if we procure relief to these suffering souls; it is a holy and salutary act: It is therefore a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead.[14411] And the Queen of heaven has declared herself their affectionate Mother, as she has revealed to St. Bridgett: "I am the Mother of all that are in purgatory."[14412] They are even under her authority, says St. Bernardine of Sienna: "The Blessed Virgin has dominion in the kingdom of purgatory."[14413]

We should, therefore, not neglect so pious an exercise as is the recitation of the Rosary; we should try to recite it with a pure heart and a pure tongue in the company of the family and of other persons. If we thus recite it with a true devotion, it will be of very great profit for the salvation of our souls and for the solace of the souls of the dead.

Sermon on the Passion of Jesus Christ.[14414]

ALAS, what melancholy signs strike me in this temple! I see the dark appearance, I notice the despoiled altars; I hear the melancholy chant! Ah! I understand: these are signs of the grief that the Church feels, lamenting the death of Jesus her Spouse. It is therefore just that on this day we unite our tears to those of the Church, who is our Mother, and that we devote ourselves to the consideration of the death of our God, who after a life of pain wished to die for us on an infamous gibbet, in an abyss of shame and suffering.

Come, O holy cross! come and show thyself to this people; thou art the fortunate Ark in which one can find salvation in the midst of the shipwreck of this world; thou art the wonderful Rod that gives to men the strength to be able to become from monsters of iniquity flourishing rods of holy virtues; thou art the brazen Serpent at the sight of which sinners, poisoned by sin, may recover health; thou art the predestined and resplendent Tree chosen among thousands to sustain the members of the Redeemer; and thou art, finally, the sorrowful Altar on which the Saviour of the world wished to be immolated for our salvation. Give me the strength and all the help that I need to represent to these faithful souls the ignominies, the sufferings, and the anguish which Jesus Christ endured when upon thee he left this world.

The whole life of Jesus Christ was full of sufferings and ignominies; but there are especially three sad scenes of his pains in which he gave us the greatest marks of his love for us: the first is the GARDEN OF OLIVES; the second, the PRETORIUM; the third, CALVARY.

The first of these scenes in which the Passion of our Redeemer began was hidden from the eyes of men, but not from the eyes of God and of the angels.

FIRST SCENE: THE GARDEN OF OLIVES

Having on Thursday evening washed the feet of his disciples after giving himself to us in the sacrament of the altar as a pledge of his tender love for us, our amiable Saviour arrived at the garden about midnight, and prostrating himself on the ground, he began to pray Then he was assailed by great fear, great repugnance, and great sadness.

He began then to feel great fear of the death and of the pains which he was to suffer: He began to fear.[14415] But how? did he not offer himself voluntarily to undergo these torments? He was offered because it was His own will.[14416] Did he not ardently desire this time of his Passion according to what he had said to his disciples a little while before: With desire I have desired to eat this Pasch with you before I suffer. [14417] How, after this, was he seized with so great a fear of death that he went so far as to ask his Father to be delivered from it: My Father, if it be possible, let this chalice pass from Me?[14418] Ah! certainly our good Lord wished to die for us, and thus to show us the love that he bore us; but in order that the men might understand what cruel anguish and what deluge of evils he was going to undergo in his Passion, he allowed so horrible a fear to come over him: He began to fear.

And to be heavy: He also began to feel great repugnance at the sight of the pains that had been prepared for him. When one feels repugnance, even delightful things become painful. Hence with such a repugnance what punishment for the heart of Jesus, what horrible sight then presented itself to his mind of all the interior and exterior torments which were to deprive him of life by afflicting so cruelly his body and his blessed soul! He distinctly saw all the sufferings that awaited him, the mockeries, the outrages, the injuries, the buffets, the thorns, the cross, and above all that ignominious and desolate death which he was to suffer on an infamous gibbet, abandoned by every one, by men and by God, in an abyss of sorrows and opprobrium. This is what caused him so bitter a repugnance that he was obliged to ask his eternal Father for strength: He began to fear and to be heavy.

With this fear and repugnance Jesus felt at the same time great sadness and great affliction of mind: he began to grow sorrowful and to be sad.[14419]— But, O Lord! is it not Thou that hast given to Thy martyrs such a force in sufferings that they went so far as to despise torments and death and to submit to them with joy? How then does it happen that for Thyself, O Jesus! Thou hast reserved Thyself to suffer by dying in so great sadness?—Ah! I know the reason; for at this moment there were presented to his mind all the sins of the world, the blasphemies, the sacrileges, the impurities, and all the other sins that men were going to commit after his death. Each one of these sins came then as a cruel monster to tear his heart by its own malice. It seems that then in his agony our afflicted Saviour was obliged to say: O men! is it thus that you respond to the immense love that I have borne towards you? Alas! after so many sufferings endured for you, to see so many sins! after so many proofs of my love, to see so much ingratitude! It is that which afflicts me, makes me sad even unto death, and makes me sweat blood: And his sweat became as drops of blood trickling down upon the ground.[14420]

O my tender Jesus! I do not notice in this garden scourges, thorns, nails, which wound Thee; yet I see Thee bathed in blood from head to foot. My sins therefore were the cruel pressure which, by the violence of the affliction and of sadness, forced so much blood from Thy heart. I have myself been one of Thy most cruel executioners.

But should we stop here in conversing with Jesus when he is already hurrying to meet his Passion which he so much desires? In fact, there is Judas, who is accompanied by a troop of Jews and soldiers, and who is coming to seize Jesus in the garden. Jesus sees him coming, and what does he do? Yet bathed in blood, with his heart all inflamed with love of us, he rises, and says to the three disciples who were with him: Rise up, let us go. Behold, he that will betray me is at hand.[14421] Come let us meet the enemies who are coming to arrest me.

When Jesus was in their presence, Judas advanced, extended his arms and gave him a kiss. This kiss was the sign of treason: on this account Jesus addressed this word of reproach to the traitor: Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?[14422] O Judas! is it by a kiss that thou betrayest the Son of man? He afterwards asked the Jews whom they were seeking: Whom do you seek?[14423] They answered: Jesus of Nazareth. After this they brutally seized him, and bound him like a criminal: They took Jesus and bound him.[14424] Alas! a God bound like a criminal! "O King of kings!" cries out St. Bernard, weeping, "what hast Thou to do with chains?"[14425] Chains are for malefactors, and not for Thee who are innocent, the Saint of saints. "Look, O man!" says St. Bonaventure, "at these dogs dragging him along."[14426]

Jesus then bound, in the midst of this vile soldiery, is pushed out of the garden, and led to Jerusalem before the Prince of priests. And where are his disciples? do not at least they accompany their Master in order to defend him? No, all left him: Then his disciples, leaving him, all fled away.[14427]

He then enters Jerusalem during the night. At the noise that so many people make in their march, those that are in the houses awaken and, approaching the windows, ask what prisoner they are leading away. They answer that it is Jesus of Nazareth, who has been found out to be an impostor, a seducer.

He is presented to Caiphas, who was expecting him; this proud high-priest is sitting, and Jesus is standing before him, having his hands tied like a criminal, holding his eyes cast down, all humility and meekness. The high-priest interrogates him on the doctrine that he taught; Jesus answered that he had spoken publicly before every one, and that the witnesses present who had heard him knew what he had said: I have spoken to the world; . . . Behold, they know what things I have said.[14428] After an answer so just and so moderate, an executioner advances and gives him a severe blow on the cheek, saying in his fury: Answerest thou the high-priest so?[14429] How could an answer so humble merit so gross an insult in the presence of this assembly? The high-priest, however, instead of rebuking his insolent servant, remains silent, and by his silence approves of his conduct But then Jesus said to the servant: If I have spoken nil, give testimony of the evil; but if well, why strikest thou me?[14430]

Then Caiphas commanded Jesus in the name of God to say whether he was the Son of God: I adjure Thee, by the living God, that thou tell us if Thou be the Christ the Son of God.[14431] Our Lord then, asked in the name of God, confessed the truth, saying: I am;[14432] and one day you shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of the Father, and coming on the clouds of heaven to judge the world. At these words, Caiphas, instead of falling prostrate on his face to adore the Son of God, rends his garments and exclaims: He hath blasphemed![14433] Then addressing the other priests, he asked their counsel and said: Now YOU have heard the blasphemy. What think you? And all answered: He is guilty of death.[14434] Yes, my Jesus, Thou deservest death, since Thou hast wished to make satisfaction for the sins of men.

Then the executioners seized him, and treating him as a man already condemned to death, they began to spit in his face and to buffet him: Then did they spit in his face, and others struck his face with the palms of their hands.[14435] Then having bandaged his eyes, and mocking him as a false prophet, they said: Prophesy unto us, Christ, who is he that struck Thee.[14436]

When the morning was come, they conducted Jesus to Pilate in order to have him condemned to death. Pilate, finding no reason to condemn him, declared him innocent: I find no fault in him.[14437] However, as the Jews insisted, he sent him to Herod to be judged by him. Herod was delighted to see Jesus in his court, because he hoped that our Lord would perform some miracles about which he had heard others speak. He then proposed many questions to him, but Jesus remained silent. Then this proud tyrant ordered him to be clothed with a white garment as if he were a fool, and he sent him back to Pilate after having exposed him to the mockery and contempt of his entire court: And Herod, with his army, set Him at nought: and mocked Him, putting on Him a white garment, and sent Him back to Pilate.[14438] O Son of God! O Eternal Wisdom! Thou wouldst submit even to the ignominy of being treated as a fool!

Pilate, in order to avoid condemning an innocent man, seeing that he was not successful in sending Jesus to Herod, devised another means. As the people had a right of asking the Roman governor for the liberation of a prisoner at the Paschal solemnity, Pilate proposed to them to choose between Jesus Christ and Barabbas, who was a wicked man, a homicide; but the people, instigated by the hatred of the priests, who wished the death of Jesus Christ, began to cry out that they preferred Barabbas: Not this man, but Barabbas.[14439] This is what he does that commits a mortal sin: it is then proposed to him to choose between Jesus Christ and the sin that he wishes to commit, as the sin of revenge, of a certain pleasure, etc.: when he gives his consent, it is as if he said: Not this man, but Barabbas; I prefer Barabbas to Jesus Christ.

After having proposed Jesus Christ and Barabbas to the choice of the people, and seeing that this means was unsuccessful, Pilate thought of having him scourged and then set at liberty: I will chastise Him, therefore, and release Him. [14440] Here we are then at the second scene of the sufferings of Jesus Christ: Then, therefore, Pilate took Jesus and scourged Him. [14441] O how much less would he have suffered if Pilate had had less compassion for him, and if he had without delay condemned him to the death of the cross! All this served but to increase the sufferings and humiliations of our Saviour.

SECOND SCENE: THE PRETORIUM

Having arrived at the pretorium, our loving Jesus, obedient to the executioners, strips himself of his garments, embraces the column, and then lays on it his hands to have them bound.—My God, already is begun the cruel torture! O angels of heaven! come and look on this sorrowful spectacle, and if it be not permitted you to deliver your king from this barbarous slaughter which men have prepared for him, at least come and weep for compassion.—And ye, Christian souls, imagine yourselves to be present at this horrible tearing of the flesh of your beloved Redeemer; look on him how he stands,—your afflicted Jesus—with his head bowed, looking on the ground, blushing all over for shame, he awaits this great torture. Behold these barbarians, like so many ravenous dogs, are already with the scourges attacking this innocent Lamb. See how one beats him on the breast, another strikes his shoulders, another smites his loins and his legs; even his sacred head and beautiful countenance cannot escape the blows. Ah me! already flows that divine blood from every part; already with that blood are saturated the scourges, the hands of the executioners, the column and the ground. "He is wounded," mourns St. Laurence Justinian, "over his whole body, torn with the scourges; now they twine round his shoulders, now round his legs—streaks upon streaks, wounds added to fresh wounds."[14442]

Ah, cruel men, with whom are you dealing thus? Stay—stay: know that you are making a mistake. This man whom you are torturing is innocent and holy; it is we who are the culprits; to us, to us, who have sinned, are these stripes and torments due. O eternal Father! how canst Thou behold Thy beloved Son suffering thus, and not interfere in his behalf? What is the crime that he has ever committed, to deserve so shameful and so severe a punishment?—For the wickedness of My people have I struck Him.[14443] I well know, says the eternal Father, that this my Son is innocent; but inasmuch as he has offered himself as a satisfaction to my justice for all the sins of mankind, it is fitting that I should abandon him to the rage of his most cruel enemies.

Ye barbarians, are you not yet satisfied? No; they are not yet satisfied. After having thus scourged him, these executioners wish to treat him as a mock king. What do they do? They make him sit upon a stone, put upon his shoulders a scarlet cloak in imitation of the purple, and into his hand a reed for a sceptre, and upon his head for a crown a bundle of thorns which covers it entirely from the forehead to the neck; and in order that the thorns might sufficiently enter the head, they took a reed and beat with all their might the cruel crown into the head of Jesus: They took the reed and struck His head.[14444]

It is not yet enough: bending the knee before him, they mocked him, saying: We salute thee, O king of the Jews! Then rising, they laugh at him, mock him, and buffet him: And bowing the knee before Him, they derided Him, saying, Hail King of the Jews;[14445] and they gave Him blows.[14446]

Approach, devout souls, and acknowledge him as your Saviour, while his enemies are maltreating and mocking him. Yes, he is a king; but at this moment he is the king of sorrows: he is, however, a king of love, since for the love of you he suffers all these pains.

After having thus scourged him and crowned him with thorns, they seized him as he was, all covered with wounds and blood, and led him to Pilate. The latter, seeing him reduced to a state so worthy of compassion, thought it would be sufficient, in order to pacify the Jews, to show them such as he was. He therefore led him forth before them, and exhibiting him to the people, said to them: Behold the man. Pilate went forth again to them, . . . and saith unto them, Behold the man;[14447] as though he would have said: Behold the man whom you feared wished to make himself your king; see him reduced to such a state that he cannot live any longer. Let him go and die in his own house; he has but a short time to live; see him reduced to such a state that he has scarcely the appearance of a man. Permit him, therefore, to be set at liberty, your anger against him being sufficiently appeased. If, notwithstanding, you ask that I should condemn him to death, I declare to you that I cannot do so, because I find no reason to condemn him: I find no fault in Him.[14448]

As Pilate from the balcony showed Jesus to the people, so at the time the same eternal Father from heaven showed us his well-beloved Son, by saying, Behold the man: Behold this man, who is my only begotten Son, whom I love with the same love wherewith I love myself! This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased.[14449] Behold the Man, your Saviour, him whom I have promised, and for whom you were anxiously waiting. He has become a man of sorrows. Behold him, and see to what a pitiable condition he has reduced himself through the love that he has borne towards you. Oh, look at him, and love him! and if his divine qualities move you not, at least let these sorrows and ignominies which he suffers for you move you to love him.

But did the words of Pilate satisfy the cruelty of the enemies of Jesus Christ? On the contrary, the chief priests raised their voices, and cried out: Away with Him! away with Him! crucify Him![14450] Pilate, however, still resisted, and refused to condemn Jesus. Then they threatened to accuse him as an enemy of Cæsar if he refused to pronounce sentence: If thou lettest this Man go, thou art no friend of Cæsar's.[14451] They thus succeeded in obtaining the desired condemnation; but before pronouncing it, Pilate washed his hands, declaring himself innocent of the death of this just man: I am innocent of the blood of this just Man; look you to it.[14452] O injustice unheard of in this world: the judge declares the accused to be innocent, and at the same time he condemns him to death!

Unhappy Jews, you then said: His blood be upon us, and upon our children.[14453] You have prayed for the chastisement; it has already come; your children bear to the end of the world the punishment due to the shedding of that innocent blood.

The unjust sentence is read: Jesus accepts it in expiation of our sins: He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.[14454]

After the publication of the sentence Jesus is again clothed in his garments that he might be recognized, disfigured as he is by such bad treatment. The cross is presented to him; Jesus embraces it, it is placed upon his shoulders, and he begins to walk towards Calvary: And bearing His own cross, He went forth to that place which is called Calvary.[14455] The condemned criminals now come forth from Pilate's residence, and in the midst of them there goes also our condemned Lord, carrying him—self the wood upon which he is to die. O heavens! this Messias, who a few days before, on Palm Sunday, was received with the acclamations and benedictions of the people: Blessed be He that cometh in the name of the Lord![14456] See him now in the same streets, bound, execrated by all, moving along to die the death of a criminal. What a spectacle to see a God led to execution! The appearance of Jesus in this journey was so pitiable that it made all those shed tears that saw him: And there followed Him a great multitude of people, and of women who bewailed and lamented Him.[14457] Ah! look at him also, you who love Jesus Christ; see his torn flesh, his dripping blood, the crown of thorns upon his head, the heavy cross upon his shoulders; and while one of the executioners drags him violently along by a rope, see how painful is his walk, see his body bent double, his trembling knees, so that it seems as if he would expire at every step.

O divine Lamb! hast Thou not yet Thy fill of sufferings? How dear did it cost Thee to make me comprehend the love which Thou hast for me! Oh, grant me those aids to love Thee which Thou hast merited for me by so many sufferings! Bestow upon me that sacred fire which Thou didst come to enkindle upon earth by dying for us. Be ever reminding me of Thy death that I may never forget to love Thee.

Isaias predicted that our Lord would carry the cross upon his shoulders as a mark of his reign: His government was upon His shoulder.[14458] The cross, says Tertullian, was precisely the noble instrument whereby Jesus Christ made acquisition of so many souls; since by dying thereon he paid the penalty due to our sins, and thus rescued us from hell, and made us his own: Who His own Self bore our sins in His body upon the tree.[14459]

Thus, O my Jesus! if the eternal Father burdened Thee with all the sins of men,—The Lord laid upon Him the iniquities of us all,[14460]—I with my own sins added to the weight of the cross that Thou didst bear to Calvary. O my sweetest Saviour, Thou didst even then foresee all the wrongs that I should do to Thee; yet, notwithstanding, Thou didst not cease to love me, or to prepare for me all the merits that Thou hast since employed towards me. If then to Thee I have been dear, most vile and ungrateful sinner as I am, who have so much offended Thee, good reason is there why Thou shouldst be dear to me. Ah, would that I had never displeased Thee! Now, my Jesus, do I know the wrong that I have done Thee.—O ye accursed sins of mine, what have you done? You have caused me to sadden the loving heart of my Redeemer, that heart which has loved me so much.—O my Jesus! forgive me, repenting, as I do, of having done despite unto Thee. Henceforth it is Thou who art to be the only object of my love. I love Thee, O infinite loveliness, with all my heart; and I resolve to love none else but Thee. O Lord! pardon me; I say unto Thee with St. Ignatius: "Give me Thy love only together with Thy grace, and I am rich enough."[14461]

THIRD SCENE: CALVARY

Here we are at the third and last scene of the tortures—that of Calvary, which brought death to Jesus Christ. They immediately tear off his garments, sticking to his wounded flesh, and throw him down upon the cross. The divine Lamb reaches forth to the executioners his hands and his feet to be nailed, and offers up to his eternal Father the great sacrifice of his life for the salvation of men. After the nailing of one of his hands, the nerves shrink so that they had need of main force and ropes to draw the other hand and feet up to the places where they were to be nailed; and this occasioned so great a tension of the nerves and veins, that they broke asunder with a violent convulsion, as was revealed to St. Bridget: "They drew my hands and feet with a rope to the places of the nails, so that the nerves and veins were stretched out to the full and broke asunder;"[14462] insomuch that all his bones might have been numbered, as David had already predicted: They pierced My hands and My feet, they numbered all My bones.[14463]

St. Augustine says that there is no death more bitter than that of the cross: "Among all the different kinds of death, there was none worse."[14464] Because, as St—Thomas[14465] observes, those who are crucified have their hands and their feet pierced through, parts which being entirely composed of nerves, muscles, and veins, are the most sensitive to pain, and the very weight of the body itself, which is suspended from them, causes the pain to be continuous and ever increasing in its intensity up to the moment of death.

But the pains of Jesus were far beyond all other pains; for, as the Angelic Doctor says, the body of Jesus Christ, being perfectly constituted, was more quick and sensitive to pain—that body which was fashioned for him by the Holy Spirit, expressly with a view to his suffering, as he had foretold, as the Apostle testifies: A body Thou hast fitted to Me.[14466] Moreover, St. Thomas says that Jesus Christ took upon himself an amount of suffering so great as to be sufficient to satisfy for the temporal punishment merited by the sins of all mankind.

O my soul, behold thy Lord, behold thy life hanging upon that tree: And thy life shall be, as it were, hanging before thee.[14467] Behold how on that gibbet of pain, fastened by those cruel nails, he finds no place of rest. Now he leans his weight upon his hands, now upon his feet; but on what part soever he leans, the anguish increases. He turns his afflicted head now on one side, now on the other; if he lets it fall towards his breast, the hands, by the additional weight, are rent the more; if he lowers it towards his shoulders, the shoulders are pierced with thorns; if he leans it back upon the cross, the thorns enter the more deeply into his head.

Ah, my Jesus, what a death of bitterness is this that Thou art enduring! O my crucified Redeemer, I adore Thee on this throne of ignominy and pain.

Upon this cross I read it written that Thou art a King: Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews.[14468] But apart from this title of scorn, what is the evidence that Thou dost give of being a king? Ah, these hands transfixed with nails, this head pierced with thorns, this throne of sorrow, this lacerated flesh, make me well know that Thou art a king, but a king of love. With humility, then, and tenderness do I draw near to kiss Thy sacred feet, transfixed for love of me. I clasp in my arms this cross, on which Thou, being made a victim of love, wast willing to offer Thyself in sacrifice for me to the divine justice: being made obedient unto death, the death of the cross.[14469] O blessed obedience, that obtained for us the pardon of our sins! And what would have become of me, O my Saviour, hadst Thou not paid the penalty for me?

Contemplating one day the love of Jesus in dying for us, St. Francis of Paula, rapt in ecstasy and raised in the air, exclaimed three times in a loud voice. "O God, charity! O God, charity! O God, charity!" You also, devout souls, look on your divine Saviour on this painful cross; see how he remains fastened by those three nails, so that the pierced hands and feet had to sustain the weight of the entire body; on whichever side he wishes to rest his pains are increased. Alas! our afflicted Saviour finds no place of rest.

Behold the King of heaven, who, hanging on that gibbet, is now on the point of giving up the ghost. Let us, too, ask of him with the prophet: What are those wounds in the middle of Thy hands?[14470] Tell me, O my Jesus, what are these wounds in the middle of Thy hands? The Abbot Rupert makes answer for Jesus: "They are the memorials of charity, the price of redemption."[14471] They are tokens, says the Redeemer, of the great love which I bear toward you; they are the payment by which I set you free from the hands of your enemies, and from eternal death.

Do you, then, O faithful souls, love your God, who has had such love for you; and if you do at any time feel doubtful of his love, turn your eyes, says St. Thomas of Villanova, to behold that cross, those pains, and that bitter death which he has suffered for you; for such proofs will assuredly make you know how much your Saviour loves you: "The cross testifies, the pains testify, the bitter death that he had endured for you testifies this."[14472] And St. Bernard adds that the cross cries out, every wound of Jesus cries out, that he loves us with a true love: "The cross proclaims, the wounds proclaim, that he truly loves."[14473]

While hanging on the cross Jesus looked in vain for some one to console him: I looked for one that would grieve together with me, but there was none.[14474] On the contrary, he heard those around him uttering blasphemies: If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross.[14475] Vah! thou that destroyest the temple of God, and in three days dost rebuild it, save thy own self.[14476] He saved others, himself he cannot save.[14477] Why should they care to afflict by insults and derision one that is already expiring on the gibbet?

And Jesus, while these are outraging him, what is he doing upon the cross? Is he perhaps praying to the eternal Father to punish them? No, he is praying to him to pardon them: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.[14478] Yes, says St. Thomas; to show forth the immense love which he had for men, the Redeemer asked pardon of God for his crucifiers: "To show forth the abundance of his charity, he asked pardon for his persecutors."[14479] he asked it, and obtained it; for, when they had seen him die they repented of their sin: They returned smiting their breasts.[14480]

Ah, my dear Saviour, behold me at Thy feet; I have been one of the most ungrateful of Thy persecutors; do Thou pray likewise for me to Thy Father to pardon me. True it is that the Jews and the executioners knew not what they were doing when they crucified Thee; but I well knew that in sinning I was offending a God who had been crucified, and had died for me. But Thy blood and Thy death have merited even for me the divine mercy. I cannot feel doubtful of being pardoned after seeing Thee die to obtain pardon for me.

The sorrowful Mother stood at the foot of the cross with some pious women: There stood by the cross of Jesus His mother. . . . [14481] O God! who would not pity a mother standing beside the gibbet on which a son dies before her eyes? Consider Mary, standing beneath the cross, contemplating the pains in the midst of which her well—beloved Son was expiring. She desired to give him some alleviation, and she saw, on the other hand, that her presence increased the grief of this same Son, who was full of compassion for his tender Mother. This was a terrible affliction for Mary, a torture that made her the Queen of Martyrs.

Seeing himself, then, abandoned by every one, all men trying to make his death more painful, Jesus raised his eyes to his eternal Father to obtain some consolation. But seeing him laden with all our sins, for which he wished to satisfy the divine justice, his Father also abandoned him. Then it was that our Saviour, crying out with a loud voice, said: My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?[14482]

But our Saviour, so full of love, is on the point of expiring. Christians, look at the cross. Behold those dying eyes, that face so pale, the sacred body which is abandoned to death. Before expiring, Jesus uttered these words: It is consummated.[14483] It is as if he had said: O men, love me; I have done all that I can do in order to save your souls and gain your love. See the painful life that I have led during thirty-three years for love of you. I wished then on your account to be scourged, to be crowned with thorns, to be buffeted, to be covered with wounds from head to foot. What more was needed? Should I die for love of you? Well, then! I wish to die. Come, O death! I permit thee to come; take away my life, in order that my sheep may live. And Jesus, crying with a loud voice, said, Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit.[14484] My Father, he then said, I die for Thy glory and for the salvation of men; I commend my soul into Thy hands.—Behold, then, Jesus dies. O angels of heaven, come, come to be present at the death of your God. And thou, O sorrowful Mother! approach nearer to the cross; look at him more steadfastly, for he is about to expire.

And ye Christians, behold him in his agony; see him amid the last respirations of life. Behold his dying eyes, that face so pale, that feebly palpitating heart, that body already wrapped in the arms of death, and that beautiful soul now on the point of leaving that wounded body.

The sky shrouds itself in darkness; the earth quakes; the graves open. Alas, what portentous signs are these! They are signs that the Maker of the world is now dying.

Behold, in the last place, how our Lord, after having commended his blessed soul to his eternal Father, first breathing forth from his afflicted heart a deep sigh, and then bowing down his head in token of his obedience, and offering up his death for the salvation of men, at last through the violence of the pain expires, and delivers up his spirit into the hands of his beloved Father. And crying out with a loud voice, He said Father into Thy hands I commend My spirit; and saying this He gave up the Ghost.[14485]

All those that were present looking at him with attention see him expire, and observing that he is motionless, they exclaim, He is dead—he is dead!—Mary hears this from all the bystanders, and she also says, Ah, my Son, Thou art dead! He is dead!—Ah, who is dead? It is the King of heaven; the Creator of the world, a God, who wished to die for us poor sinners.

ACT OF CONTRITION WHILE SHOWING THE CRUCIFIX.[14486]

Come sinners; here is Jesus Christ who has stretched forth his arms to embrace you. Can you fear that he will not pardon you, when he gave himself up to death in order to pardon you?

Do you perhaps fear that you will not obtain pardon because you find yourselves unable to perform the penance that your sins deserve? Console yourselves; for you here see the penance that Jesus Christ has himself performed for you on the cross; it is sufficient if you sincerely repeat of having offended him.

Look at him; see where you can find any one that has loved you more than Jesus Christ has loved you. Love him then, since he died in order to be loved by you. Say to him: Ah, my sweet Saviour! whom should I love if I do not love a God who has died for me?

O sorrowful Mother! through the sorrow that thou didst experience in seeing thy divine Son expire, obtain for me holy perseverance and a true love of my divine Redeemer.

Nine Discourses for Times of Calamities.

IT should be remarked that these discourses are here not entirely developed; we find in them only those passages that are pertinent to the subjects the thoughts upon which are hardly expressed, in order that the preachers may extend and amplify them as they wish, by adding the moral application against vice wherever this may be found useful.[14487]

FIRST DISCOURSE

GOD THREATENS TO CHASTISE US IN ORDER TO DELIVER US FROM CHASTISEMENT

"Heu! consolabor super hostibus meis, et vindicabor de inimicis meis."

"Ah, I will comfort Myself over My adversaries: and I will be revenged of My enemies."—Isa. i. 24.

SUCH is the language of God, when speaking of punishment and vengeance: He says that he is constrained by his justice to take vengeance on his enemies. But, mark you, he begins with the word Heu, "Ah:" this word is an exclamation of grief by which he would give us to understand, that if he were capable of weeping when about to punish, he should weep bitterly at being compelled to afflict us his creatures, whom he has loved so dearly as to give up his life through love for us. " 'Alas!'" says Cornelius a Lapide, "is uttered by one who is lamenting and not insulting; God signifies by this word that he is grieving, and that he is unwilling to punish sinners."[14488] No, this God, who is the Father of mercies, and so much loves us, is not of a disposition to punish and afflict, but rather to pardon and console us. For I know the thoughts that I think towards you, saith the Lord, thoughts of peace, and not of affliction.[14489]

But some one will say, since such is his character, why does he now punish us? or, at least, appear as if he meant to punish us? Why so? Because he wishes to be merciful towards us: this anger which he now displays is all mercy and patience.

Let us then, my brethren, understand how the Lord at present appears in wrath, not with a view to our punishment, but in order that we may cleanse ourselves of our sins, and thus enable him to pardon us. Such is the subject of our discourse: GOD THREATENS TO CHASTISE IN ORDER TO DELIVER US FROM CHASTISEMENT.

The threats of men ordinarily proceed from their pride and impotence; whence, if they have it in their power to take vengeance on an object, they threaten nothing, lest they should thereby give their enemies an opportunity of escape. It is only when they want the power to wreak their vengeance that they betake themselves to threats, in order to gratify their passion, by awakening at least the fears of their enemies. Not so the threats of which God makes use; on the contrary, their nature is quite different. His threats do not arise from his inability to chastise, because he can be avenged when he wills; but he bears with us in order to see us penitent, and thus exempt from punishment. Thou hast mercy upon all, because Thou canst do all things, and winkest at the sins of men for the sake of repentance.[14490] Neither does he threaten from hatred, in order to torment us with fear; God threatens from love, in order that we may be converted to him, and thereby escape chastisement: he threatens, because he does not wish to see us lost: he threatens, in fine, because he loves our souls. But Thou sparest all, because they are thine, O Lord, who lovest souls.[14491] He threatens; but notwithstanding bears with us and delays the infliction, because he wishes to see us converted, not lost. He dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[14492] Thus the threats of God are all acts of tenderness, and amorous calls of his goodness, by which he means to save us from the punishment which we deserve.

Yet forty days, exclaimed Jonas, and Nineve shall be destroyed.[14493] Wretched Ninevites, he cries, the day of your chastisement is come; I announce it to you on the part of God: Know that within forty days Nineve shall be destroyed, and cease to exist. But how comes it that Nineve did penance and was not destroyed? And God saw their works, that they were turned from their evil way; and God had mercy.[14494] Whereat Jonas was afflicted, and making lamentation before the Lord, said to him: Therefore, I went before Thee into Tarsis, for I knew that Thou art a gracious and merciful God, patient and of much compassion, and easy to forgive evil.[14495] He then left Nineve, and was screened from the rays of the burning sun by an ivy which God caused to overshadow his head. But how did the Lord next act? He withered the ivy, whereat Jonas was so much afflicted that he wished for death. God then said to him, Thou hast grieved for the ivy for which Thou hast not labored, nor made it to grow; . . . and shall not I spare Nineve?[14496] Thou grievest for the ivy which thou hast not created, and shall not I pardon the men who are the work of my hands?

The destruction which the Lord caused to be held out against Nineve was, according to the explanation of St. Basil, not an actual prophecy, but a simple threat, by which he meant to bring about the conversion of that city. The saint says, that God often appears in wrath because he wishes to deal mercifully with us; and threatens, not with the intention of chastising but of delivering us from chastisement.[14497] St. Augustine adds, that when any one cries out to you "take care," it is a sign he does not mean to injure you.[14498] And thus exactly does God act in our regard: he threatens us with chastisement, says St. Jerome, not that he means to inflict it, but to spare us if we profit by the warning.[14499] Thou, O Lord, says St. Augustine, art severe, but then most so when Thou wishest to save us; Thou threatenst, but in so threatening Thou hast no other object than to bring us to repentance.[14500] The Lord could chastise sinners without warning by a sudden death, which should not leave them time for repentance; but no, he displays his wrath, he brandishes his scourge, in order that he may see them reformed, not punished.

The Lord said to Jeremias: thou shalt say to them—If so be, they will hearken and be converted every one from his evil way: that I may repent Me of the evil which I think to do unto them.[14501] Go, he says, and tell the sinners if they wish to hear you, that if they cease from their sins, shall spare them the chastisements which I intended to have inflicted on them. And now, my brethren, mark me. The Lord addresses you in a similar way out of my mouth. If you amend, he will revoke the sentence of punishment. St. Jerome says: "God is wroth, not with us, but with our sins;"[14502] and St. John Chrysostom adds, that if we remember our sins God will forget them.[14503] He desires that we being humbled should reform, and crave pardon of him. Because they are humbled I will not destroy them.[14504]

But, in order to amend, we must be led to it by fear of punishment, otherwise, we never should be brought to change our lives. True it is, God protects him who places hope in his mercy. He is the protector of all who trust in Him.[14505] But he who hopes in the mercy of the Lord is always the man who fears his justice. They that fear the Lord have hoped in the lord : He is their protector and their helper.[14506] The Lord often speaks of the rigor of his judgments, and of hell, and of the great number who go thither. Be not afraid of them who kill the body: . . . fear ye Hint who, after He hath killed, hath power to cast into hell.[14507] Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who enter thereat.[14508] And why does the Lord so often speak thus? In order that fear may keep us from vice, and from the passions, and from occasions; and that thus we may reasonably hope for salvation, which is only for the innocent, or the penitent, who hope and fear.

Oh, what strength has not the fear of hell to rein us in from sin! To that end has God created hell. He has created us, and redeemed us by his death, that we might be happy with him; he has imposed upon us the obligation of hoping for eternal life, and on that account encourages us, by saying that all those who hope in him shall be saved. For none of them that wait on Thee shall be confounded.[14509] On the other hand, it is his wish and command that we should be in fear of eternal damnation. Some heretics hold, that all who are not in sin should consider themselves as assuredly just and predestined; but these have with reason been condemned by the Council of Trent,[14510] because such a presumption is as perilous to salvation as fear is conducive to it. And let Him be your dread, and He shall be a sanctification unto you.[14511] The holy fear of God makes man holy. Wherefore David begged of God the grace of fear, in order that fear might destroy in him the inclinations of the flesh. Pierce Thou my flesh with Thy fear.[14512]

We should then fear on account of our sins, but this fear ought not to deject us: it should rather excite us to confidence in the divine mercy, as was the case with the prophet himself. For Thy name's sake, O Lord, Thou wilt pardon my sin, for it is great. [14513] How is that? Pardon me because my sin is great? Yes, because the divine mercy is most conspicuous in the case of greatest misery; and he who has been the greatest sinner is he who glorifies most the divine mercy, by hoping in God, who has promised to save all those who hope in him. He will save them, because they have hoped in him.[14514] For this reason it is, Ecclesiasticus says, that the fear of the Lord bringeth not pain, but joy and gladness: The fear of the Lord shall delight the heart, and shall give joy and gladness.[14515] Thus this very fear leads to the acquisition of a firm hope in God, which makes the soul happy: He that feareth the Lord shall tremble at nothing, and shall not be afraid, for He is his hope. The soul of him that feareth the Lord is blessed. [14516] Yes, blessed, because fear draws man away from sin. The fear of the Lord driveth out sin,[14517] and at the same time infuses into him a great desire of observing the commandments: Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord: he shall delight exceedingly in His commandments.[14518]

We must, then, persuade ourselves that chastisement is not what the nature of God inclines him to. God, because by his nature he is infinite goodness,[14519] says St. Leo, has no other desire than to bless us, and to see us happy. When he punishes, he is obliged to do so in order to satisfy his justice, not to gratify his inclination. Isaias says, that punishment is a work contrary to the heart of God. The Lord shall be angry. . . . that He may do His work, His strange work;. . . . His work is strange to Him.[14520] And therefore does the Lord say, that he sometimes almost feigns the intention of punishing us.[14521] But why does he do so? For this reason: Let every man of you return from his evil way. [14522] He does so in order to our reformation, and consequently our exemption from the chastisement deserved by us. The Apostle writes, that God hath mercy on whom He will, and whom He will He hardeneth.[14523] With regard to which passage, St. Bernard says, that God of himself wishes to love us, but that we force him to condemn us.[14524] He calls himself the Father of mercies, not of vengeance. Whence it comes that his tenderness all springs from himself, and his severity from us.

And who has ever been able to comprehend the greatness of the divine mercies? David says, that God, even while yet angry, feels compassion for us: Thou hast been angry, and hast had mercy on us.[14525] "O merciful wrath, which art enkindled but to succor, and threatenest but to pardon,"[14526] exclaims the abbot Beroncosius. "Thou hast shown," continues David, "thou hast shown Thy people hard things, Thou hast made us drunk with the wine of sorrow."[14527] God discovers himself to us armed with a scourge, but he does so in order to see us penitent and contrite for the offences which we are committing against him: Thou hast given a warning to them that fear Thee: that they may flee before the bow: that Thy beloved may be delivered.[14528] He appears with the bow already bent, upon the point of sending off the arrow, but he does not send it off, because he wishes that our terror should bring about amendment, and that thus we should escape the chastisement. That Thy beloved may be delivered.[14529] I wish to terrify them, says God, in order that struck by fear they may rise from the bed of sin and return to me. In their affliction they will rise early to Me.[14530] Yes, the Lord, although he sees us so ungrateful and worthy of punishment, is eager to free us from it, because how ungrateful soever we be, he loves us and wishes us well. Give us help from trouble.[14531] Thus, in fine, prayed David; and thus ought we to pray. Grant, O Lord, that this scourge which now afflicts us, may open our eyes, so that we depart from sin; because if we do not here have done with it, sin will lead us to eternal damnation, which is a scourge enduring forever.

What shall we then do, my brethren? Do you not see that God is angered? He can no longer bear with us. The Lord is angry. Do you not behold the scourges of God increasing every day? Our sins increase, says St. John Chrysostom, and our scourges increase likewise.[14532] God, my brethren, is wroth: but with all his anger he has commanded me to say, what he formerly commanded to be said by the prophet Zachary; And thou shall say to them, Thus saith the Lord of Hosts: Turn ye to Me saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will turn to you saith the Lord of Hosts. [14533] Sinners, saith the Lord, you have turned your backs upon me, and therefore have constrained me to deprive you of my grace. Do not oblige me to drive you forever from my face, and punish you in hell without hope of pardon. Have done with it: abandon sin, be converted to me, and I promise to pardon you all your offences, and once more to embrace you as my children. Turn ye to Me, saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will turn to you.[14534] Why do you wish to perish? (mark how tenderly the Lord speaks.) And why will you die, O house of Israel.[14535] Why will you fling yourselves into that burning furnace? Return ye and live.[14536] Return to me, I await you with open arms, ready to receive and pardon you.

Doubt not of this, O sinner, continues the Lord. Learn to do well . . . And then come and accuse Me, saith the Lord: if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow.[14537] Take courage, saith the Lord, change your life, come to me, and if I do not pardon you, accuse me. As if he were to say, Accuse me of lying and bad faith; but, no, I shall not be unfaithful: your conscience now so black, shall by my grace become as white as snow. No; I will not chastise you if you reform, says the Lord, because I am God, not man. I will not execute the fierceness of My wrath, . . . because I am God, and not man.[14538] He says besides, that men never forget an injury, but that when he sees a sinner penitent, he forgets all his offences. I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done.[14539] Let us then at once return to God, but let it be at once. We have offended him enough already, let us not tempt his anger any further. Behold him, he calls us, and is ready to pardon us if we repent of our evil deeds, and promise him to change our lives.[14540]

Here, and at the close of each succeeding Sermon, may be introduced Acts of Faith, Hope, and Sorrow, etc., with a Petition to the Mother of God for her intercession.

SECOND DISCOURSE.

SINNERS WILL NOT BELIEVE IN THE DIVINE THREATS UNTIL THE CHASTISEMENT HAS COME UPON THEM

"Si pœnitentiam non egeritis omnes similiter peribitis."

"Except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish."—Luke, xiii. 5.

AFTER our Lord had commanded our first parents not to eat of the forbidden fruit, unhappy Eve approached the tree and was addressed from it by the serpent, who said to her: Why has God forbidden you to eat of this delightful fruit? Why hath God commanded you? Eve replies: God hath commanded us that we should not eat, and that we should not touch it, lest perhaps we die.[14541] Behold the weakness of Eve! The Lord had absolutely threatened them with death, and she now begins to speak of it as doubtful: Lest perhaps we die. If I eat of it, she said, I shall perhaps die. But the devil, seeing that Eve was little in fear of the divine threat, proceeded to encourage her by saying: No, you shall not die the death;[14542] and thus he deceived her, and caused her to prevaricate and eat the apple. Thus, even now, does the enemy continue to deceive so many poor sinners. God threatens: Stop, sinners, and do penance, because if not you shall damn yourselves, as so many others have done: "Except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish." The devil says to them: "No, you shall not die the death." Fear nothing, sin on, continue to enjoy yourselves, because God is merciful; he will pardon you by and by, and you shall be saved. "God," says St. Procopius, "inspires one with fear, the devil takes it away."[14543] God only desires to terrify them by his threats, in order that they may depart from sin, and thus be saved. The devil wishes to destroy that fear, in order that they may persevere in sin, and thus be lost. Many are the wretches who believe the devil in preference to God, and are thus miserably damned. At present, behold the Lord displays his anger and threatens us with chastisement. Who knows how many there may be in this country who have no thought of changing their lives, in the hope that God will be appeased, and that it will be nothing. Hence the subject of the present discourse: SINNERS WILL NOT BELIEVE IN THE DEVINE THREATS, UNTIL THE CHASTISEMENT SHALL HAVE COME UPON THEM. My brethren, if we do not amend, the chastisement will come; if we do not put an end to our crimes, God will.

When Lot was warned by the Lord that he was about to destroy Sodom, Lot at once informed his sons-in-law: Arise! get you out of this place, because the Lord will destroy this city.[14544] But they would not believe him: And He seemed to them to speak as it were in jest.[14545] They imagined that he wished to sport with their fears, by terrifying them with such a threat. But the punishment overtook them, and they remained to be the sport of the dames. My brethren, what do we expect? God warns us that chastisement hangs over us; let us put a period to our sins, or shall we wait for God to do it? Hear, O sinner! what St. Paul says to you: See, then, the severity and goodness of God—towards them, indeed, that are fallen, the severity; but towards thee the goodness of God, if thou abide in goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.[14546] Consider, says the Apostle, the justice which the Lord has exercised towards so many whom he has punished, and condemned to hell: towards them, indeed, that are fallen, the severity. Consider the mercy with which he has treated you; but towards thee the goodness of God. You must abandon sin; it you change your ways, avoid the occasions of sin, frequent the sacraments, and continue to lead a Christian life, the Lord will remit your punishment, if you abide in goodness; if not, you shall perish, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. God has already borne with you too long, he can bear with you no longer. God is merciful, but he is just withal; he deals mercifully with those who fear him; he cannot act thus towards the obstinate.

Such a person laments when he sees himself punished, and says, why has God deprived me of my health? why has he taken from me this child, or this parent? Ah, sinner! what have you said, exclaims Jeremias, your sins have withholden good things from you.[14547] It was not the desire of God to deprive you of any blessing, of any gain, of your son, or your parent; it would have been the wish of God to make you happy in all things, but your sins have not allowed him. In the book of Job we read these words: Is it a great matter that God should comfort thee? but thy wicked words hinder this.[14548] The Lord would fain console you, but your blasphemy, your murmuring, your obscene words, spoken to the scandal of so many have prevented him. It is not God, but accursed sin, that renders us miserable and unhappy. Sin maketh nations miserable.[14549] We are wrong, says Salvian, in complaining of God when he deals hardly with us. Oh! how much more hardly do we deal with him, repaying with ingratitude the favors which he has bestowed on us![14550]

Sinners imagine that sin procures them happiness; but it is sin which makes them miserable, and afflicted in every respect. Because thou didst not serve the Lord thy God, saith the Lord, in joy and gladness of heart, . . . thou shalt serve thy enemy, whom the Lord will send upon thee, in hunger, and thirst, and nakedness, and in want of all things, . . . till He consume thee.[14551] Because thou hast not wished to serve thy God in the peace which all those taste who serve him, thou shalt serve thy enemy in poverty and affliction, until he shall have finished by making thee lose both soul and body. David says that the sinner by his crimes digs himself the pit into which he falls. He is fallen into the hole he made.[14552] Recollect the prodigal son: he, in order to live without restraint, and banquet as he pleased, left his father; but then, for having left his father, he is reduced to tend swine; reduced to such a degree of misery, that of the vile food with which the swine are filled, he has not wherewithal to fill himself: And he would fain have Jilted his belly with the husks the swine did eat, and no man gave unto him.[14553] St. Bernardine of Sienna,[14554] relates that a certain impious son dragged his father along the ground. What happened to him afterwards? One day he was himself dragged by his own son in like manner, when, arriving at a certain place, he exclaimed, "No more—stop here, no more—thus far did I drag my own father—stop." Baronins[14555] mentions a circumstance of a like nature, concerning the daughter of Herodias, who caused John the Baptist to be beheaded. He tells of her, that one day as she was crossing a frozen river, the ice broke under her, and she remained with her head only above the aperture. By dint of her struggles to save herself from death, she had her head severed from her body, and thus died. Oh, how just is not God, when the time of vengeance arrives! he causes the sinner to be caught, and strangled in the net which his own hands have made. The Lord shall be known when He executeth judgments, the sinner hath been caught in the works of his own hands.[14556]

Let us tremble, my brethren, when we see others punished, knowing as we do, that we ourselves have deserved the same punishments. When the tower of Siloe fell upon eighteen persons and killed them, the Lord said to many who were present: Think you that they also were debtors above all the men that dwelt in Jerusalem.[14557] Do you think that these wretches alone were in debt to God's justice on account of their sins? You a re yet debtors to it; and if you do not penance, you shall be punished as well as they: Except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish.[14558] O, how many unfortunate men damn themselves by false hope in the divine mercy? Yes, God is merciful, and therefore assists and protects them who hope in his mercy: He is the protector of all that trust in Him.[14559] But he assists and protects those only who hope in him, with the intention of changing their lives, not those whose hope is accompanied by a perverse intention of continuing to offend him. The hope of the latter is not acceptable to God, he abominates and punishes it:

Their hope the abomination of the soul.[14560] Poor sinners, their greatest misery is, that they are lost, and do not know their state. They jest, and they laugh, and they despise the threats of God, as if God had assured them that he should not punish them. "Whence," exclaims St. Bernard, "this accursed security?"[14561] Whence, O blind that you are, whence this accursed security? accursed, because it is this security which brings you to hell. I will come to them that are at rest, and dwell securely.[14562] The Lord is patient, but when the hour of chastisement arrives, then will he justly condemn to hell those wretches who continue in sin, and live in peace, as if there were no hell for them.

Let sin be no more for us, my brethren; let us be converted if we wish to escape the scourge which hangs over us. If we do not cease from sin, God will be obliged to punish us: For evil-doers shall be cut off.[14563] The obstinate are not only finally shut out from Paradise, but hurried off the earth, lest their example should draw others into hell. And let us reflect that these temporal scourges are nothing in comparison with those eternal chastisements, hope of relief from which there is none. Give ear, O sinner! my brother, give ear! For now the axe is laid to the root of the trees.[14564] The author of the Imperfect Work, in his comment upon this passage, says: "It is said that the axe is laid, not to the branches, but to the root, so that it will be irreparably exterminated."[14565] He says that when the branches are lopped, the tree continues still to live; but when the tree is felled from the root, it then dies, and is cast into the fire. The Lord stands with the scourge in his hand, and you still continue in disgrace with him. The axe is laid to the root. Tremble lest God should make you die in your sins, for if you die thus, you shall be cast into the fire of hell, where your ruin shall be hopeless for eternity.

But, you will say, I have committed many sins during the past, and the Lord has borne with me. I may, therefore, hope that he will deal mercifully with me for the future. God says, do not speak so: Say not I have sinned, and what harm hath befallen me? for the Most High is a patient rewarder.[14566] Do not say so, for God bears with you now, but he will not always bear with you. He endures to a certain extent, and then pays off all. Now, therefore, stand up, that I may plead in judgment against you concerning all the kindness of the Lord,[14567] said Samuel to the Hebrews. Oh how powerfully does not the abuse of the divine mercies assist in procuring the damnation of the ungrateful! Gather them together as sheep for a sacrifice, and prepare them for the day of slaughter.[14568] In the end the herd of those who will not be converted shall be victims of divine justice, and the Lord will condemn them to eternal death, on the day of slaughter, when the day of his vengeance shall have arrived (and we have reason always to be in dread, as long as we are not resolved to abandon sin, lest that day should be already near). God is not mocked; for what things a man shall sow, these also shall he reap.[14569] Sinners expect to mock God by confessing at Easter, or two or three times a year, and then returning to their vomit, and hoping after that to obtain salvation. "He is a mocker, not a penitent," says St. Isidor, "who continues to do that for which he is penitent;" but God is not mocked.

What salvation?—what salvation do you expect? For what things a man shall sow, them also shall he reap.[14570] What things do you sow? blasphemy, revenge, theft, impurity: what then do you hope for? He who sows in sin can hope to reap nothing but chastisements and hell. For he that soweth in his flesh, continues the same apostle, of his flesh also shall reap corruption.[14571] Continue, impure wretch! continue to live sunk in the mire of your impurity, your impurities will be converted into pitch within your bowels. "A day shall come," says St. Peter Damian, "a day shall come, or rather a night, when your lust shall be turned into pitch to feed an eternal flame within your bowels."[14572]

St. John Chrysostom says that some pretend not to see;[14573] they see the chastisements, and pretend not to see them. And then others, St. Ambrose says, have no fear of punishment until they see it has overtaken them.[14574] To all these it will happen as it did to mankind at the time of the deluge. The patriarch Noah foretold and announced to them the punishments which God had prepared for their sins; but the sinners would not believe him, and notwithstanding that the ark was building before their eyes, they did not change their lives, but went on sinning until the punishment was upon them, until they were smothered in the deluge. And they knew not till the flood came and took them all away.[14575] The same happened to the great Babylon, in the Apocalypse, who said: I sit a queen, and I shall not see grief.[14576] She persevered in her impurity in the hope of not being punished, but the chastisement at length came as had been predicted! Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death and mourning, and famine, and she shall be burnt with fire.[14577]

Brother, who knows whether this is not the last call which God may give you? Our Lord says that a certain owner of a vineyard, finding a fig-tree for the third year without fruit, said: Behold, for these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and I find none; cut it down therefore, why cumbereth it the ground?[14578] Then the dresser of the vine replied: Lord, let it alone this year also . . . and if happily it bear fruit—but if not, then, after that, thou shalt cut it down.[14579] Let 11s enter into ourselves, my brethren; for years has God been visiting our souls, and has found no other fruit therein than thorns and thistles, that is to say, sins. Hear how the divine justice exclaims, Cut it down therefore, why cumbereth it the earth? but mercy pleads, Let it alone this year also. Have courage, let us give it one trial more; let us see whether it will not be converted at this other call. But tremble lest the same mercy may not have granted to justice that if you do not now amend, your life shall be cut off, and your soul condemned to hell. Tremble, brother, and take measures that the mouth of the pit do not close over you. Such was the prayer of David: Let not the deep swallow me up; and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.[14580] It is that which sin effects, causing the mouth of the pit, that is, the state of damnation into which the sinner has fallen, to close over him by degrees. As long as that pit is not entirely closed, there is some hope of escape; but if it once shut, what further hope remains for you? By the closing of the pit, I mean the sinner's being shut out from every glimmer of grace, and stopping at nothing; that being the accomplishment of what the wise man has said: The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins, contemneth.[14581] He despises the laws of God, admonitions, sermons, excommunications, threats—he Jespises hell itself; so that persons have been known to say, numbers go to hell, and I amongst the rest. Can the man who speaks so be saved? He can be saved, but it is morally impossible he should. Brother, what do you say? Perhaps you have yourself come to the contempt of the chastisements of God. What do you say? Well, and if you had, what should you do? Should you despair? No; you know what you have to do. Have recourse to the Mother of God. Although you should be in despair, and abandoned by God, Blosius says, that Mary is the hope of the despairing, and the aid of the abandoned.[14582] St. Bernard says the same thing when he exclaims, The despairing man who hopes in thee ceases to be desperate.[14583] But if God wishes that I should be lost, what hope can there be for me? But, says God, no, my son, I do not wish to see you lost: I desire not the death of the wicked.[14584] And what then do you desire, O Lord? I wish him to be converted, and recover the life of my grace: But that the wicked turn from his way and live.[14585] Haste then, brother, fling yourself at the feet of Jesus Christ; behold him! see how he stands with his arms open to embrace you, etc. (Here an act of contrition is made.)

THIRD DISCOURSE.

GOD IS MERCIFUL FOR A SEASON, AND THEN CHASTISES

"Indulsisligenti, Domine, indulsisti genti; numquid glorificatus es?"

"Thou hast been favorable to the nation, O Lord, thou hast been favorable to the nation; hast thou been glorified?"—Isa. xxvi. 15.

LORD, Thou hast often pardoned this people; Thou hast threatened it with destruction by earthquake, by pestilence, in neighboring countries; by the infirmities and death of its own citizens; but Thou hast afterwards taken pity on them: Thou hast been favorable to the nation, O Lord, Thou hast been favorable to the nation; hast Thou been glorified?[14586] Thou hast pardoned us, Thou hast dealt mercifully with us; what hast Thou received in return? Have Thy people abandoned their sins? have they changed their lives? No, they have gone on from bad to worse; that momentary fear passed, they have begun afresh to offend Thee and provoke Thy wrath.—But, my brethren, perhaps you imagine that God will always wait, always pardon, and never punish? No; GOD IS MERCIFUL FOR A SEASON; THEN HE PUNISHES; this is the subject of this day's discourse.

We must persuade ourselves that God cannot do otherwise than hate sin; he is holiness itself, and therefore cannot but hate that monster, his enemy, whose malice is altogether opposed to the perfection of God. And if God hate sin, he must necessarily hate the sinner who makes league with sin. But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike.[14587] O God, with what an expression of grief and with what reason do you not complain of those who despise yon, to take part with your enemy. Hear, O ye heavens, and give ear, O earth for the Lord hath spoken; I have brought up children, and exalted them; but they have despised Me.[14588] Hear, O ye heavens, he says, and give car, O earth, witness the ingratitude with which I am treated by men. I have brought them up, and exalted them as my children, and they have repaid me with contempt and outrage. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel hath not known Me, . . . they are gone away backwards. [14589] The beast of the field, the ox and the ass, continues the Lord, know their master, and are grateful to him, but my children have not known me, and have turned their back upon me. But how is this? "Services are remembered even by beasts,"[14590] says Seneca. The very brutes are grateful to their benefactors; see that dog how he serves and obeys, and is faithful to his master, who feeds him; even the wild beasts, the tiger and the lion are grateful to those who feed them. And God, my brethren, who till now has provided us with everything, who has given us food and raiment: What more? who has kept us in existence up to the moment when we offended him,—how have we treated him?

How do we purpose to act in future? Do we not think to live on as we have been living? Do we not perhaps think that there is no punishment, no hell for us? But hearken and know that as the Lord cannot but hate sin, because he is holy, so he cannot but chastise it when the sinner is obstinate, because he is just.

When he does chastise, it is not to please himself, but because we drive him to it. The wise man says that God did not create hell, through a desire of condemning man thereto, and that he does not rejoice in their damnation, because he does not wish to see his creatures perish: For God made not death, neither hath He pleasure in the destruction of the living; for He created all things that they might be. [14591] No gardener plants a tree in order to cut it down and burn it. It was not God's desire to see us miserable and in torment; and therefore, says St. John Chrysostom, he waits so long before he takes vengeance of the sinner.[14592] He waits for our conversion, that he may then be able to use his mercy in our regard. Therefore the Lord waiteth, that He may have mercy on you.[14593] Our God, says the same St. John Chrysostom, is in haste to save, and slow to condemn.[14594] When there is question of pardon, no sooner has the sinner repented than he is forgiven by God. Scarcely had David said Peccavi, Domino, when he was informed by the prophet that his pardon was already granted: The Lord also hath taken away thy sin.[14595] Yes, because "we do not desire pardon so anxiously as he desires to pardon us," says the same holy Doctor.[14596] On the other hand, when there is question of punishment, he waits, he admonishes, he sends us warning of it beforehand: For the Lord God doth nothing without revealing His secret to His servants, the prophets.[14597]

But when, at length, God sees that we are willing to yield neither to benefits, nor threats, nor admonitions, and that we will not amend, then he is forced by our own selves to punish us, and while punishing us, he will place before our eyes the great mercies he before extended to us: Thou thoughtest unjustly that I shall be like to thee; but I will reprove thee, and set before thy face. [14598] He will then say to the sinner, think you, O sinner, that I had forgotten, as you had done, the outrages you put upon me, and the graces I dispensed to you? St. Augustine says that God does not hate but loves us, and that he only hates our sins.[14599] He is not wroth with men, says St. Jerome, but with their sins.[14600] The saint says, that by his nature God is inclined to benefit us, and that it is we ourselves who oblige him to chastise us, and assume the appearance of severity, which he has not of himself.[14601] It is this which David means to express, when he says that the Lord in chastising is like a drunken man who strikes in his sleep: And the Lord was awaked as one out of sleep, and He smote His enemies.[14602] Theodoret adds that, as drunkenness is not natural to man, so chastisement does not naturally belong to God; it is we who force him into that wrath which is not his by nature.[14603] St. Jerome, reflecting on those words which Jesus Christ on the day of general judgment will address to the reprobate, Depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire, which was prepared for the devil and his angels,[14604] inquires, who has prepared this fire for sinners? God perhaps. No, because God never created souls for hell, as the impious Luther taught: this fire has been kindled for sinners by their own sins.[14605] He who sows in sin, shall reap chastisement. He that soweth iniquity, shall reap evil.[14606] When the soul commits sin, it voluntarily obliges itself to pay the penalty thereof, and thus condemns itself to the pains of hell. For you have said, we have entered into a league with death, and we have made a covenant with hell.[14607] Hence St. Ambrose well says, that God has not condemned any one, but that each one is the author of his own chastisement.[14608] And the Holy Ghost says, that the sinner shall be consumed by the hatred which he bears himself; with the rod of his anger he shall be consumed.[14609] He, says Salvian, who offends God has no more cruel enemy than himself, since he himself has caused the torments which he suffers.[14610] God, he continues, does not wish to see us in affliction, but it is we who draw down sufferings upon ourselves, and by our sins enkindle the flames in which we are to burn.[14611] God punishes us, because we oblige him to punish us.

But I know, you say, the mercies of God are great: no matter how manifold my sins, I have in view a change of life by and by, and God will have mercy upon me. But no, God desires you not to speak thus. And say not the mercy of the Lord is great, He will have mercy on the multitude of my sins.[14612] And why has the Lord forbidden you to say so? The reason is this, for mercy and wrath quickly come from Him.[14613] Yes, it is true, God has patience, God waits for some sinners; I say some, for there are some whom God does not wait for at all; how many has he not sent to hell immediately after the first transgression? Others he does wait for, but he will not always wait for them; he spares them for a certain time and then punishes. The Lord patiently expecteth, that when the day of judgment shall come, He may punish them in the fulness of their sins.[14614] Mark well, when the day of judgment shall come: when the day of vengeance shall arrive, in the fulness of their sins. When the measure of sins which God has determined to pardon is filled up, he will punish. Then the Lord will have no mercy, and will chastise unremittingly.

The city of Jericho did not fall during the first circuit made by the Ark, it did not fall at the fifth, or at the sixth, but it fell at last at the seventh.[14615] And thus it will happen with thee, says St. Augustine, "at the seventh circuit made by the Ark the city of vanity will fall."[14616] God has pardoned you your first sin, your tenth, your seventieth, perhaps your thousandth; he has often called you, now calls you again; tremble lest this should be the last circuit taken by the ark, that is, the last call, after which, if you do not change your life, it will be over with you. For the earth, says the Apostle, that drinketh in the rain which cometh often upon it . . . and bringeth forth thorns and briars is reprobate, and very near unto a curse, whose end is to be burned.[14617] That soul, he says, which has often received the waters of divine light and grace, and instead of bearing fruit produces nought but the thorns of sin, is nigh unto a curse, and its end will be to burn eternally in hell fire. In a word, when the period comes, God punishes.

And let us know, that when God wishes to punish, he is able and knows how to do it. The daughter of Sion shall be left . . . as a city that is laid waste.[14618] How many cities do we not know to have been destroyed and levelled with the ground, by reason of the sins of the inhabitants, whom God could no longer bear with! One day, Jesus Christ being within sight of the city of Jerusalem, gazed upon it, and thinking of the ruin which her crimes were to draw down upon her, our Redeemer, who is so full of compassion for our miseries, began to weep: Seeing the city, He wept over it, saying: They shall not leave in thee a stone upon a stone, because thou hast not known the time of thy visitation.[14619] Poor city, there shall not be left in thee a stone upon a stone, because thou hast not been willing to know the grace which I gave thee in visiting Thee with so many benefits, and bestowing upon thee so many tokens of my love; whilst thou hast ungratefully despised me, and driven me away. Jerusalem Jerusalem, . . . how often would I have gathered thy children and thou wouldst not, behold your house shall be left to you desolate.[14620] Sinful brother, who knows whether God does not at this moment look upon your soul and weep? Perhaps he sees that you will not turn to account this visit which he now pays you, this summons which he gives you to change your life. How often would I . . . and thou wouldst not. How often, says the Lord, have I wished to draw you to me by the lights which I have given you? How often have I called you and you would not hear me? You have been deaf to me and fled from me. Behold your house shall be left to you desolate. Behold I am already on the point of abandoning you, and it I abandon you, your ruin will be inevitable, irreparable.

We would have cured Babylon, but she is not humbled; let us forsake her.[14621] The physician when he sees that the patient will not adopt his remedies, which he himself carries to him with so much kindness, and which the other flings out of the window—what does he do at length? He turns his back upon him and abandons him. My brethren, by how many remedies, by how many inspirations, by how many calls, has not God endeavored to avert damnation from you? What more can he do? If you damn yourself, can you complain of God who has called you in so many different ways? God calls you by the voice of his minister, he calls you by the voice that is within you, he calls you by his favors, he calls you lastly by temporal punishments; in order that you may learn to dread those which are eternal. St. Bernardine of Sienna says that for certain sins, more especially those which are scandalous, there is no more effectual method of doing away with them than by temporal punishments.[14622] But when the Lord sees that his favors serve only to make the sinner more insolent in his evil life, when he sees that his threats are disregarded, when he perceives, in a word, that he speaks and is not heard; then he abandons the sinner, and chastises him with eternal death. Therefore does he say, Because I called and you refused . . . and have neglected my reprehensions, I will also laugh in your destruction and will mock when that shall come which you feared.[14623] You, says God, have laughed at my words, my threats, and my chastisements, your last chastisement shall come, and then I will laugh at ye. And it (the rod) was turned into a serpent.[14624] St. Bruno, in his commentary upon this passage, says, "the rod is turned into a serpent when they will not amend."[14625] The eternal will succeed the temporal punishment.

Oh how well does not God know how to chastise, and so to order it that from the instruments and motives of sin should be drawn the chastisement! That they might know that by what things a man sinneth, by the same also he is tormented.[14626] The Jews put Jesus Christ to death for fear the Romans should seize on their possessions. If we let Him alone, said they, all will believe in Him, and the Romans will come and take away our place and nation.[14627] But the same sin of putting Jesus Christ to death was the cause of their being shortly after despoiled of everything by the Romans. "They feared they should lose temporal possessions," says St. Augustine, "and thought not of eternal life, and so lost both.''[14628] In trying to save their possessions, they lost their souls; the punishment came, and they lost both. Thus it falls out with many; they lose their souls for the things of earth; but God often condemns them to beggary in this world, and reprobation in the next.

My brethren, provoke no longer the anger of your God, know that in proportion to the multitude of his mercies towards you, in proportion to the length of time he has borne with you, your punishment will be greater if you do not amend. "The Lord makes up for the slow ness of his chastisement," says St. Gregory, "by its grievousness when it does come."[14629] Woe to thee, Corozain, thus does the Lord speak to a soul that has abused his favors, Woe to thee Bethsaida, for if in Tyre and Sidon had been wrought the mighty things which have been wrought in you, they would have done penance long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes.[14630] Yes, my brethren, if the graces which have been given to you had been given to a Turk or an Indian, if in Tyre and Sidon had been wrought the mighty works which have been wrought in you, he would have now been a saint, or at least have done great penance for his sins; and have you become a saint? have you at least done penance for your many mortal sins, for your many evil thoughts, words, and scandals? see you not how God is angry with you? how he stands with his scourge in his hand ? Do you see not death hanging over you.

And what are we to do? you inquire: are we to despair? No, God does not wish us to despair. Let us go with confidence to the throne of grace: that is what we are to do, as St. Paul exhorts us, in order that we may obtain mercy, and find grace in seasonable aid.[14631] Let us at once go to the throne of grace that we may receive the pardon of our sins, and the remission of the punishment which overhangs us. By seasonable aid the Apostle means to convey that the aid which God may be willing to lend us to-day he may deny to-morrow. At once, then, to the throne of grace.

But what is the throne of grace? Jesus Christ, my brethren, is the throne of grace. And He is the propitiation for our sins.[14632] Jesus it is who by the merit of his blood can obtain pardon for us, but we must apply immediately. The Redeemer, during his preaching in Juda, cured the sick, and dispensed other favors as he went along; whoever was on the spot to ask a favor of him, obtained it; but whoever was negligent, and allowed him to pass without a request, remained as he was. Who went about doing good.[14633] It was this caused St. Augustine to say: "I fear Jesus passing by;"[14634] by which he meant to express that when the Lord offers us his grace, we must immediately correspond, doing our utmost to obtain it, that otherwise he will pass on and leave us without it. To-day, if you shall hear His voice, harden not your hearts.[14635] To-day God calls you; give yourself to God to-day; if you wait for to-morrow, intending to give yourself to him then, perhaps he will have ceased to call, and you will remain deserted.

Mary, the Queen and the mother of mercies, is also a throne of grace, as St. Antoninus says. Hence, if you see that God is angry with you, St. Bonaventure exhorts you to have recourse to the hope of sinners.[14636] "Go, have recourse to the hope of sinners: Mary is the hope of sinners, Mary who is called the mother of holy hope.[14637] But we must take notice that holy hope is the hope of that sinner who repents him of his evil ways, and determines upon a change of life; but if any one pursues an evil course in the hope that Mary will succor and save him, such a hope is false, such a hope is bad and rash. Let us then repent of our sins, resolve to amend, and then have recourse to Mary with a confidence that she will assist and save us. (Act of contrition.)

FOURTH DISCOURSE.

THE FOUR PRINCIPAL GATES OF HELL

"Defixæ sunt in terra portæ ejus."

"Her gates are sunk into the ground."—Lam. ii. 9.

Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who go in thereat. [14638] Hell has then different gates, but these gates stand on our earth. Her gates are sunk into the ground. [14639] These are the vices by which men offend God, and draw down upon themselves chastisements and eternal death. Amongst the other vices, there are four which send most souls to hell, and on this earth bring upon men the scourges of God; and these four are, HATRED, BLASPHEMY, THEFT, and IMPURITY. Behold, the four gates by which the greater number of souls enter hell; and it is of these four that I mean to speak to-day, in order that you may amend and cure yourselves of these four vices, otherwise God will cure you of them, but by your own destruction.

1. HATRED

The first gate of hell is hatred. As paradise is the kingdom of love, so hell is the kingdom of hatred. Father, says such a person, I am grateful to and love my friends, but I cannot endure him who does me an injury. Now, brother, you must know that the barbarians, the Turks and Indians say and do all this: Do not also the heathens this? [14640] says the Lord. To wish well to him who serves you is a natural thing; it is done not only by the infidel, but even by the brutes and wild beasts. But I say to you. [14641] Hear what I say to you says Jesus Christ; hear my law, which is a law of love: Love your enemies. [14642] I wish, that you, my disciples, should love even your enemies. Do good to them that hate you; [14643] you must do good to them that wish you ill, and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you; [14644] if you can do nothing else, you must pray for them who persecute you, and then you shall be the children of God your father: that you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven. [14645] St. Augustine then is right in saying that it is by love alone a child of God is known from a child of the devil. [14646] Thus have the saints always done; they have loved their enemies. A certain woman had traduced the honor of St. Catharine of Sienna, and the saint attended this same woman in her sickness, and ministered to her as a servant. St. Acaius sold his garment to succor one who had taken away his character. St. Ambrose gave to an assassin, who had attempted his life, a daily allowance, in order that he might have wherewithal to live. Such may indeed be called the children of God. Is it a great matter, says St. Thomas of Villanova, that often when we have received an injury from any one we forgive it at the suit of a friend who pleads for him? And shall we not do the same when God commands it?

Oh, how well grounded a hope of pardon has not he who pardons the man who has offended him. He has the promise of God himself, who says, Forgive, and you shall be forgiven. [14647] "By forgiving others," says St. John Chrysostom, "you earn pardon for yourself." [14648] But he, on the contrary, who will have vengeance, how can he hope for pardon for his sins? Such a person, in saying the "Our Father," condemns himself when he says: "forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." [14649] Then, when such a person wishes to take vengeance, he says to God: Lord, do not pardon me, because I will not pardon my enemies. You give judgment in your own cause, says St. John Chrysostom. [14650] But, be assured, that you shall be judged without mercy if you show not mercy to your neighbor. For judgment without mercy to him that hath not done judgment. [14651] But how, says St. Augustine, how can he who will not forgive his enemy, according to the command of God, have the face to ask pardon from God for his offences. [14652]

If then, my brethren, you wish to have revenge, bid adieu to paradise: Without are dogs. [14653] Dogs, on account of their natural fury, are taken to represent the revengeful. These dogs are shut out from paradise; they have a hell in this life; and they shall have hell in the next. "He who is at enmity with any one," says St. John Chrysostom, "never enjoys peace: he is in everlasting trouble." [14654]

But, Father, such a one has taken away my good name, which I will renounce for no one. [14655] Such is, forsooth, the proverb, ever in the mouths of those hellhounds who seek for revenge. He has taken away my honor, I must take his life. And is the life of a man at your disposal? God alone is master of life. For it is Thou, O Lord, that hast the power of life and death. [14656] Do you wish to take vengeance of your enemy? God wishes to lake vengeance of thee. Vengeance belongs to God alone. Revenge is Mine, and I will repay them in due time. [14657]

But how else, you say, can my honor be repaired? Well, and in order to repair your honor, you must trample under foot the honor of God. Do you not know, says St. Paul, that when you transgress the law you dishonor God? Thou by transgression of the law dishonorest God. [14658] And what honor is this of yours that you wish to repair? It is the same as the honor of a Turk, of an idolater: a Christian's honor is to obey God, and observe his law.

But other men will look down upon me; and so, for fear you should be looked down upon, you must condemn yourself to hell. But if you forgive, the good will praise you; wherefore it is, that St. John Chrysostom says: If you wish to be revenged, do good to your enemy, because then others will condemn your enemy, [14659] and speak well of you. It is not true that he loses his honor, who, when he has been injured or insulted, says: I am a Christian, I neither can nor will be revenged. Such a person gains instead of losing honor, and, besides, saves his soul. On the contrary, he who takes revenge will be punished by God, not only in the other life, but in this also. He is obliged to flee from the justice of men, after having taken that vengeance which will render his life henceforward miserable. What an unhappiness to live a fugitive; to be always in dread of justice; always in dread of the kindred of his victim; tormented with remorse of conscience, and condemned to hell?

And let us further know, my brethren, that revenge and the desire of revenge are alike enormous, are the same sin. Should we at any time receive an offence, what are we to do? When our passion begins to rise, we must have recourse to God, and to the most holy Mary, who will help us, and obtain strength for us to forgive. We should then endeavor to say: Lord, for the love of Thee I forgive the injury that has been done me, and do Thou in Thy mercy forgive me all the injuries I have done Thee.

2. BLASPHEMY. [14660]

Let us pass on to the second gate of hell, which is blasphemy. Some, when things go wrong with them, do not attack man, but endeavor to wreak their vengeance upon God himself by blasphemy. Know, my brethren, what manner of sin blasphemy is. A certain author says: "Every sin, compared with blasphemy, is light;" [14661] and first of all, St. John Chrysostom says, there is nothing worse than blasphemy. [14662] Other sins, says St. Bernard, are committed through frailty, but this only through malice. [14663] With reason, then, does St. Bernardine of Sienna call blasphemy a diabolical sin, because the blasphemer, like a demon, attacks God himself. He is worse than those who crucified Jesus Christ, because they did not know him to be God; but he who blasphemes knows him to be God, and insults him face to face. He is worse than the dogs, because dogs do not bite their masters, who feed them, but the blasphemer outrages God, who is at that very moment bestowing favors on him. What punishment, says St. Augustine, will suffice to chastise so horrid a crime?[14664] We should not wonder, says Julius III., that the scourges of God do not cease while such a crime exists among us.[14665]

Lorino[14666] cites the following fact: We read in the preface to the Pragmatic Sanction in France, that King Robert, when praying for the peace of the kingdom, was answered by the crucifix that the kingdom never should have had peace if he had not eradicated blasphemy. The Lord threatens to destroy the kingdom in which this accursed vice reigns. They have blasphemed the Holy One of Israel; . . your land is desolate, . . . it shall be desolate.[14667]

Oh, if there were always found some one to do what St. John Chrysostom advises: "Strike his mouth, and sanctify thereby thy hand."[14668] The mouth of the accursed blasphemer should be struck, and he should then be stoned, as the old law commanded: And he that blasphemth the name of the Lord, dying let him die: all the multitude shall stone him.[14669] But it would be better if that were done which St. Louis, King of France, put in force: he commanded by edict that every blasphemer should be branded on the mouth with an iron. A certain nobleman having blasphemed, many persons besought the king not to inflict that punishment upon him; but St. Louis insisted upon its infliction in every instance; and some taxing him with excessive cruelty on that account, he replied that he would suffer his own mouth to be burned sooner than allow such an outrage to be put upon God in his kingdom.

Tell me, blasphemer, of what country are you? Allow me to tell you, you belong to hell. St. Peter was known in the house of Caiphas for a Galilean by his speech. Surely thou also art one of them, it was said to him, for even thy speech doth discover thee.[14670] What is the language of the damned?—blasphemy. And they blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and wounds.[14671] What do you gain, my brethren, by these your blasphemies? you gain no honor by them. Blasphemers are abhorred even by their blasphemous companions. Do you gain any temporal advantage? Do you not see that this accursed vice keeps us forever in beggary? Sin maketh nations miserable.[14672] Do you derive pleasure from it? What pleasure do you derive from blaspheming God? The pleasure of the damned; and that moment of madness past, what pain and bitterness does it not leave in your hear? Resolve to rid yourself of this vice in any event. Take care, if you do not abandon it now, that you will not carry it with you to death, as has happened to so many who have died with blasphemy in their mouths. But, Father, what can I do when the madness comes upon me? Good God! and are there no other means of working it off than by blasphemy? Say, cursed be my sins. Mother of God, assist me, give me patience; your passion, your anger, will pass off quickly, and you will find yourself in the grace of God after the trial. If you do not act thus, you will find yourself more afflicted and more lost than before.

3. THEFT.[14673]

Let us now pass on to the consideration of the third great gate of hell by which so large a portion of the damned enter; I mean theft, borne, so to speak, adore money as their God, and look upon it as the object of all their desires. The idols of the Gentiles are silver and gold.[14674] But the sentence of condemnation has already been pronounced against such: or thieves . . . nor extortioners shall possess the kingdom of God.[14675] It is true that theft is not the most enormous of sins, but St. Antoninus says that it very much endangers salvation. The reason is because for the remission of other sins true repentance only is required; but repentance is not enough for the remission of theft: there must be restitution, and this is made with difficulty. A certain hermit had once the following vision: he saw Lucifer seated on a throne, and inquiring of one of his demons why he had been so long about returning. The latter replied that he had been detained by his endeavors to tempt a thief not to restore what he had stolen. Let this fool be severely punished, said Lucifer. To what purpose have you spent this time? do you not know that he who has taken the property of another never restores it? And, in truth, so it is: the property of another becomes to him who takes it like his own blood; and the pain of suffering one's blood to be drawn for another is very difficult to endure. We learn it every day from experience: innumerable thefts take place; how much restitution do you see?

My brethren, see that you take not the property of your neighbor, and if during the past you have ever failed in this respect, make restitution as soon as possible. If you cannot at once make full restitution, do it by degrees. Know that the property of another in your possession will not only be the means of bringing you to hell, but will make you miserable even in this life. Thou hast despoiled others, says the prophet, and others shall despoil thee. Because thou hast spoiled many nations, all that shall be left of the people shall spoil thee.[14676] The property of another brings with it a curse which will fall upon the entire house of the thief. This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the earth, . . . and it shall come to the house of the thief;[14677] that is to say (as St. Gregory Nazianzen explains it), that the thief shall lose not only the stolen property, but his own[14678] The goods of another are as fire and smoke to consume everything that comes in their way.

Remember well, mothers and wives, when children or husbands bring home the property of their neighbor, remember well to chide and reprove them; not to applaud their action, or even consent to it by silence.

Tobias hearing a lamb bleat in his house, Take heed, said he, lest perhaps it be stolen; restore ye it to its owners.[14679] St Ausjustine says that Tobias, because he loved God, did not wish to hear the sound of theft in his house.[14680] Some persons take the property of their neighbor, and then are fain to quiet their consciences by alms-deeds. Christ, says St. John Chrysostom, will not be fed with the plunder of others.[14681] The sins of this kind, committed by the great, are acts of injustice, the injuries that they inflict upon others, the taking from the poor of what is their due. These are descriptions of theft which require perfect restitution, and a restitution most difficult of all to make, and most likely to be the cause of one's damnation.

4. IMPURITY

We have now, lastly, to speak of the fourth gate of hell, which is impurity, and it is by this gate that the greater number of the damned enter. Some will say that it is a trifling sin. Is it a trifling sin? It is a mortal sin. St. Antoninus writes, that such is the nauseousness of this sin; that the devils themselves cannot endure it. Moreover, the Doctors of the Church say that certain demons, who have been superior to the rest, remembering their ancient dignity, disdain tempting to so loathsome a sin. Consider then how disgusting he must be to God, who, like a dog, is ever returning to his vomit, or wallowing like a pig in the stinking mire of this accursed vice. The dog is returned to his vomit; and the sow that was washed, to her rolling in the mire.[14682]

The impure say, moreover, God has compassion on us who are subject to this vice, because he knows that we are flesh. What do you say? God has compassion on this vice. But you must know that the most horrible chastisements with which God has ever visited the earth have been drawn down by this vice. St. Jerome says that this is the only sin of which we read that it caused God to repent him of having made man. It repented Him that had made man; . . . for all flesh had corrupted its way.[14683] Wherefore it is, St. Jerome says,[14684] that there is no sin which God punishes so rigorously, even upon earth, as this. He once sent fire from heaven upon five cities, and consumed all their inhabitants for this sin. Principally on account of this sin did God destroy mankind, with the exception of eight persons, by the deluge. It is a sin which God punishes, not only in the other life, but in this also. In confirmation of this, you have only to enter the hospitals, and see there the many poor young men, who were once strong and robust, but are now weak, squalid, full of pains, tormented with lancets and caustic, and ulcers, all through this accursed vice. Because thou hast forgotten Me and cast Me off behind thy back, bear thou also thy wickedness and thy fornications.[14685] Because, says God, you have forgotten me and turned your back upon me, for a miserable pleasure of the flesh, I am resolved that even in this life you shall pay the forfeit of your wickedness.

You say, God has compassion upon men subject to this sin. But it is this sin that sends most men to hell. St. Remigius says, that the greater number of the damned are in hell through this vice. Father Segneri writes, that as this vice fills the world with sinners, so it fills hell with damned souls; and before him St. Bernardine of Sienna wrote: "This sin draws the whole world, as it were, into sin."[14686] And before him St. Bernard, St. Isidore, said, that "the human race is brought under the power of the devil more by lust than by all the other vices."[14687] The reason is, because this vice proceeds from the natural inclination of the flesh. Hence the angelic Doctor says, that the devil does not take such complacency in securing the commission of any other sin as of this, because the person who is plunged in this infernal mire remains fast therein, and almost wholly unable to free himself more. "No one is so obstinate in sin as the impure,"[14688] says St. Thomas of Villanova. Moreover, this vice deprives one of all light, for the impure man becomes so blind as almost wholly to forget God, says St. Laurence Justinian;[14689] which is in accordance with what is said by the prophet Osee: They will not set their thoughts to return to their God; for the spirit of fornication is in the midst of them, and they have not known God.[14690] The impure man knows not God; he obeys neither God nor reason, as St. Jerome says; he obeys only the sensual appetite which causes him to act the beast.[14691]

This sin, because it flatters, makes us fall at once into the habit of it, a habit which some carry with them even to death. You see husbands, and decrepit old men, indulge in the same thoughts and committing the same sins that they committed in their youth. And because sins of this kind are so easily committed, they become multiplied without number. Ask of the sinner how many impure thoughts he has consented to: he will tell you he cannot remember. But, brother, if you cannot tell the number, God can; and you know that a single immodest thought is enough to send you to hell. How many immodest words have you spoken, in which you took delight yourself, and by which you scandalized your neighbor? From thoughts and words you proceed to acts, and to those innumerable impurities which those wretches roll and wallow in like swine,[14692] without ever being satisfied, for this vice is never satisfied.

But, Father, you will say, how can I hold out against the innumerable temptations which assail me? I am weak, I am flesh. And since you are weak, why not recommend yourself to God, and to most holy Mary, who is the mother of purity? Since you are flesh, why do you throw yourself in the way of sin? Why do you not mortify your eyes? Why do you gaze upon those objects whence temptations flow? St. Aloysius never raised his eyes to look even upon his mother.

It is to be remarked, moreover, that this sin brings with it innumerable others: enmities, thefts, and, more especially, sacrilegious confessions and Communions, by reason of the shame which will not allow these impurities to be disclosed in confession. And let us remark herein passing, that it is sacrilege above all things, that brings upon us sickness and death; for, says the Apostle, He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself not discerning the body of the Lord; and then he adds: therefore are many infirm and weak among you.[14693] And St. John Chrysostom, in explanation of that passage, says that St. Paul speaks of persons who were chastised with bodily infirmities, because they received the sacrament with a guilty conscience.[14694]

My brethren, should you ever have been sunk in this vice, I do not bid you be disheartened, but arise at once from this foul and infernal pit; beg of God forthwith to give you light, and stretch out his hand to you. The first thing that you have to do is to break with the occasion of sin: without that, preaching and tears and resolutions and confessions, all are lost. Remove the occasions, and then constantly recommend yourself to God, and to Mary the mother of purity. No matter how grievously you may be tempted, do not be discouraged by the temptation; at once call to your aid Jesus and Mary, pronouncing their sacred names. These blessed names have the virtue of making the devil fly, and stifling that hellish flame within you. If the devil persist in tempting you, persevere in calling upon Jesus and Mary, and certainly you shall not fall. In order to rid yourself of your evil habits, undertake some special devotion to our Lady; begin to fast in her honor upon Saturdays; contrive to visit her image every day, and beg of her to obtain for you deliverance from that vice. Every morning immediately after rising, never omit saying three "Hail Marys" in honor of her purity and do the same when going to bed; and above all things, as I have said, when the temptation is most troublesome, call quickly upon Jesus and Mary. Beware, brother, if you do not be converted now, you may never be converted. (Act of contrition.)

FIFTH DISCOURSE.

EXTERNAL DEVOTIONS ARE USELESS IF WE DO NOT CLEANSE OUR SOULS FROM SIN

"Et nunc nolite illudere ut forte constringantur vincula tua."

"And now do not mock, lest your bonds be tied strait."—Isa. xxvii. 22.

GOD commands Jonas to go and preach to Ninive. Jonas, instead of obeying God, flies by sea towards Tharsis. But, behold! a great tempest threatens to sink the ship; and Jonas knowing that the tempest was raised in punishment of his disobedience, said to the crew of the vessel: Take me up and cast me into the sea, and the sea shall be calm to you; for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you.[14695] And they actually did cast him into the sea, and the tempest ceased thereupon. And the sea ceased from raging.[14696] Then if Jonas had not been thrown into the sea the tempest should not have ceased. Consider well, my brethren, what we are to learn from this. It is, that if we do not cast sin out of our souls, the tempest, that is, the scourge of God, will not cease. The tempest is excited by our sins; the tempest which is hurrying us to destruction. Our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.[14697] Behold, we have penitential exercises, novenas, and exposition of the Blessed Sacrament; but to what purpose are those if we be not converted, if we do not rid our souls of sin? The subject of our discourse is: EXTERNAL DEVOTIONS ARE USELESS, IF WE DO NOT ABANDON OUR SINS; because otherwise we cannot please God.

It is said that the pain is not removed before the thorn has been plucked out. St. Jerome writes that God is never angered, since anger is passion, and passion is incompatible with God. He is always tranquil; and even in the act of punishing, his tranquillity is not in the least disturbed. But Thou being master of power, judgest with tranquillity.[14698] But the malice of mortal sin is so great, that if God were capable of wrath and affliction, it would enrage and afflict him. It is this that sinners do as far as in them lies, according to that of Isaias: But they provoked to wrath, and afflicted the spirit of His holy one.[14699] Moses writes, that when God was about to send the deluge, he declared himself to be so much afflicted by the sins of men as to be obliged to exterminate them from the earth. And being touched inwardly with sorrow of heart, He said, I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth.[14700]

St. John Chrysostom says that sin is the only cause of all our sufferings and chastisements.[14701] Commenting upon these words in Genesis which the Lord spoke after the deluge, I will place My bow in the clouds,[14702] St. Ambrose[14703] remarks that God does not say I will place my arrow, but my bow, in the clouds; giving us thereby to understand that it is always the sinner who fixes the arrow in the bow of God by provoking him to chastisement.

If we wish to be pleasing to the Lord, we must remove the cause of his anger, which is sin. The man sick of the palsy besought Jesus Christ to restore the health of his body; but, before granting his request, our Lord first restored his soul's health by giving him sorrow for his sins, and then saying to him: Be of good heart, son; thy sins are forgiven thee.[14704] St. Thomas says that the Redeemer first removed the cause of his infirmity, namely, his sins, and then freed him from the infirmity itself. "He asked for the health of the body, and the Lord gave him the health of the soul; because, like a good physician, he wished to take away the root of the evil."[14705] Sin is the root of every evil, as we find in St. Bernardine of Sienna.[14706] Hence the Lord after having healed him, warned him against sin in these words: Go thy way, and sin no more, lest something worse befall thee.[14707] Ecclesiasticus said the same before our Lord: My son, in thy sickness . . . cleanse thy heart from sin, . . . and then give place to the physician.[14708] You must first apply to the physician of the soul in order that he may free you from your sins, and then to the physician of the body that he may cure you of your disease.

In a word, the cause of all our chastisements is sin; and still more than sin, our obstinacy in it, as St. Basil says.[14709] We have offended God, and are, notwithstanding, unwilling to do penance. When God calls by the voice of his punishment, he desires that he should be heard; if he be not, he shall be compelled by ourselves to curse us: But if thou wilt not hear the voice of the Lord thy God . . . all these curses shall come upon thee; . . . cursed shaft thou be in the city, cursed in the field.[14710] . . . When we offend God, we provoke all creatures to punish us. St. Anselm says that in the same manner as a servant, when he offends his master, draws down upon him the wrath, not only of his master, but of the whole family; so we, when we offend God, excite against us the anger of all creatures.[14711] And St. Gregory says that we have more especially irritated against us those creatures which we have made use of against our Creator.[14712] God's mercy holds in those creatures that they may not afflict us, but when he sees that we make no account of his threats, and continue to live on in our former way, he will then make use of those creatures to take vengeance on us for the injuries we have done him: He will arm the creature for the revenge of His enemies. And the whole world shall fight with Him against the unwise.[14713] "There is no creature," says St. John Chrysostom, "which will not feel anger when it sees its Lord in anger."[14714]

If then, my brethren, we do not appease God by our conversion, we never shall be free from chastisement. What folly, says St. Gregory, could be more extreme than to imagine that God should cease to chastise before we should have ceased to offend?[14715] Many now come to the church, and hear the sermon, but go away without confession, or change of life. If we do not remove the cause of the scourge, how can we expect to be delivered from the scourge itself.[14716] Such is the reflection of St. Jerome. We continue to irritate God, and then wonder that God should continue to chastise us. "Impure as we are," says Salvian, "we wonder why we should be so miserable."[14717] Do we think that God is appeased by the mere circumstance of our appearing at church without repenting of our sins, without restoring the property or character of our neighbor, without avoiding those occasions of sin which keep us at a distance from God? Ah, let us not mock the Lord! And now do not mock, lest your bonds be tied strait.[14718] Do not mock God, says the prophet, lest those bonds which are securing you for hell be tied strait. Cornelius a Lapide, in commenting on the above passage of Isaias, says that when the fox is caught in the snare, its efforts to disengage itself only serve to entangle it the more. "So also will it happen to sinners who, while mocking at God's threats and punishments, become more and more involved in them."[14719] My brethren, let us have done; let us no more irritate God, the chastisement is near at hand: For I have heard of the Lord the God of Hosts, continues the prophet, a consumption, and a cutting short upon all the earth.[14720] I am not the prophet Isaias but I can say that I see the scourge which is hanging over us if we do not be converted.

Hear how the Lord says to you: Who requires these things at your hands?[14721] Who required your perpetual exercises and your visits of devotion to the church? I will have nothing from you unless you abandon sin: Offer sacrifice no more in vain.[14722] Of what use are your devotions if you do not amend your lives. My soul hateth your solemnities.[14723] Know, says the Lord, that your homage and external devotions are hateful to my soul whilst you think by these to avert your chastisement without removing your offences: With burnt offerings Thou wilt not be delighted; a sacrifice to God is an afflicted spirit.[14724] No devotions, or alms, or penitential works are accepted by God from a soul in the state of sin, and without repentance. God accepts the acts of him alone who is contrite for his sin, and resolved upon a change of life.

Oh, surely God is not to be mocked![14725] I never commanded you, he says, to perform those devotions and acts of penance: For I spoke not to your fathers . . . concerning the matter of burnt offering and sacrifices, but this thing I commanded them, saying: Hearken to My voice, and I will be your God.[14726] What I wish of you, says God, is, that you hear my voice and change your life, and make a good confession, with real sorrow, for you must know yourselves, that your other confessions, followed by so many relapses, have been worth nothing. I wish that you should do violence to yourselves in breaking with that connection, with that company. I wish that you should endeavor to restore that property, to make good to your neighbor such a loss. Hearken to My voice, obey My command, and I will be your God. I will then be to you the God of mercy, such as you would have me to be. Cardinal Hugo, in his comment upon these words of our Lord, in the Gospel according to St. Matthew: He that hath ears to hear, let him hear, [14727] says: "Some have ears, but ears which do not serve them for hearing."[14728] How many attend sermons and receive admonitions from the confessor, in which they are told all that they must do in order to please God; but they leave the church only to live worse than before. How can God be appeased by such? or how can such be delivered from the divine chastisement? Offer up the sacrifice of justice, and trust in the Lord,[14729] says David. Honor God not in appearance, but by works. It is that which is meant by "the sacrifice of justice;" honor him by bewailing your sins, by the frequentation of the sacraments, by a change of life and then hope in the Lord; but to hope while you continue the state of sin, is not hope—it is rashness, it is a deceit of the enemy, and renders you more odious in the sight of God, and more deserving of punishment.

My brethren, you see that the Lord is in wrath, that he already has his hand lifted to strike with the scourge which threatens us; how do you think to escape? Who hath showed you to flee from the wrath to come?[14730] Bring forth, therefore, fruit worthy of penance,[14731] says St. John the Baptist, preaching to the Jews of his day. You must do penance, but penance deserving of his pardon; that is it must be true and resolute. Your anger must be changed into meekness, by the forgiveness of those who offend you; your intemperance must become abstinence, by observing the fasts commanded, at least, by the Church; and by abstaining from the immoderate use of intoxicating drinks, which change man into a beast: therefore you must avoid the public house; impurity must give way in you to chastity, by not returning to that filthy vomit, by resisting evil thoughts, by not using bad words, by fleeing from bad companions and dangerous conversation. You must bring forth fruit worthy of penance, and the bringing forth of such fruit implies also that we attend to the service of God, and endeavor to serve him more than we offended him; For, as you have yielded your members to serve uncleanness and iniquity, . . . so now yield your members to love justice.[14732] bus have done a St. Mary Magdalen, a St. Augustine, a St. Mary of Egypt, a St. Margaret of Cortona, who by their works of penance and sanctification rendered themselves more dear to God than others who had been less sinful, but more tepid. St. Gregory says: "For the most part, a fervent life after sin is the more pleasing to God than a life which, though innocent, is tepid.[14733] And thus does the saint explain the following passage of the Gospel: There shall be joy in heaven upon one sinner that doth penance, more than upon ninety-nine just who need not penance.[14734] This is understood of the sinner who, after having arisen from sin, sets about serving God with more fervor than others who have long been just.

This is to bring forth fruit worthy of penance, not content one's self with hearing sermons and visiting the church, without abandoning sin, or avoiding the occasion of it. To act thus, is rather a mockery of God, and calculated to excite him to greater wrath. And, think not, pursues St. John the Baptist, think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham for our father. [14735] It will not do to say, we have the Mother of God to assist us, we have our patron saint to procure us deliverance; because if we do not abandon our sins the saints cannot help us. The saints are the friends of God; hence they not only have no inclination, but they would even feel ashamed, to succor the obstinate. Let us tremble, because the Lord has already published the sentence: Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be cut down and cast into the fire.[14736] Brother, how many years have you been in the world? Tell me what fruit of good works have you hitherto borne, what honor have you rendered to God by your life? Sin, outrage, contempt, such are the fruit you have borne, the honor you have rendered to God.—God now in his mercy gives you time for penance, in order that you may bewail the injuries you have done him, and love him the remainder of your days. What do you intend to do? What have you resolved upon? Resolve at once to give yourself to God. What do you expect? unless that if you do not at once turn to God, you shall be cut down and cast into the fire of hell.

But let us now bring our instruction to a conclusion; the Lord has sent me to preach here to-day, and has inspired you to come and listen to me, because he wishes to spare you the punishment which threatens you, if you do really turn to him: Leave not out one word, if so be they will hearken and be converted, every one from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil which I think to do un to them.[14737] The Lord has desired me to tell you on his part that he is willing to relent, and withdraw the scourge which he meant to inflict upon you: That I may repent me of the evil which I think to do unto them ; but on this condition, if so be they will hearken and be converted every one from his evil way, if they truly reform, otherwise he will put his threat in execution.—Tremble then if you be not yet resolved to change your life.

But, on the other hand, be joyful if you mean to turn in good earnest to God. Let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord, [14738] because God is all tenderness and love to those that seek him. The Lord is good . . . to the soul that seeketh Him.[14739] Neither does the Lord know how to reject a heart humble and contrite for its offences. A contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.[14740] Let us be joyful, then, if we have the good intention of changing our lives, and if, on seeing ourselves guilty of so many sins before the Lord, we stand very much in fear of the divine judgments, let us have recourse to the Mother of mercies, the most holy Mary, who defends and secures from the divine vengeance all those who take refuge under her mantle.—"I am the citadel of all those who fly to me;"[14741] thus is she made to speak by St. John Damascene. (Act of contrition.)

SIXTH DISCOURSE.

GOD CHASTISES US IN THIS LIFE FOR OUR GOOD, NOT FOR OUR DESTRUCTION

"Mon enim delectaris in perditionibus nostris."

"For thou art not delighted in our being lost."—Job, iii. 22.

LET US feel persuaded, my brethren, that there is no one who loves us more than God. St. Teresa says that God loves us more than we love ourselves. He has loved us from eternity. Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love.[14742] It is the love he has borne us which has drawn us from nothing, and given us being. Therefore have I drawn Thee, taking pity on Thee.[14743] Hence, when God chastises us upon the earth, it is not because he wishes to injure us, but because he wishes us well, and loves us. But of this every one is sure that worshippeth Thee, that his life, if it be under trial, shall be crowned: and if it be under tribulation, shall be delivered.[14744] So spoke Sara the wife of Tobias: Lord, he who serves thee is sure that after the trial shall have passed he shall be crowned, and that after tribulation he shall be spared the punishment which he deserved: For Thou art not delighted in our being lost: because after a storm Thou makest a calm, and after tears and weeping Thou pourest in joyfullness.[14745] After the tempest of chastisement he gives us peace, and after mourning, joy and gladness.

My brethren, let us convince ourselves of what I have undertaken to show you to-day, namely, that God does not afflict us in this life for our injury but for our good, in order that we may cease from sin, and by recovering his grace escape eternal punishment.

And I will give My fear in their heart, that they may not revolt from Me.[14746] The Lord says that he infuses his fear into our hearts, in order that he may enable us to triumph over our passion for earthly pleasures, for which, ungrateful that we are, we have left him. And when sinners have left him, how does he make them look into themselves, and recover his grace? By putting on the appearance of anger, and chastising them in this life: In Thy anger Thou shalt break the people in pieces.[14747] Another version, according to St. Augustine, has: "In thy wrath thou shalt conduct the people." The saint inquiring, What is the meaning of his conducting the people in his wrath? he then replies: "Thou, O Lord, fillest us with tribulations, in order that, being thus afflicted, we may abandon our sins and return to Thee."[14748]

When the mother wishes to wean her infant how does she proceed? She puts gall upon her breast. Thus the Lord endeavors to draw our souls to himself, and wean them from the pleasures of this earth, which make them live in forgetfulness of their eternal salvation; he fills with bitterness all their pleasures, pomps, and possessions, in order that, not finding peace in those things, they may turn to God, who alone can satisfy them.

In their affliction they will rise early to Me.[14749] God says within himself, It I allow those sinners to enjoy their pleasures undisturbed, they will remain in the sleep of sin: they must be afflicted, in order that, recovering from their lethargy, they may return to me. When they shall be in tribulation they will say: Come, let us return to the Lord, for He hath taken us, and He will heal us; He will strike and He will cure us.[14750] What shall become of us, say those sinners, as they enter into themselves, if we do not turn from our evil courses? God will not be appeased, and will with justice continue to punish us: come on, let us retrace our steps; for he will cure us, and if he has afflicted us just now, he will upon our return think of consoling us with his mercy.

In the day of my trouble I sought God, . . . and I was not deceived,[14751] because he raised me up. For this reason does the prophet thank the Lord that he hath humbled him after his sin; because he was thus taught to observe the divine laws: It is good for me that Thou hast humbled me, that I may learn Thy justifications.[14752] Tribulation is for the sinner at once a punishment and a grace, says St. Augustine.[14753] It is a punishment inasmuch as it has been drawn down upon him by his sins; but it is a grace, and an important grace, inasmuch as it may ward eternal destruction from him, and is an assurance that God means to deal mercifully with him if he look into himself, and receive with thankfulness that tribulation which has opened his eyes to his miserable condition, and invites him to return to God. Let us then be converted, my brethren, and we shall escape from our several chastisements: "Why should he who accepts chastisement as a grace be afraid after receiving it?"[14754] says St. Augustine. He who turns to God, smarting from the scourge, has no longer anything to fear, because God scourges only in order that we may return to him; and this end once obtained, the Lord will scourge us no more.

St. Bernard says that it is impossible to pass from the pleasures of the earth to those of Paradise. "It is difficult, even impossible, for any one to enjoy present and future goods, to pass from delights to delights."[14755] Therefore does the Lord say, Envy not the man who prospereth in his way, the man who doth unjust things.[14756] "Does he prosper?" says St. Augustine; "ay, but 'in his own way.' And do you suffer? You do, but it is in the way of God."[14757] You who walk before God are in tribulation, but he, evil as is his way, prospers. Mark now—what the saint says in conclusion: "He has prosperity in this life, he shall be miserable in the next; you have tribulation in this life, you shall be happy in the next."[14758] Be glad, therefore, O sinners! and thank God when he punishes you in this life, and takes vengeance of your sins; because you may know thereby that he means to treat you with mercy in the next. Thou wast a merciful God to them, and taking vengeance on their inventions.[14759] The Lord when he chastises us has not chastisement so much in view as our conversion. God said to Nabuchodonozor: Thou shalt eat grass like an ox, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men.[14760] For seven years, Nabuchodonozor, shalt thou be compelled to feed upon grass like a beast in order that thou mayest know I am the Lord; that it is I who give kingdoms, and take them away; and that thou mayest thus be cured of thy pride. And in fact this judgment did cause the haughty king to enter into himself and change; so that, after having been restored to his former condition, he said: Therefore I , Nabuchodo—nozor, do now praise and magnify the King of heaven.[14761] And God gave him back his kingdom. "He willingly changed his sentence," says St. Jerome, "because he saw his works changed."[14762]

Unhappy we, says the same saint, when God does not punish us in this life! It is a sign that he means us for eternal chastisements.[14763] What do we conclude, he continues, when the surgeon sees the flesh about to mortify, and does not cut it away? we conclude that he abandons the patient to death? God spares the sinner in this life, says St. Gregory, only to chastise him in the next.[14764] Woe to those sinners to whom God has ceased to speak, and appears not to be in anger. I will cease and be angry no more.[14765] The Lord then goes on to say: But thou hast provoked Me in all these things: . . . and thou shalt know that I am the Lord, . . . that thou mayest remember, and be confounded.[14766] A clay will come, he says, ungrateful sinner, when you shall know what I am; then shall you remember the graces I have given you, and see with confusion your black ingratitude.

Woe to the sinner who goes on in his evil life, and whom God in his vengeance suffers to accomplish his perverse desires, according to what is said by the prophet: Israel hearkened not to Me, so I let them go according to the desires of their heart.[14767] It is a sign that the Lord wishes to reward them on this earth for whatever little good they may have done, and reserves the chastisement of their sins for eternity. Speaking of the sinner whom he treats thus in this life, the Lord says. Let us have pity on the wicked, but he will not learn justice, . . . and he shall not see the glory of the Lord.[14768] Thus does the poor sinner hasten on to his ruin, because seeing himself prosperous, he deceives himself into the expectation that as God is dealing mercifully with him now, he will continue to do the same; and by this delusion he will be led to live on in his sins. But will the Lord be always thus merciful to him? No, the day of punishment will come at length, when he shall be excluded from paradise, and flung into the dungeon of the rebels: And he shall not see the glory of the Lord. "Let us have pity on the wicked; far from me be this mercy,"[14769] says St. Jerome. Lord, he says, extend not to me this dreadful pity; if I have offended Thee, let me be chastised for it in this life; because if Thou dost not chastise me here in this life, I shall have to be chastised in the other world for all eternity. For this reason did St. Augustine say: "Lord, here cut, here burn, that you may spare during eternity."[14770] Chastise me here, O God, and do not spare me now, in order that I may be spared the punishment of hell. When the surgeon cuts the imposthume of the patient, it is a sign that he means to have him healed. St. Augustine says: "It is most merciful of the Lord not to suffer iniquity to pass unpunished."[14771] The Lord deals very mercifully with the sinner when by chastisement he makes him enter into himself in this life. Hence Job besought the Lord so earnestly to afflict him. And that this may be my comfort, that afflicting me with sorrow He spare not.[14772]

Jonas slept in the ship when he was flying from the Lord; but God seeing that the wretched man was on the brink of temporal and eternal death, caused him to be warned of the tempest: Why art thou fast asleep; rise up, call upon thy God.[14773] God my brethren, now warns ye in like manner. You have been in the state of sin, deprived of sanctifying grace, the chastisement has come, and hat chastisement is the voice of God, saying to you, "Why are you fast asleep? rise and call upon your God." Awake, sinner! do not live on forgetful of your soul and of God. Open your eyes, and see how you stand upon the verge of hell, where so many wretches are now bewailing sins less grievous than yours, and are you asleep? have you no thought of confession? no thought of rescuing yourself from eternal death? Rise, call upon your God. Up from that infernal pit into which you have fallen; pray to God to pardon you, beg of him this at least, if you are not at once resolved to change your life, that he will give you light, and make you see the wretched state in which you stand. Learn how to profit by the warning which the Lord vouchsafes you. Jeremias first sees a rod. I see a rod watching; he next sees a boiling caldron: I see a boiling caldron.[14774] St. Ambrose, in speaking of this passage, explains it thus: He who is not corrected by the rod, shall be thrown into the caldron, there to burn.[14775] He whom the temporal chastisement fails to convert, shall be sent to burn eternally in hell-fire. Sinful brother, listen to God, who addresses himself to your heart, by this chastisement, and calls on you to do penance. Tell me what answer do you make him?

The prodigal son, after having left his father, thought no more upon him, whilst he continued to live amid delights; but when he saw himself reduced to that state of misery described in the Gospel, poor, deserted, obliged to tend swine, and not allowed to fill himself with the food wherewith the swine were filled, then he came to himself, and said: How many hired servants in my father's house abound with bread, and I here perish with hunger.[14776] I will arise and go to my father.[14777] And so he did, and was lovingly received by his father. Brother, you have to do in like manner. You see the unhappy life you have hitherto led, by living away from God; a life full of thorns and bitterness; a life which could not be otherwise, as being without God, who alone can give content. You see how many servants of God who love him lead a happy life, and enjoy continual peace, the peace of God, which, as the Apostle says, surpasses all the pleasures of the senses. The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding.[14778] And what are you doing? Do you not feel that you suffer a hell in this life? do you not know that you shall suffer one in the next? Take courage, say with the prodigal: I will arise and go to my father. I will arise from this sleep of death—this state of damnation, and return to God. It is true that I have sufficiently outraged him by leaving him so much against his desire, but he is still my Father. I will arise and go to my father. And when you shall go to that Father, what shall you say to him? Say what the prodigal said to his father: Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee; I am not now worthy to be called thy son.[14779] Father, I acknowledge my error, I have done ill to leave Thee, who have so much loved me; I see now' that I am no longer worthy to be called Thy son; receive me at least as Thy servant; restore me at least to Thy grace, and then chastise me as Thou pleasest.

Oh, happy you, if you say and do thus! the same will happen you which befel the prodigal son. The father, when he saw his son retracing his steps, and perceived that he had humbled himself for his fault, not only did not drive him off—not only received him into his house, but embraced and kissed him as his son. And running to him, fell upon his neck and kissed him.[14780] He then clothed him with a precious garment, which represents the robe of grace: Bring forth quickly the first robe, and put it on him.[14781] And he, moreover, makes a great feast in the house, to commemorate the recovery of his son, whom he looked upon as lost and dead: Let us eat and make merry, because this my son was dead, and is come to life again; was lost, and is found.[14782]

Let us then be joyful, my brethren; it is true that God appears to be in wrath, but he is still our Father; let us retrace our steps in penance, and he will be appeased and spare us. Behold Mary our Mother praying for us on the one hand, and on the other turned towards us, saying, In me is all hope of life and of virtue; . . . come over to me all.[14783] My children, that Mother of Mercy says to us, My poor afflicted children, have recourse to me, and in me you shall find all hope; my son denies me nothing.[14784] You were dead by sin; come to me, find me, and you shall find life—the life of divine grace, which I shall recover for you by my intercession (Act of contrition.)

SEVENTH DISCOURSE.

GOD CHASTISES US IN THIS LIFE, ONLY THAT HE MAY SHOW US MERCY IN THE NEXT

"Ego quos amo arguo et castigo."

"Such as I love, I rebuke and chastise."—Apoc. iii. 19.

WHEN the Lord had raised that great tempest which threatened to sink the ship in which Jonas was sailing, in punishment of his disobedience to the divine command, that he should preach to the Ninevites, every one in the vessel was watching and in great fear, praying each to his God, with the exception of Jonas, who was asleep within the vessel: He fell into a deep sleep.[14785] But, knowing that he was the cause of the tempest, he caused himself to be thrown into the sea, and was there swallowed by the whale. When Jonas found himself in the body of that fish, and in such extreme danger of death, he addressed himself to God in prayer, and God delivered him: I cried out of my affliction to the Lord, and the Lord heard me.[14786] "Behold," says St. Zeno, "how' Jonas, who slumbered in the ship, is awake in the whale."[14787] While in the ship, he slumbered in his sin; but when suffering chastisement, and upon the point of death, he opened his eyes and remembered God; hence he had recourse to the divine mercy which delivered him, causing the fish to leave him safe and sound upon the shore. Many persons, before seeing the divine chastisements, sleep in their sins, forgetful of God; but the Lord, because he does not desire their destruction, sends them afflictions, so that, roused from their lethargy, they return to him, and thus he is enabled to avoid punishing them during all eternity. The following is, then, the subject of this discourse: GOD PUNISHES US IN THIS LIFE, IN ORDER TO SPARE US IN THE NEXT.

We have not been created for this earth; we have been created for the blessed kingdom of Paradise. For this reason it is, says St. Augustine, that God mingles so much bitterness with the delights of the world in order that we may not forget him and eternal life.[14788] If, living as we do amid so many thorns in this life, we are strongly attached to it, and long so little after Paradise, how little should we not value Paradise if God were not to embitter continually the pleasures of this earth?

If we have offended God, we must needs be punished for it either in this world or in the next. St. Ambrose says that God is merciful as well when he punishes as when he does not.[14789] The chastisements of God are the effect of his love; they are, to be sure, punishments, but punishments which ward off from us eternal punishment, and bring us to everlasting happiness. But whilst we are judged, we are chastised by the Lord, that we be not condemned with this world.[14790] And Judith reminded the Hebrews of the same truth when they were under the scourge of the Lord: Let us believe that these scourges of the Lord, with which like servants we are chastised, have happened for our amendment, and not for our destruction.[14791] Sara, the wife of Tobias, says the same: But of this every one is sure that worshippeth Thee: . . . if his life be under correction, it shall be allowed to come to Thy mercy, for Thou art not delighted in our being lost.[14792] Lord, she said, Thou chastisest us here in order that Thou mayest spare us in the other life, for Thou dost not desire our destruction.

We have it from God himself that those whom he loves in this life he chastises in order that they may be converted: Those whom I love I rebuke and chastise.[14793] Where God loves, says St. Basil of Seleucia, severity is usually the pledge of his graces.[14794] Unhappy are the sinners who living in the state of sin prosper in this life; it is a sign that God reserves them for everlasting punishment. The sinner hath provoked the Lord; according to the multitude of His wrath, He will not seek him.[14795] Behold! says St. Augustine, speaking of the passage quoted, behold the most grievous chastisement! When he does not appear to take notice of the sinner, and leaves him unpunished, it is a sign that he is very wroth.[14796] I call you, says God to him whom he chastises, and will you be deaf to my voice? Son, be converted, otherwise you shall confirm my anger, since I shall cease to regard your salvation, and allow you to live on in your sins without punishment, but only that I may punish you in the life to come. And My indignation shall rest in thee; and My jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will cease and be angry no more.[14797] The Apostle warns you, my brethren, not to be deaf to the voice of God, for that on the day of judgment your obstinacy shall be rewarded with a dreadful chastisement, and that chastisement eternal. But according to thy hardness and impenitent heart thou treasurest up to thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the just judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works.[14798]

So that, St. Jerome says, that there cannot be a greater punishment for a sinner than that he should not be punished in this life.[14799] And St. Isidore of Pelusium says that sinners who are punished in this life do not deserve pity, but those only who die without having been punished.[14800] It is not so bad, continues the saint, to be simply sick as to have no one to cure you.[14801] St. Augustine says, in another part, that when God does not chastise the sinner in this world, he chastises him most severely; whence he concludes that there is no greater misfortune than impunity for a sinner.[14802] After England had rebelled against the Church, God did not visit her with temporal scourges: her riches have been increasing from that time; but her chastisement is all the greater on that account, as she is left to perish in her sin. The absence of punishment is the greatest punishment, says the same holy Doctor. The not receiving chastisement in this life for sin is a great chastisement, and prosperity in sin a still greater.

Why then, Job inquires, do the wicked live, are they advanced and strengthened with riches?[14803] How comes it, O Lord, that sinners, instead of being taken out of this life in poverty and tribulation, enjoy health, and honors, and riches? The holy man answers, They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment they go down to hell.[14804] Wretched men! they enjoy their riches for a few days, and when the hour of chastisement comes, when they least expect it, they are condemned to burn forever in that place of torments. Jeremiah makes the self-same inquiry: Why doth the way of the wicked prosper?[14805] and then adds, Gather them together as sheep for a sacrifice.[14806] Animals destined for sacrifice are kept from all labor, and fattened up for slaughter. Thus does God act towards the obstinate: he abandons them, and suffers them to fatten on the pleasures of this life in order to sacrifice them in the other to his eternal justice; for these, says Minutius Felix, are fed like victims for the slaughter.[14807]

These wretched men, says David, shall not be punished in this life, they shall enjoy their fleeting pleasures; by and by their dream shall have ceased: Neither shall they be scourged like other men; . . . they have suddenly ceased to be; as the dream of thou that awake, O Lord, so in Thy city Thou shalt bring their image to nothing.[14808] How painful is not the case of a poor man, who dreams that he has grown rich or great, and upon awaking finds himself the miserable and sick creature he is? And the enemies of the Lord shall . . . vanish like smoke.[14809] The happiness of sinners is as suddenly dissipated as is smoke by a breath of air. "Smoke," observes St. Gregory, in his comment upon this passage, "vanishes in its ascent"[14810] And the same is the case with sinners: I have seen the wicked highly exalted, . . . and I passed by, and lo! he was not.[14811] Minutius Felix says, in his comment upon the place cited, the unhappy men are exalted the higher, that their fall may be the greater.[14812] The Lord allows the sinner to be exalted for his greater punishment, in order that his fall may be the more grievous, as is said by David. When they were lifted up Thou hast cast them down.[14813] If the sick man, says St. John Chrysostom, suffer hunger or thirst by order of his physician, it is a sign that the physician has hopes of him; but if the doctor allow him to eat what he pleases, and drink as much as he likes, what are we to conclude from that? It is plain that the physician has given him over. And thus, says St. Gregory, it is a manifest sign that God abandons the sinner to perdition, when lie never thwarts his evil purposes:[14814] and in the Book of Proverbs we read that the prosperity of fools shall destroy them.[14815] As lightning precedes thunder, says St. Bernard, so is prosperity the forerunner of damnation for the sinner.[14816]

The greatest punishment inflicted by God is, when he allows the sinner to sleep on in sin, without rousing him from that sleep of death in which he is buried. I will make them drunk, that they may sleep an everlasting sleep, and awake no more, saith the Lord.[14817] Cain, after the crime of murdering his brother, was afraid that he should be killed by the first person he should meet: Every one therefore that findeth me shall kill me.[14818] But the Lord assured him that he should live, and that no one should kill him; which assurance of a long life, according to St. Ambrose, was Cain's greatest punishment.[14819] The saint says, that God treats the obstinate sinner mercifully, when he gives him an early death, because he thus saves him from as many hells as he should have committed sins during a longer life. Let sinners, then, live according to the desires of their hearts, let them enjoy their pleasures in peace; there will at length come a time when they shall be caught as fish upon the hook. As fishes are taken with the hook, . . . so men are taken in the evil time.[14820] Whence St. Augustine says, "Do not rejoice like the fish who is delighted with the bait, for the fisherman has not yet pulled the hook."[14821] If you were to see a condemned man making merry at a banquet with the halter round his neck, and every moment awaiting the order for execution, would you envy or pity him? Neither should you envy the sinner who is happy in his vices. That wretched sinner is already on the hook, he is already in the infernal net; when the time of chastisement shall have arrived, then the wretch will know and deplore his damnation, but all to no purpose.

On the contrary, it is a good sign when a sinner is chastised and suffers tribulation in this life: it is a sign that God has still merciful views upon him, and that he wishes to substitute a temporal for an eternal punishment in his regard. God, says St. John Chrysostom, when he punishes us on this earth, does not do so out of hatred to us but that he may draw us to himself.[14822] He chastises for a little while, that he may have you with him for eternity.[14823] When the physician uses the knife, he does so to cure, says St. Augustine.[14824] And God, the saint continues, does the same in our regard. "God seems to be cruel; but do not fear; for he is a father who is never cruel, and does not wish to destroy us."[14825] But, does not God say the same himself? Those, whom I love, I rebuke and chastise; be zealous therefore, and do penance.[14826] Son, says God, I love you, and therefore I chastise you; "be zealous;" see how good I am to you; endeavor you to act in like manner towards me; do penance for your sins, if you wish that I should spare you the chastisement which you deserve: at least, accept with patience and turn to advantage the tribulation which I send you. In this cross which now afflicts you hear you my voice calling upon you to turn to me, and fly from hell, which is close upon you. Behold! I stand at the gate antiknock;[14827] I am knocking at the door of your heart; open then to me, and know that when the sinner who has driven me from his heart shall open the door again to me, I will enter, and keep him company forever. If any man shall hear My voice, and open to Me the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me.[14828] I shall remain united to him forever on this earth; and if he remain faithful, I shall seat him beside me, on the throne of mv eternal kingdom. To him that shall overcome, I will give to sit with Me in My throne.[14829]

What! must we look upon God as a tyrant, who should take pleasure in our sufferings? He does take pleasure in punishing us, but exactly the same pleasure as a father takes in correcting his son: he does not take pleasure in the pain which he inflicts, but in the amendment it will work. My son, reject not the correction of the Lord; and do not faint when thou art chastised by Him, for whom the Lord loveth He chastiseth, and as a father in the son, He pleaseth Himself.[14830] He chastises you because he loves you; it is not that he wishes to see you afflicted, but converted; and if he takes pleasure in your suffering, he does so inasmuch as it is an instrument of conversion—just as a father who chastises his son derives pleasure, not from the affliction of his son, but from the amendment which he hopes to see in him, and which will prevent him from working his own ruin. Chastisement makes us return to God, says St. John Chrysostom;[14831] and it is to this end God inflicts it, in order that we may not stay away from him.

Why then, my brethren, do you complain of God when in tribulation? You ought to thank him prostrate on the earth; tell me now, if a man condemned to die were to have his sentence changed by the prince from death into one hour's imprisonment, and if he were to complain of that one hour, would his complaint be justifiable? Oh, would he not rather deserve that the prince should reverse the last sentence, and condemn him a second time to death? You have long and often deserved hell by your sins. And do you know all that the word hell conveys? Know that it is more dreadful to suffer for one moment in hell than to suffer for a hundred years the most frightful torments which the martyrs have suffered on earth; and in this hell you should have had to suffer during all eternity. And yet you complain if God send you some tribulation, some infirmity, some loss. Thank God, and say: Lord, this chastisement is trifling compared with my sins. I ought to have been in hell burning, deserted by all, and in despair: I thank you for having called me to yourself by this tribulation which you have sent me. God, says Oleaster, often calls sinners to repentance by temporal chastisements.[14832] By earthly chastisements the Lord shows us the immense punishment which our sins deserve; and therefore afflicts us on this earth, that we may be converted and escape eternal flames.

Wretched, then, as we have been, wretched indeed is that sinner who is left unpunished in this life, bill still more wretched he who, admonished by affliction, does not amend, says St. Basil.[14833] It is not a grievous thing to be afflicted by God on this earth after one has sinned; but it is very grievous not to be converted by the affliction sent, and to be like those of whom David speaks, who, although visited by the divine chastisement, still sleep on in their sins. At Thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, they have all slumbered.[14834] As if the sound of the scourges and the thunders of God, instead of rousing them from their lethargy, served only to make them sleep more soundly. I struck you, yet you returned not to Me.[14835] I have scourged you, says God, in order that you might return to me: but ye, ungrateful that you are, have been deaf to my calls. Unhappy the sinner who acts like him of whom the Lord says. He shall send lightnings against him; . . . his heart shall be as hard as a stone, and as firm as a smith's anvil.[14836] God visits him with chastisement, and he, instead of being softened and returning to the Lord by penance, shall be as firm as a smith's anvil; he shall grow more hardened under the blows of God, as the anvil errors continually harder under the hammer of the smith; and shall become like the impious Achaz, of whom the scripture says. In the time of his distress he increased contempt against the Lord.[14837] Unhappy man, instead of humbling himself, he the more despised the Lord.

Do you know what more happens to these rash beings? They begin to suffer hell even in this life. He shall rain snares upon the sinners; fire and brimstone and storms of wind shall be the portion of their cup.[14838] The Lord shall rain upon them his chastisement, sickness, misery, and every bitterness; but this is not the entire, it is only a portion of their cup, that is, of their chastisement. "The Lord says, 'the portion' only of their cup." observes St. Gregory; because their suffering begins here indeed, but shall be continued throughout eternity."[14839] He deserves all this who, being afflicted by the Lord for his conversion, continues to earn chastisement, and provoke the Lord to greater wrath, says St. Augustine.[14840] What can I do, O sinner! to work your conversion? will the Lord then say. I have called you by sermons and inspirations, and you have despised them: I have called you by favors, and you have grown more insolent; I have called you by scourges, and you continue to offend me. For what shall I strike you any more, you that increase transgression; . . . and the daughter of Sion shall be left as a city that is laid waste.[14841] Do you not wish to hearken even to my chastisements? Do you wish that I should abandon you? I shall be obliged to do it if you do not amend.

My brethren, let us no longer abuse the mercy which God uses towards us. Let us not be like the nettle, which stings him who strikes it. God afflicts us, because he loves us, and wishes to see us reformed, says Oleaster.[14842] When we feel the chastisement, we should bethink us of our sins, and say with the brethren of Joseph, We deserve to suffer these things, because we have sinned against our brother.[14843] Lord, Thou punishest us justly, because we have offended Thee, our Father and God. Thou art just, O God! and Thy judgment is right.[14844] Everything Thou hast done to us, Thou hast done in true judgment.[14845] Lord, Thou art just, and dost with justice punish us; we accept this tribulation which Thou sendest us; give us strength to suffer it with patience.

Here we should do well to remember what God once said to a nun: "You have sinned, you must do penance, you must pray." Some sinners are satisfied with recommending themselves to the servants of God, but they must moreover pray and do penance. Let us do so, because when the Lord shall see our resignation he will not only forgive our sins, but even remit the chastisement; and if God continues to afflict us, let us have recourse to that Lady, who is called the consolatrix of the afflicted. All the saints compassionate us in our sufferings, but there is not of them, as St. Antoninus says, who feels so much for us as this divine Mother Mary.[14846] And Richard of St. Victor adds, that this Mother of mercy cannot behold unhappy sufferers without succoring them.[14847] (Act of contrition.)

EIGHTH DISCOURSE.

PRAYERS APPEASE GOD, AND AVERT FROM US THE CHASTISEMENT WE DESERVE, PROVIDED WE PURPOSE TO AMEND

"Petite et accipietis, quærite et invenietis."

"Ask and you shall receive, seek and you shall find."—John, xvi. 24

HE who has a good heart cannot but feel compassion for the afflicted, and wish to see all men happy. But who has a heart as good as the Lord's? He by his nature is infinite goodness, whence it is that God by his nature has an extreme desire to deliver us from every evil, and render us happy in all things, nay, even partakers of his own happiness. He wishes, therefore, that for our greater good we beg of him the graces which we stand in need of, that we may be spared the chastisement which we deserve, and arrive at life everlasting. Hence he has promised to hear the prayers of him who prays to him with hope in his goodness. Ask and you shall receive.

But to come at once to the subject of our discourse: GOD IS APPEASED BY PRAYERS, AND LED TO WITHDRAW THE CHASTISEMENT WHICH WE DESERVE, PROVIDED WE PURPOSE TO AMEND.

Hence in order to be delivered from the present scourge, and still more from the eternal scourge, WE MUST PRAY AND HOPE. This is to be the first point.—But it is not sufficient to pray and to hope: WE MUST PRAY AND HOPE AS WE OUGHT. This is to be the second point.

1. WE MUST PRAY AND HOPE

God wishes that we should all be saved, as the Apostle assures us: God, Who will have all men to be saved.[14848] And although he sees so many sinners who deserve hell, he does not wish that any of them should be lost, but that they should be restored to his grace by penance, and be saved. Not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[14849] But before delivering us from the punishment we have deserved, and dispensing his graces, he wishes to be sought in prayer. "By prayer," says St. Laurence Justinian, "the wrath of God is suspended, his vengeance is delayed, and pardon finally procured."[14850] Oh how great are the promises which God makes to him who prays! Call upon Me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee.[14851] Cry to Me, and I will hear thee.[14852] You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you.[14853] Theodoret says that prayer is one only instrument, but that it can effect all things.[14854] And let us bear in mind, my brethren, that when we pray and ask things conducive to salvation, not even our sins can prevent our receiving the graces which we beg.—For every one that asketh receiveth.[14855] Jesus Christ here says that whoever asks, be he just or in sin, shall receive. Wherefore did David say, For Thou, O Lord, art sweet and mild, and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon Thee.[14856] Hence the Apostle St. James, in order to excite us to prayer, tells us: But if any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not.[14857] When God is solicited, he gives more than is asked of him, he giveth to all men abundantly. When one man asks a favor of another whom he may have formerly injured, the latter usually reproaches him with the injury that had been done him; but not so God—he never upbraideth. When we beg of him some grace for the good of our souls, he never reproaches us with the offences which we have committed against him; but he hears us, and consoles us as though we had always served him faithfully. Hitherto you have not asked anything in My name, said the Lord one day to his disciples, and to-day he says the same thing to us: Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full.[14858] As if he were to say, Why do you complain of me? You have only yourselves to blame—you have not asked graces of me, and therefore you have not received them. Ask of me, henceforward, what you please, and it shall be granted you; and if you have not merit sufficient to obtain it, ask it of my Father in my name, that is, through my merits, and whatever it be, I promise you that you shall obtain it. Amen, amen, I say to you; if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it to you.[14859] The princes of the earth, says St. John Chrysostom, give audience only to a few, and that seldom; but access can always be had to God by every one, at all times, and with certainty of a favorable hearing.[14860]

Rely, then, upon these great promises, so often repeated by the Lord in the Scriptures; and let us ever be attentive to beg of him those graces which are necessary for salvation, namely, the pardon of our sins, perseverance in his grace, his holy love, resignation to his divine will, a happy death, and Paradise. By prayer we shall attain all; without prayer we shall have nothing. What the holy Fathers and theologians commonly say, namely, that prayer is necessary to adults, as a means of salvation, comes to this, that it is impossible for any one to be saved without prayer. Lessius wisely says, that it ought to be of faith; that without prayer salvation is impossible to adults.[14861] And this is clearly to be drawn from the Scriptures, which say: Ask, and you shall receive:[14862] for as he who seeks obtains says St. Theresa, he who does not seek does not obtain. Pray that ye enter not into temptation.[14863] We ought always to pray.[14864] The words "seek," and "pray," and "we ought," accordings to the opinions of most theologians, along with St. Thomas,[14865] imply a precept binding under pain of mortal sin.

Let us pray, then, and pray with great confidence. Confidence in what? In that divine promise by which says St. Augustine, God has made himself our debtor.[14866] He has promised; he cannot be wanting to his promise; let us seek and hope, and we must be saved. No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded.[14867] There never has been and never will be found any one to hope in the Lord and be lost, as the prophet assures us: He is the protector of all that trust in Him.[14868]

But how comes it, then, that some persons ask graces and do not obtain them? St. James answers that it is because they ask ill. You ask, and receive not, because you ask amiss.[14869] You must not only ask and hope, but ask and hope as you ought. This brings us to the second point.

2. WE MUST HOPE AND PRAY AS WE OUGHT

God has all the desire to deliver us from every evil and to share his blessings with us, as I said in the beginning, but he wishes to be sought in prayer, and prayed to as he should, in order that we should be heard. How can God think of hearing that sinner who prays to him that he may be freed from his afflictions, whilst he is unwilling to abandon sin, which is the cause of his afflictions? When the impious Jeroboam stretched out his hand against the prophet, who reproached him with his wretchedness, the Lord caused his hand to wither up, so that he could not draw it back. And his hand which he stretched forth against him withered, and he was not able to draw it back again to him.[14870] Then the king turned to the man of God, and besought him to beg of the Lord to restore his hand to him. Theodoret says, with regard to this circumstance: "Fool that he was to have asked the prophet's prayers for the restoration of his hand, and not for pardon of his sins."[14871] Thus do many act; they beg of God to deliver them from their afflictions; they beg of the servants of God to avert by their prayers the threatened chastisements, but they do not seek to obtain the grace of abandoning their sins and changing their lives. And how can such persons hope to be freed from the chastisement when they will not remove its cause? What arms the hand of the Lord with thunders to chastise and afflict us? Oh, it is accursed sin! "Punishment is the fine that is to be paid for sin,"[14872] says Tertullian. The afflictions we suffer are a fine which must be paid by him whom sin has subjected to the penalty. St. Basil in like manner says that sin is a note of hand which we give against ourselves.[14873] Since we sin, we voluntarily go in debt to God's justice. It is not God, then, who makes us miserable; it is sin.[14874] Sin it is which obliges God to create chastisements: Famine, and affliction, and scourges, all things are created for the wicked.[14875]

Jeremias, addressing the divine vengeance, says, O thou sword of the Lord, how long wilt thou not be quiet? Go into thy scabbard, rest and be still.[14876] But then, he goes on to say, How shall it be quiet when the Lord hath given it a charge against Ascalon?[14877] How can the sword of the Lord ever be quiet if sinners do not choose to abandon their sin, notwithstanding that the Lord has given a charge to his sword to execute vengeance as long as sinners shall continue to deserve it? But some will say, we make novenas, we fast, we give alms, we pray to God: why are we not heard? To them the Lord replies, When they fast, I will not hear their prayers, and when they offer holocausts and victims, I will not receive them; for I will consume them by the sword, and by famine, and by pestilence.[14878] How, exclaims the Lord! how can I hear the prayers of those who beg to be freed from their afflictions, and not from their sins, because they do not wish to reform. What care I for their fasts, and their sacrifices, and their alms, when they will not change their lives. I will consume them by the sword. With all their prayers, and devotions, and penitential exercises, I shall be obliged by my justice to punish them.

Let us not, then, my brethren, trust to prayers or other devotions, unaccompanied by a resolution to amend. You pray, you smite your breast, and call for mercy; but that is not enough. The impious Antiochus prayed, but the Scriptures say that his prayers failed to obtain mercy from God. Then this wicked man prayed to the Lord, of whom he was not to obtain mercy.[14879] The unhappy man, finding himself devoured by worms, and near his end, prayed for life, but without having sorrow for his sins.

Nor let us trust in our holy protectors, if we do not purpose to amend. Some say we have our patron or some other saint who will defend us; we have our Mother Mary to procure our deliverance, Bring forth therefore fruit worthy of penance. Who hath showed you to flee from the wrath to come? . . . and think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham for our father.[14880] How can we think to escape punishment if we do not abandon sin? How can the saints think of assisting us if we persist in exasperating the Lord? St. John Chrysostom says, of what use was Jeremias to the Jews?[14881] The Jews had Jeremias to pray for them, but, notwithstanding all the prayers of that holy prophet, they received the chastisement, because they did not wish to give up their sins. Beyond doubt, says the holy Doctor, the prayers of the saints contribute much to obtain the divine mercy for us, but when?—when we do penance.[14882] They are useful, but only when we do ourselves violence to abandon sin, to fly occasions, and return to God's favor.

The emperor Phocas, in order to defend himself from his enemies, raised walls and multiplied fortifications, but he heard a voice saying to him from heaven: "You build walls, but when the enemy is within, the city is easily taken."[14883] We must then expel this enemy, which is sin, from our souls, otherwise God cannot exempt us from chastisement, because he is just, and cannot leave sin unpunished. Another time the citizens of Antioch prayed to Marv to avert from them a scourge which overhung them; and whilst they were praying, St. Bertoldus heard the divine Mother replying from heaven, "Abandon your sins, and I shall be propitious to you."[14884]

Let us then beg of the Lord to use mercy towards us, but let us pray as David prayed: Lord, incline unto my aid.[14885] God wishes to aid us, but he wishes that we should aid ourselves, by doing all that depends upon us. "He who desires to be assisted," says Hilaretus,[14886] "must do all that he can to assist himself." God wishes to save us, but we must not imagine that God will do all without our doing anything. St. Augustine says: "He who created you without your help, will not save you without your help."[14887] What do you expect, sinful brother? That God will bring you to Paradise with all your sins upon you? Do you continue to draw down upon you the divine scourges, and yet hope to be delivered from them? Must God save you while you persist in damning yourself?

If we purpose truly to turn to God, then let us pray to him and rejoice; even though the sins of the entire world were ours, we should be heard, as I said to you in the beginning. Every one who prays with a purpose of amendment, obtains mercy.[14888] Let our prayers be in the name of Jesus Christ, who has promised that the eternal Father will grant us everything we ask in his name, that is, through his merits. If you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it to you.[14889] Let us pray, and never cease from prayer; thus we shall obtain every grace, and save ourselves. It is to this we are exhorted by St. Bernard, who tells us to pray to God through the intercession of Mary: "Let us seek grace, and seek it through Mary; because he who seeks through her, obtains his request, and cannot be disappointed."[14890] Mary, when we pray to her, certainly pleads for us with her Son; and when Mary prays for us, she obtains what she demands, and her prayer cannot be refused by a son who loves her so much. (Act of contrition.)

NINTH DISCOURSE.

MOST HOLY MARY IS THE MEDIATRIX OF SINNERS

"Ego murus et ubera mea sicut turris; ex quo factus sum coram eo quasi pacem reperiens."

"I am a wall, and my breasts are as a tower, since I am become in his presence as one finding peace."—Cant. viii. 10.

DIVINE grace is an infinite treasure, because it makes us friends of God. For she is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God.[14891] Hence it follows, that if there cannot be a greater happiness than to enjoy the grace of God, there cannot be a greater misery than to incur his displeasure by sin, which makes us his enemies. But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike.[14892] But if, my brethren, any of you have had the misfortune to forfeit this divine grace by sin, do not despair, but console yourselves with the reflection, that you have in Jesus Christ himself a mediator, who can obtain pardon for you, and restore you the grace you have lost. And He is the propitiation for our sins.[14893]

What have you to fear, says St. Bernard, when you can have recourse to so great a mediator? He can do all things with his eternal Father.[14894] He has satisfied the divine justice for you, continues the holy abbot, and has nailed your sins to the cross, having taken them away from your soul.[14895] But if, notwithstanding all this, you fear to approach Jesus Christ on account of his divine majesty, God has given you another advocate with his Son, and that advocate is Mary.[14896]

Thus Mary has been given to the world as a mediatrix between God and sinners. Hear the words which the Holy Ghost makes her speak in the divine canticles: I am a wall, and my breasts are as a tower, since I am become in His presence as one finding peace. [14897] I am, she says, the refuge of those who fly to me; my breasts, that is, my mercy, are like a tower of defence to every one who has recourse to me; and he who is the enemy of God, let him know that I am the mediatrix of peace between God and sinners. "She finds peace for enemies, salvation for the lost, mercy for those who are in despair,"[14898] says Cardinal Hugo. For this reason is Mary called beautiful . . . as the curtains of Solomon.[14899] In the tents of David naught was to be heard of but war; in the tents of Solomon naught is spoken of but peace. By this we are to understand that Mary has no other ministry in heaven than that of peace and pardon. Hence St. Andrew Avellino calls her the pleader of Paradise; but what are those occupations in which Mary is engaged? "Mary," says Venerable Bede, "stands in the presence of her Son, praying unceasingly for sinners."[14900] And Blessed Amadeus says that "Mary, all-powerful by her prayers, stands before the face of God, continually interceding for us."[14901] Thus Mary never ceases to implore of God by her all-powerful prayers all graces for us, if we do not refuse them. And are there any found to refuse the graces solicited for them by this divine Mother? Yes, there are found such—yes, those who will not abandon sin, who will not give up this friendship, this occasion; who will not restore their neighbor's property—those are they who will not receive the graces begged for them by Mary, because Mary wishes to obtain for them the grace of breaking off this connection, of flying this occasion of weakness, and they will not do it. And such as will not do it, positively refuse the grace sought for them by Mary. From heaven she sees well all our miseries and dangers; and oh, how deeply is she touched with compassion for us! With what motherly affection is she always endeavoring to assist us! "For she sees our dangers," continues the Blessed Amadeus, "and as our merciful Sovereign compassionates us with maternal affection."[14902]

One day St. Bridget heard Jesus Christ saying to Mary: "Mother, ask of me what you will." And Mary answered him: "I ask mercy for the unfortunate."[14903] As if she were to say to him, Son, since Thou hast made me the Mother of mercy, and Advocate of Sinners, can I ask aught else of Thee than mercy for the unhappy? In a word, St. Augustine says, that amongst all the saints, we have not one who is so solicitous for our salvation as Mary.[14904]

Isaias complains in his day as follows: Behold, Thou art angry; . . . there is none who riseth up and taketh hold of Thee.[14905] Lord, said the prophet, Thou art justly angry with us for our sins, and there is no one to appease Thee, or draw Thee from chastising us. St. Bonaventure says that the prophet had reason to speak thus, since there was no Mary then.[14906] But at present, if Jesus Christ wishes to chastise a sinner, and the sinner recommends himself to Mary, she by her prayers for him restrains her Son, and averts the chastisement from him.[14907] There is no one, he says, so well able to hold back the sword of the Lord.[14908] Justly, then, did St. Andrew call Mary the peace of the Lord with men.[14909] And St. Justin called her the "Arbitress," saying, "The Word uses the Virgin as arbitress."[14910] Sequestra signifies an arbitress, to whose decision disputants binds themselves to yield. By which St. Justin means to say, that Jesus lays before Mary all his reasons for punishing such a sinner, that she may negotiate a peace; and the sinner, on the other side, places himself in her hands. Thus Mary on the one side obtains for the sinner the grace of amendment, and penance on the other; she obtains pardon for him of her Son, and thus it is concluded. Such is the ministry in the exercise of which Mary is continually occupied.

When Noe judged that the deluge ought to have ceased, he dismissed the dove from the ark. It returned with a branch of olive, significant of the peace which God had concluded with the world. This dove was a figure of Mary. "Thou art," says St. Bonaventure, "that most faithful dove of Noe which became the most faithful mediatrix between God and the world submerged by a spiritual deluge."[14911] Thou, O Mary! art the dove all faithful to him who invokes Thee—Thou art the dove that, interceding with God, hast obtained for us peace and salvation, says St. Epiphanius.[14912] Pelbart inquires how it happens that in the Old Law, the Lord was so vigorous in his chastisements, of universal deluge, of lire from heaven, of fiery serpents, and suchlike punishments; whereas he now deals so mercifully with us, who have sinned more grievously than those of old?[14913] And he answers, he does it all through love of Mary, who intercedes for us.[14914] "Oh how long since should heaven and earth have been destroyed," says St. Fulgentius, "if Mary had not interposed."[14915]

Wherefore the Church wishes that we should call this divine Mother our hope.[14916] The impious Luther could not endure that the Church should teach us to call Mary our hope. He said that our hope ought to rest only in God—not in the creature; and that God curses him who places his confidence in creatures: Cursed be the man that trusteth in man.[14917] True; but that is understood of those who trust in creatures, in contempt of God, or independently of him. But we hope in Mary, as our mediatrix with the Lord. In the same manner as Jesus is our mediator of right with his eternal Father, because by the merits of his Passion he obtains pardon for penitent sinners, so Mary is mediatrix by divine favor with her Son, and is such a mediatrix that her Son grants her every request; nay, that he wishes that every grace should pass through her hands. "The Lord," says St. Bernard, "has placed in Mary the plenitude of all good; so that if aught of hope or grace or salvation, is in us, we know that we derive it from Mary."[14918] The Lord has confided to Mary the treasure of mercies which he wishes to have dealt out to us, and therefore wishes that we should acknowledge every grace as coming through her. Whence the saint calls her his chief confidence, and the principal ground of his hope.[14919] For which reason he exhorts us to look for grace always through the intercession of Mary.[14920] And for the same reason the Church, in despite of Luther, calls Mary our hope.[14921]

Hence also do the saints call Mary the ladder, the moon, and the city of refuge. She is called by St. Bernard the ladder of sinners.[14922] It is sin which separates us from God. But your iniquities have divided between you and your God.[14923] A soul in the state of grace is in union with God, and God in union with it. He that abideth in charity, abideth in God, and God in him.[14924] But when the soul turns its back upon God, then is it separated from him—plunged into an abyss of misery, and as far removed from him as sin itself. But when shall this wretched soul find a ladder by which to mount once more to God, and be again united to him? Mary is that ladder, to whom, if the sinner has recourse, no matter what his misery, or how great the filth of sins, he can come out of the pit of perdition. "Thou," says St Bernard, "dost not abhor the sinner, however loathsome he be; if he once sigh to thee, thou reachest him thy hand to draw him out of the gulf of despair."[14925] For the same reason is she called the moon: Fair as the moon.[14926] "As the moon," says St. Bernard, "is placed between the sun and earth, so is Mary stationed between God and us, to pour out his graces continually upon us."[14927] Hence, also, she is called the city of refuge, as she is made to call herself by St. John Damascene. "I am the city of all those that have recourse to me."[14928] In ancient law there were five cities of sanctuary; to which, if any one fled, he was secure of not being pursued by justice, no matter what his crime. At present we have not so many cities of sanctuary—we have only Mary to whom if any one shall have fled he may rest secure of not being pursued by the divine justice. In the cities of the old law every delinquent was in danger, could all his crimes escape unpunished; but Mary is a city of refuge which receives every criminal. "There is no one so much cast off by God," said this blessed Mother to St. Bridget, "who, if he have recourse to me, shall not return to God, and receive pardon."[14929]

Mary, so far from disdaining to assist sinners, prides herself upon the function of advocate of sinners, so that she is related to have said to the venerable sister Mary Villanin, "Next to my dignity of Mother of God, there is nothing which I so much value as my office of advocate of sinners." "To this end," says Idiota, who takes it from St. John Chrysostom, "hast thou been chosen from eternity to be the Mother of God, that those whose sins should exclude them from participation in the merits of thy Son might be made partakers of them by thy intercession."[14930] This was the principal office for the fulfilment of which God created her, and placed her in the world: Feed thy kids.[14931] By kids he means sinners, and those kids are given in care to Mary, in order that they who on the day of judgment should by their sins have deserved to stand upon the left, may by her intercession stand upon the right. "Feed thy kids." says William of Paris, "whom thou shalt convert into sheep, that they who should have been placed to the left may through thy intercession take their stand upon the right."[14932] But we must not forget to notice what has been said upon this passage by William of England: "Feed thy kids." Who are the kids of Mary? "These sinners," he says, "who pay her no devotion, who do not beg of her to obtain their conversion, are not the kids of Mary, and shall be placed on the left."[14933]

St. Bridget one day heard Jesus Christ saying to his mother, "Thou givest assistance to every one endeavoring to rise to God."[14934] Mary assists every one who does himself violence to leave his evil life and turn to God, or at least prays to her that he may receive strength to do so; if he have not that desire, the divine mother herself cannot assist him. Mary then assists only those sinners who honor her by some special devotion, and who, if they yet remain in disgrace with God, have recourse to her that she may obtain pardon for them, and work their deliverance from their present infernal condition. The sinner who acts thus from his heart is secure, because Mary, as we have said before, has been therefore created that she might have charge of sinners, and lead them to God. The Lord revealed this to St. Catherine of Sienna: "She is chosen by me as a most delicious food, so as to capture men, especially sinners."[14935] And the blessed Mother herself said to St. Bridget, that as the magnet attracts iron, so she draws the hard hearts of men to herself and to God.[14936] But we must always bear in mind that these hearts, notwithstanding their hardness, must desire liberation from their unhappy state.

Ah, if all had recourse to Mary with at least this desire, she would procure salvation for all. "What fear of damnation should that man feel," says the Abbot Adam, "to whom Mary offers herself for a mother and an advocate?"[14937] He inquires again, "Could it be possible that you, the mother of mercy, should not intercede with the Redeemer for the soul he has redeemed?"[14938] He lastly makes answer: "Ah, Thou must intercede, because God, who has placed his Son mediator between man and heaven, has placed Thee mediatrix between his Son and guilty man."[14939]

Then, sinner, says St. Bernard, give thanks to him who has provided you with such a mediatrix.[14940] Thank your God, who, in order to manifest his mercy towards you, has given you not only his Son for a mediator in his own right, but that you might have more confidence, has given you Mary as a mediatrix with that Son. Therefore it is St. Augustine calls her the only hope of sinners.[14941] And St. Bonaventure: "If by reason of your iniquities you see the Lord in anger, and fear to approach him, have recourse to the hope of sinners, who is Mary."[14942] She will not reject you because you are too wretched; "it is her office to assist the wretched."[14943] And William of Paris says exactly the same: "It is thy office to place thyself between God and man."[14944] Hence, when we have recourse to Mary, let every one say to her with St. Thomas of Villanova: "Ah, therefore, thou our advocate fulfil thy office."[14945] Since thou art Mother of God, and advocate of the wretched, assist me who am so wretched; if thou dost not assist me, I am lost; and let us proceed to address her in the words of St. Bernard: "Remember, O most pious virgin, that from the beginning, etc., etc.[14946] I do not wish to be the first unhappy man who shall have had recourse to thee, and yet be abandoned by thee. (Act of contrition.)
